-----------------------------------	------

THE SIXTH EDITION of CQ Press's Guide to U.S. Elections is published following the historic national elections of 2008, in which Barack Obama became the first African American to be elected president of the United States and whose principal opponent in the primary contest to win the Democratic Party nomination was a woman, Hillary Rodham Clinton. The significance of Obama's election included that fact that it had only been four or five decades since African Americans were often unable even to vote in many states and areas of the nation. The 2008 election was also notable because it drew into the campaigns and the voting booths thousands of young persons, just old enough to vote or still in their twenties, who had previously shunned electoral politics. In addition, the 2008 voting reaffirmed the growing strength of the Democratic Party and the declining fortunes of the Republican Party, at least for the near-term future. In addition to Obama's victory, Democrats won commanding control of both houses of Congress and in the process became the dominant party in all regions of the nation except the South.

The revised Guide to U.S. Elections tells this remarkable story while, at the same time, setting the events of recent years in the context of the long historical development of politics and elections in the United States. The volume has been expanded in many ways to provide readers a logical and comprehensive explanation of voting—the fundamental act of self-government.

The editors of this new edition have retained numerous features and content from earlier editions, including multiple means of accessing information, such as use of cross-reference page flags and several indexes. This edition also continues to emphasize the origins and development of U.S. elections at the federal and state levels as well as the rise of such important issues as campaign finance reform. Its historical background provides a framework for better understanding the comprehensive array of election returns that are the central feature of the Guide.

Part 1: Elections in America. This section provides readers a broad overview of the U.S. elections system. The introductory chapter, "The Evolution of American Elections," outlines the history of elections, with a particular emphasis on the last seventy years of the twentieth century and the early years of the twenty-first. This chapter also includes a list of election milestones for more than two hundred years.

The second chapter, "Elections: An Expanding Franchise," discusses the long—and often slow—expansion of the franchise in the United States from a highly restricted right to vote in its earliest days to the universal voting privilege that exists today.

Part 2: Political Parties. First appearing in the previous edition, Chapter 3 on campaign finance was developed to chronicle the overriding importance—and influence—of campaign spending and contributions as they became one of the most controversial aspects of U.S. elections. Substantially revised for this edition, this chapter highlights the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 and its consequences, intended and otherwise. Chapter 4, "Politics and Issues, 1945–2008," helps readers to better understand the historical context in which elections since World War II have been held.

Chapter 5, "Political Party Development," provides a history of the evolution of parties, examines party systems, and addresses the question of why two parties. Chapter 6, "Historical Profiles of American Political Parties," profiles all major and most minor U.S. parties, many of which no longer exist.

Part 2 also contains chapter 7, which discusses the southern electoral experience, including the historical significance of southern primaries that wielded a disproportionate impact upon the American electoral process during much of the twentieth century.

Part 3: Presidential Elections. This section reviews all U.S. presidential races and includes a detailed elections chronology, nominating convention highlights, platforms, ballots, electoral college results (with accompanying maps), and popular vote returns for primaries and general elections.

Part 4: Congressional Elections. This section provides detailed election returns for Congress from 1842 to the present in the House and from 1913 (when popular vote was first used) to the present in the Senate. The election data are supported by chapters explaining the history and evolution of voting for members of the legislative branch of government.

ICPSR HISTORICAL ELECTION RETURNS FILE

The election returns obtained from the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research for the Guide to U.S. Elections represent constituency-level totals for candidates appearing in elections for the offices of president from 1824 to 1973, for governor and U.S. representative from 1824 to 1973, and for U.S. senator from 1913 to 1973. Returns for the elections from 1974 through 2008 were obtained by CQ Press chiefly from its own research and publications and with the generous assistance of researchers and reporters at Congressional Quarterly.

The 1824 starting point for the ICPSR Historical Election Returns File was based on consideration of such factors as the pronounced trend by that time toward popular election of the presidential electors as well as the availability, accessibility, and quality of returns for presidential, gubernatorial, and House elections.

COLLECTION OF DATA

The original data collection effort, begun in 1962, was supported by the Social Science Research Council and the National Science Foundation. The addition of contemporary election returns is supported by the annual membership fee of more than 300 colleges and universities affiliated with the consortium.

As is the case with any enterprise of the magnitude represented by this data collection, many individuals contributed to its development and growth. Those who provided the initial impetus for the project include Lee Benson, Allan G. Bogue, Dewey Grantham Jr., Samuel P. Hays, Morton P. Keller, V. O. Key Jr., Phillip Mason, Richard P. McCormick, Warren E. Miller, Thomas J. Pressly, William H. Riker, and Charles G. Sellers Jr. The ad hoc Committee to Collect the Basic Quantitative Data for American Political History of the American Historical Association employed the assistance of more than one hundred archivists, historians, and political scientists in the collection of the data.

Through the efforts of Warren E. Miller, the executive director of the consortium, financial support was obtained for completion of the data collection, conversion to electronic form, and the extensive processing that followed. The data collection and processing were successively directed by Walter Dean Burnham, Howard W. Allen, and Jerome M. Clubb at the Survey Research Center and later the Center for Political Studies in the Institute for Social Research at the University of Michigan.

The initial data collection was conducted by scholars in the various states who volunteered their time and effort in locating little-known publications, searching state and local archives for unpublished data, exploring newspaper files, and evaluating the accuracy and reliability of these sources. In as many cases as possible, multiple sources were consulted. While general preference was given to official sources, these scholars were charged with the task of evaluating all available resources in terms of their quality and completeness. While source annotations in their entirety are too extensive to publish here, information on the sources for returns from specific elections can be obtained from the ICPSR.

The result of this initial effort and subsequent work by the ICPSR staff was the recovery of returns for more than 90 percent of all the elections for president, governor, senator, and representative in the period covering 1824 to 1973. This estimate was based on a review of the periodicity of elections by state and office, indicating where elections apparently occurred but no returns could be located. Such hypotheses were confirmed by reference to state manuals and histories or the Biographical Directory of the American Congress, 1774–1996 (Washington, D.C.: CQ Staff Directories, 1997), which records changes in the membership of state delegations.

FORMAT OF ELECTION RETURNS FILE

In the ICPSR data format, an election is defined as a set of returns by party or candidate for a specified office in a specified state at a specified time. As a result, the collection through 1973 includes returns for more than 25,000 individual elections and records the names of almost 115,000 candidates.

The ICPSR data also preserve the party designations appearing in each original source. Consequently, almost 1,700 unique partisan labels appear in the collection, most of which, of course, represent short-lived or localized minor parties and the combinations and permutations of multiparty support received by individual candidates. In the ICPSR data collection, separate vote totals are recorded for candidates who appeared more than once on a ballot with different and distinct party designations. In short, the data are presented in the collection virtually as they appeared in the original sources, without combining candidate or party totals.

A comprehensive series of error-checking procedures was carried out on these data, and errors discovered through them were corrected. The ICPSR maintains returns for these elections at the county level in separate and larger electronic files. Using these data, it was possible to ascertain that the individual candidate returns summed to the total number of votes cast in the county. Subsequently, county returns were calculated as a check against the state or congressional district level returns by candidate and in terms of the total number of votes cast. All discrepancies encountered in this process were resolved where possible, and appropriate corrections to the electronic files were made. No further systematic error checks are planned, although errors discovered through the use of the data are corrected as they are reported to the ICPSR.

Requests for Electronic Data. Requests for electronic data from the ICPSR Historical Election Returns File should be addressed to Executive Director, Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research, Box 1248, Ann Arbor, MI 48106-1248. Alternatively, visit the ICPSR Web site: www.icpsr.umich.edu.

Readers also will find in this section a listing of senators, their dates of service in office, and senate primary election returns.

Part 4 also includes chapter 22 on the history of reapportionment and redistricting, the historically decennial process that realigns representation in the House after every census. The chapter discusses the unprecedented “mid-decade” redistricting in Texas during the 1990s that at the time helped promote the GOP into majority control of the House; the party would enjoy this majority until its fortunes started to decline in the 2006 elections. The chapter also examines the way that population location, growth, and decline have affected the allocation of House seats throughout U.S. history.

Part 5: Gubernatorial Elections. This section follows the pattern of the previous sections with a detailed listing of general and primary returns for the election of governors, supported by chapter 27 discussing gubernatorial history. A list of governors and their dates in office is included.

Finding Information

A reader can locate information in a number of ways. The table of contents offers an overall view of the book's scope and allows quick access to major sections. Primary divisional headings direct a reader quickly to more specific information. A separate listing identifies tables, figures, and boxes.

The reader can also turn to one of the six candidate indexes: presidential; House; Senate general; Senate primary; gubernatorial general; and gubernatorial primary. Each of these indexes lists the year(s) each candidate ran for office.

The general index provides references to all sections of the Guide, except the popular returns, which are indexed in the candidate indexes. The general index can be used independently as a source of information separate from the candidate indexes.

ICPSR and Other Election Data

The bulk of election returns used in the Guide to U.S. Elections for presidential, gubernatorial, Senate, House, and southern primary races was supplied by the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research (ICPSR) at the University of Michigan. Except where noted, returns through 1972 came from the ICPSR. (See box, ICPSR Historical Election Returns File, p. xviii, and details on the presentation of these returns in this book, pp. 753, 967, 1433, and 1597.)

CQ Press is grateful to the ICPSR staff for its assistance and advice in supplementing this information since the first

Contributors

Any reference book of 2000 pages that was first published nearly thirty-five years ago is the work of many individuals, and this edition of the Guide is no exception.

The sixth edition was under the general direction of volume editor David R. Tarr, former executive editor and director of book publishing at CQ Press, who also revised a number of chapters. He was assisted by Rhodes Cook, the editor of CQ Press's America Votes series, who shared reams of voting data from the 2008 election and answered many questions about earlier contests. Contributors to the volume include Gerald Pomper of Rutgers University; Joe Cantor, a retired expert on campaign finance with the Congressional Research Service for many years; David Hosansky, Miles Pomper, and John Moore, former Congressional Quarterly reporters; Deborah Kalb, Washington, D.C., a freelance writer and frequent contributor to CQ Press books; Fenton Martin, librarian of the Political Science Research Collection at Indiana University; and Doug Goldenberg-Hart, senior acquisitions editor at CQ Press.

THE CQ PRESS ELECTRONIC LIBRARY OFFERS ONLINE DATABASES TO COMPLEMENT YOUR ELECTIONS RESEARCH

The extensive statistics and in-depth analysis provided in Guide to U.S. Elections become even more useful when paired with the online elections resources available in the CQ Press Electronic Library.

With its dynamic, user-friendly interface, CQ Press's Voting and Elections Collection allows researchers to compare and contrast voting and elections data at the presidential, congressional, and gubernatorial levels. Users can also conduct detailed research on voters and voter demographics, as well as the U.S. campaign and elections system. CQ Press's Congress Collection and Supreme Court Collection provide unique voting analysis tools that allow for detailed research on congressional and

Supreme Court voting history. The "Floor Votes" and "Key Votes" features in the Congress Collection help researchers compare, contrast, and analyze more than one million vote records and explore in-depth analysis of key votes from 1945 to the present, and the "Voting Bloc Analysis" tool in the Supreme Court Collection provides essential data on justices' voting records.

All CQ Press Electronic Library resources offer acclaimed CQ Press features such as customizable profiles that allow users to save search results and favorite documents, and the fast and easy CiteNow!™ tool, providing one-click access to citation information in four different styles.

The 2008 Election: Transforming American Politics

Gerald M. Pomper, Board of Governors Professor of Political Science (Emeritus), Rutgers University

THE DRAMA OF THE ELECTION of 2008 came from its leading man, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois. As the first African American to be elected president of the United States—indeed the first national candidate of his race with a reasonable chance of winning—his ascent to power marked a transformation in American politics and an epochal ending to this nation's sad heritage of slavery and segregation. Obama's victory was also historically distinctive around the world, for he was the first African American elected leader of any nation where whites were the majority of the electorate. Obama's election was significant beyond its racial import. The immediate drama of 2008 was another turn in the longer plotline of American politics.

In 2008 the institutional structure of the elections remained stable and normal by historical standards. Presidential victory, as prescribed in the Constitution, came from winning an absolute majority of the electoral college, where Obama gained 365 votes to his opponent Sen. John McCain's 173 votes. In all but two states (which allocated votes by district), these electoral votes were awarded to the candidate who received a majority of the state's popular vote. (Unlike the controversial results in the presidential election of 2000, and in the earlier 1876 contest, there were no disputes in the counting of the 2008 votes.)

As is typical in the United States, the election featured only two significant parties: the Democrats and the Republicans. To win the single national office of the presidency (and gain the required electoral majority), politicians must form multistate coalitions. Although many minor parties entered the 2008 contest, they had no significant support, in contrast to previous elections where independent candidates deprived a major party candidate of a national victory. For instance, in 1992 Democratic candidate Bill Clinton won the presidency with only 43 percent of the popular vote over George H. W. Bush's 37 percent because H. Ross Perot of the Reform Party took almost 19 percent (but no electoral votes). In 2000 some supporters of Al Gore blamed Ralph Nader of the Green Party for the Democrats losing the election to Republican George W. Bush. Nader took nearly three million votes nationwide and won crucial shares in closely fought Florida and New Hampshire, where a win in either state would have given Gore the White House.

The results of the 2008 election were quite different. The tally was resolute: Democrat Obama won 69.5 million votes, the largest vote in history for any candidate, achieving 53.7 percent of the national popular total and a margin of 9.5 million over Republican McCain. That was the most decisive presidential election victory in a generation, except for Ronald Reagan's second presidential election victory in 1984. The senator from Chicago became only the fourth Democratic nominee in U.S. history to win a decisive majority of the popular vote—joining the lonely figures in the party pantheon of Andrew Jackson, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Lyndon Johnson. Restoring the Democrats to the White House, Obama reversed the outcome of George W. Bush's minority selection in 2000 and his thin 51.2 percent majority in 2004.

The number of voters in the 2008 election increased to nearly 132 million, 61.6 percent of eligible adult citizens. Although this turnout was only a 1.5 percent increase over 2004, it represented a continuing revival of voting turnout from the low points in preceding decades. Voting participation rose more than 10 percent in a dozen states, while dropping slightly in six noncompetitive states. One reason for this increase was the spread of early mail and absentee voting, enabling voters to cast their ballots without traveling to polling stations. More than 30 million ballots were actually cast before the official election day, November 4. Overall turnout grew considerably among nonwhite voters, in response to the extended contest for the Democratic presidential nomination and Obama's candidacy. Minority voters constituted more than a quarter of the total turnout, the largest proportion ever recorded.

Obama's campaign also changed the nation's electoral map. In the last quarter of the twentieth century, the Republican Party approached an "electoral lock" on the presidency, based on its dominance in the South, lower Midwest, Plains, and Mountain West. Democrats seemed confined to the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and the upper Midwest. To win the White House with this limited coalition, Democrats required victories in almost all of these states, neglecting wide swathes of the nation. (When Democrats lost just one critical state—Florida in 2000 and Ohio in 2004—they also lost the national electoral count.)

Obama gained a national victory by carrying twenty-eight states, the District of Columbia, and a single electoral vote from Nebraska. He captured all states that supported John Kerry in 2004 as well as nine states that had voted for Bush. In contrast to four years earlier, Obama swept the Midwest, carried three of the former Confederate states in the South, and mobilized new voters to win three of the eight states in the Rocky Mountains. He may have laid the foundation for a “blue wall” of Democratic states, engendering the basis for long-term national victories.

The patterns of individual voting also changed considerably, as Obama gained Democratic votes among virtually every social group, in particular younger voters and minority groups, whether African American, Hispanic, or Asian. Despite the concerns that racial prejudice would lose votes for Obama, a candidate of mixed racial parentage, whites (other than those in the Deep South) increased their support of the Democrats. The white shift was limited, as a majority continued to vote Republican as they have for forty years, but Obama actually fared better among white voters than most recent Democratic candidates, all of them Caucasians.

In addition, Obama’s financial success may have ended the utility of the federal regulation of presidential election spending begun in 1974. That system would have given the Democratic candidate government funds for the fall campaign, in return for a limitation of $84 million in his direct spending. Obama rejected the government money, instead relying on innovative solicitation of donations through the Internet. His campaign raised $750 million from more than three million contributors during the course of his nomination and general election efforts. In these combined efforts, he outspent McCain by a 3–1 margin, changing the parameters of money in politics.

Obama accomplished this by recreating the larger conduct of campaigns, most notably moving American elections decisively into the era of computer and Internet politics. His campaign organization developed an e-mail list of 13 million addresses and sent more than one billion e-mail messages, sponsored 35,000 volunteer groups, 3.2 million Facebook enrollments, and made three million phone calls to spur turnout in the last four days before the election. The electronic campaign was reinforced by the most extensive ground canvas in U.S. presidential history, mobilizing millions of paid and volunteer staff to identify supporters, register them as voters, and get them to mark their ballots early or at the polls.

If it is true that the election of 2008 changed American politics, it built on a long, rich and varied political tradition, a tradition that remains persistent, influential, and extensive. While the outcome of a presidential race often dominates election coverage, the full story must include what happens before voters go to the polls. Competitive elections have been held for more than two centuries in the United States, and the vote for the presidency is not the only vote that Americans cast. Nearly 550 federal offices, including representatives and senators, are contested over the six-year electoral cycle, and races for governorships and other state and local posts push into the thousands the total number of people chosen each year.

To encompass such a vast array of information, Guide to U.S. Elections is conveniently divided into five parts to allow for quick and specific research. Parts 1, 2, and 3 outline the U.S. political system and electoral process. Parts 3, 4, and 5 make it possible for readers from Alabama to Wyoming to trace how their states have voted in presidential, congressional, and gubernatorial elections for as long as the states have been part of the Union. Last but not least, several thorough indexes make it easy to find information quickly.

Part 1, “Elections in America,” is valuable in showing how the constitutional framework of a separately elected chief executive and legislature has survived for more than two centuries through a process of adaptation. While the United States has the oldest continuous history of competitive elections, suffrage was far from democratic for more than half this period. As Chapter 2, “Elections: An Expanding Franchise,” clarifies, the right to vote was initially restricted to adult white males with property, and some states followed the English practice of the period by not allowing Catholics or Jews to vote. In the nineteenth century, a large majority of white males were enfranchised, but women did not earn the right to vote until the adoption of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920. For African Americans, although many were temporarily enfranchised after the Civil War, their right to vote was not guaranteed until the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Constitutional amendments since 1961 have also extended the presidential vote to residents of the District of Columbia, prohibited poll taxes, and lowered the voting age to eighteen. More recently, legislation has facilitated voting through “motor-voter” registration and improvements in electoral administration through the Help Americans Vote Act of 2002.

Part 2 “Political Parties” explains that American elections take place within a structure of partisanship deeply rooted in the institutions and historical development of the U.S. political system, despite the Founders’ disdain of “factions.” Chapter 5, “Political Party Development,” outlines that electoral competition between two parties emerged soon after the implementation of the Constitution, revived in the 1820s, and continued through a series of competitions among Federalists, Democrat-Republicans (soon renamed Democrats), Whigs, and Republicans. Although two major parties usually dominated, third, fourth, and other minor parties contested many elections. Since the Civil War, the basic competition has been between Republicans and Democrats, but the two parties have changed their relative positions back and forth and have regularly been challenged by other social and political movements.

Chapter 6, “Historical Profiles of American Political Parties,” throws light on what is obscured by the assertion that the United States has a two-party system. Third parties have not won the White House or many seats in Congress but their interventions have sometimes determined which of the two leading parties won and forced changes in their positions. Chapter 7, “The Southern Electoral Experience,” explains how state institutions were used to maintain a system of racially biased competition in which whites could vote but African Americans could not until the federal courts and Congress guaranteed the right of people of all races to vote.

Although presidential races are often turned into personality contests, they are also about issues, as Chapter 4, “Politics and Issues, 1945–2008,” illustrates. Democrats Harry Truman and Lyndon Johnson won elections emphasizing expansive social programs financed through taxation, while other Democratic candidates have lost on these same issues. Republican Ronald Reagan campaigned against big government and won two elections, while fellow Republican Barry Goldwater took a similar position and was buried in a landslide by Johnson and his Great Society program. Commitments of troops to battle overseas have long fostered political debate, as seen in controversies over American interventions in Iraq and, earlier, in Korea and Vietnam.

The 2008 presidential race centered on economic issues, as the nation endured a financial collapse that threatened a plunge toward depression. The voters’ retrospective disapproval of the Bush administration, on issues of the economy as well as the war in Iraq, boosted Obama and doomed McCain. Appeals to moral values, such as those involved in abortion or gay marriage, faded from their prominence in previous elections, such as in 2004, as voters focused more on the issues that affected their ability to make ends meet and keep their jobs.

Presidential candidates may appeal to voters as personalities, but they owe their place on the ballot to the party that nominates them. Part 3, “Presidential Elections,” documents the changing path to securing the nomination. Chapter 9, “Chronology of Presidential Elections,” provides an overview of all of the major elections since the emergence of the electoral process to the election of Obama in 2008.

The stage for presidential elections is set by the parties’ nomination of candidates. From the launch of party politics until the mid-twentieth century, national conventions of party elites decided who would be the Democratic and Republican candidates. In recent years, however, primaries have become critical in winning party leadership, as described in Chapter 10 “Presidential Primaries.” The structure of primaries, however, has been inconsistent—changing over the years and held at different times and by different rules in the several states.

The primary system has been transformed in recent years and was dramatically different in 2008. “Front-loading,” the shift of state contests to earlier dates, has resulted in a virtual national primary, with a near-majority of delegates to the national conventions chosen on a single day. For Republicans in 2008, the effect was the early victory of McCain. For Democrats, the effect was the early narrowing of the race to two candidates, Obama and Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York, who contended throughout the spring in a series of contests that eventually engaged voters in every state. The Democratic contest also stands out for the unprecedented exclusion of convention delegates chosen in defiance of the party’s national nomination rules and the critical role of “superdelegates,” ex-officio party leaders and elected officials.

Paralleling the dominant impact of primaries, the autonomous power of the national conventions further eroded in 2008, as discussed in Chapter 12, “Nominating Conventions.” The party meetings have become little more than ritual endorsements of the presidential candidates chosen in the earlier direct contests, and even the vice-presidential nominees are no longer selected by convention delegates. In 2008 the running mates—Delaware senator Joseph Biden and Alaska governor Sarah Palin, the first woman on a Republican ticket—were selected in advance by the prospective presidential nominees. Part 3 concludes with the roles and final tallies of the popular vote and electoral college vote in Chapter 16, “Popular Vote Returns for President,” and Chapter 17, “The Electoral College.”

Electing a president is only one part of a U.S. national election, which also involves the choice of all 435 members of the House of Representatives and a third of the Senate, which is likely to determine which party controls the upper house of Congress. The outcome of elections for the House and Senate is critical in determining what a president can and cannot do domestically. Part 4, “Congressional Elections,” documents the results of elections for the House since 1824 and since the popular election of senators began in 1913. In the past three decades, an increase in split-ticket voting (an individual voting for candidates of different parties for president and for Congress) has led to an era of divided government, with different parties in control of the White House and Congress. Divided government has been deplored on the grounds that it blurs accountability for the actions of government and makes it more difficult for the president, the only official accountable to the nation as a whole, to carry through a party program. Nevertheless, it became typical after 1968; one party controlled both branches of the national government for only six years during the last third of the twentieth century.

However, in the opening years of the twenty-first century, there has been some return to the historical patterns of one party-control of the White House and both houses of Congress. Republicans enjoyed this power during most of the first six years of the administration of George W. Bush. Democrats took control of both houses of Congress in 2006 and then increased their power in 2008 with Obama's capture of the presidency and increased margins of 257–178 in the House and 60–40 in the Senate. With parties in a position to enact their promised programs, these electoral turnabouts may presage a period of renewed party responsibility and accountability.

However, at the level of the congressional district, elections to the House of Representatives are often uncompetitive. In 2008 the average representative won by a landslide, and in only fifty seats was the margin of victory less than 10 percent. In fifty-six seats around the country there was no real contest, because one party or the other failed to name a candidate. Still, competition was greater in 2008 than four years earlier, when only twenty seats had relatively close races and sixty-six had only one major party candidate.

In a federal system, the governors of the fifty states are closer to their voters than is the president. Part 5, "Gubernatorial Elections," outlines the outcome of gubernatorial elections from the beginning of the United States and gives an overview of the role of governor, with information on methods of election and term limits. The section also lists every governor who has served in the United States, including the short period for the new nation after the Revolutionary War but before the adoption of the Constitution.

Given the number of offices up for election in a four-year period and the number of elections since 1789, any reference book on elections must be large to be useful. This sixth edition of the Guide to U.S. Elections is comprehensive, offering readers a one-stop service, bringing together results that would otherwise be scattered across many books and libraries and often unavailable or hidden on Web sites. It was designed to invite hours of browsing for insights into American politics of the past, present, and speculative future. New features build on decades of authoritative work on U.S. elections by CQ Press staff and their associates at Congressional Quarterly to present complex information clearly in both prose and in tables.

The Evolution of American Elections

AERICAN POLITICAL HISTORY has been a story of eras—and eras within eras. Throughout it all, there have never been more than two major parties at one time occupying center stage. At first, there were the Federalists and the Democratic-Republicans; through the first half of the nineteenth century, the Democrats and the Whigs; and since the Civil War, the Democrats and the Republicans.

External events have played a major role in which party held the upper hand. The successful prosecution of the Civil War propelled the Republicans into dominance for nearly three-quarters of a century. The Great Depression helped move the Democrats into hegemony for the generation that followed. The turmoil of the 1960s—from racial rioting in many of the nation's cities to the controversial war in Vietnam—left a political landscape that Democrats and Republicans contested for the next half century, with the GOP dominant in presidential elections and Democrats more successful in congressional races, and both parties competitive in state elections. Interludes have occurred within each era, where the partisan balance has temporarily shifted, but only rarely have shifts produced a fundamental political realignment.

During this history of U.S. elections, the American electorate has steadily grown and become more diverse. Barely 365,000 voters cast ballots in the election of 1824, the first in which there is record of a nationwide popular vote for president. Fewer than five million voters participated in 1860, when Abraham Lincoln became the nation's first Republican president, beginning an era of GOP hegemony that lasted almost one-third of the way through the twentieth century. Nearly 40 million voters took part in the Depression-era election of 1932, which conclusively shifted the balance of power to the Democrats, led by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, for the next generation.

More than 105 million voters cast ballots in the election of 2000, which—in its historic closeness—confirmed a nation at the dawn of the twenty-first century evenly divided between the two major parties. Republican George W. Bush had won a bare majority of electoral votes, even though he was the first presidential winner in more than a century to lose the popular vote. In the 2004 elections, which drew more than 122,295,000 voters, Bush won a narrow but clear reelection victory, topping Democrat John F. Kerry in both the popular and electoral votes; Republican retained slim majorities in both the House and Senate. But the Bush years of GOP dominance began to unwind in 2006 when Democrats recaptured both house of Congress and came to a complete end in 2008 when Democrat Barack Obama won a convincing victory for president with 52.9 percent of the more than 131 million votes cast. Democrats also enlarged their congressional majorities.

In 2008 there were about 208 million eligible Americans of voting age (excluding noncitizens who were of voting age), of whom an estimated 74 percent took the critical first step of registering to cast a ballot. The estimated registration rate of eligible voters since 1960 has ranged from 66 percent to the record set in 2008. In addition, exit polls from recent elections showed increasing voting by minorities—principally blacks, Hispanics, and Asians.

That diversity was a far cry from the early years of the Republic, when the franchise was largely limited to a comparative handful of white male landowners. Women were not given the right to vote until 1920; large numbers of blacks across the South were denied the ballot until the 1960s; and it was not until 1971—in the midst of the Vietnam War—that the voting age was lowered nationally from twenty-one to eighteen.

The steady expansion of the voting pool has been accompanied by demographic changes that have dramatically altered the complexion of the electorate. In its formative years the Republic was a rural, agrarian society. It became increasingly urban in the decades of industrialization and immigration that followed the Civil War. As the nation became more mobile over the course of the twentieth century, the population began to move out from central cities into sprawling, fast-growing suburbs.

Gradually, the suburbs have assumed the balance of power in American politics. Tending to have a more mobile, more affluent, and less politically rooted citizenry than the cities or small-town America, the suburbs have been bastions of political independence. Since the end of World War II, they have often been the decisive voting bloc in state and national elections.

With the rise of the suburbs, and independent voting in general, voters have been increasingly willing to split their ticket between candidates of different parties. The result has been long periods of divided government—primarily a Republican president and a Democratic Congress, but in the waning years of the twentieth century, a Democratic president and a Republican Congress. That was reversed in the early years of the new century under Republican president George W. Bush but abruptly swung again the other way with Barack Obama winning in 2008 and Democrats strengthening congressional majorities.

CHALLENGING THE TWO PARTIES

Through it all, third parties have remained part of the supporting cast, though assuming an increasingly critical role in influencing election outcomes in recent years. George W. Bush's 2004 victory was the first in four presidential elections in which the winner received a majority of the popular vote. Obama repeated that feat in 2008.

Throughout American history, third parties have served as a “miner’s canary”—warning the two major parties of areas of disaffection within the body politic—on the slavery question before the Civil War, on trade and currency issues in the late nineteenth century, on government and corporate reform in both the early and late twentieth century, and the issues of states’ rights and racial politics at midcentury. Traditionally, however, third parties have had neither the money nor the numbers of supporters to effectively compete. The boldest of the lot have rallied around a well-known “celebrity” as their national standard-bearer—such as former presidents Martin Van Buren (the Free Soil nominee in 1848) and Theodore Roosevelt (the Progressive Party nominee in 1912). Roosevelt finished second in the election of 1912, and his Progressives won several seats in Congress. This minor success has been about as good as it gets for third parties. Those parties that could reach even 5 percent of the presidential vote have been few and far between.

That changed a bit, though, in the volatile political atmosphere of the late twentieth century. Former Alabama governor George C. Wallace mounted a third-party campaign in 1968 that polled 13.5 percent of the nationwide popular vote, carried five southern states, and served as an important bridge in the transformation of the South from a cornerstone of the Democratic Party to the prime building block of the Republican Party. Twelve years later moderate Republican John B. Anderson of Illinois drew 7 percent of the vote running as an Independent. In 1992 Texas billionaire

H. Ross Perot won 19 percent, also as an Independent, and four years later took 8 percent as the nominee of his newly created Reform Party. Neither, however, won any electoral votes.

Collectively, third parties polled in double-digit percentages in the two presidential elections of the 1990s for the first time in back-to-back elections since the eve of the Civil War. Perot’s showing in 1992 was the best for a third-party candidate since Theodore Roosevelt drew 27 percent of the vote in 1912.

Recent voter willingness to consider options beyond the two major parties has not been limited to the presidency. Over the course of the 1990s, independents or third-party candidates won governorships in Alaska, Connecticut, Maine, and Minnesota. In spring 2001 James M. Jeffords of Vermont tipped the Senate balance to the Democrats by changing his party affiliation from Republican to Independent. When he retired he was succeeded by a House member, Bernie Sanders, a longtime Independent in the state. In 2006 Democratic senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut lost a primary contest—largely over his support of the Iraq war—but went on to win reelection as an Independent and continued to caucus with Senate Democrats.

But third-party candidates played no role in 2008 where Obama and his GOP opponent, Sen. John McCain, divided nearly all of the vote. No minor party candidates received even 1 percent of the total votes cast and few reached that level in individual states.

THE BASIC LAYOUT

The American electoral process has remained essentially the same since the Republic was launched in 1789. The president serves a term of four years and from the beginning has been formally elected by a majority vote of the electoral college. Each state’s electoral vote is equal to its total of senators and House members. If no candidate wins an electoral vote majority, the choice is made by the House of Representatives. That has happened twice, in 1800 and 1824. On four occasions—1824, 1876, 1888, and 2000—the winner of the electoral vote has lost the popular vote.

Senators are elected to six-year terms, with two per state. One-third of the Senate is up for election every two years. Senators were first elected by their state legislatures, but since 1913 they have been elected by direct popular vote.

Members of the House of Representatives serve two-year terms and represent districts within states, the number allotted to each state determined after each decennial census. From the beginning of the Republic, House members have been elected by popular vote.

More than two-thirds of the governors are elected in midterm elections, not in the presidential election year. Five states—Virginia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, and New Jersey—elect their governor in off-years, either the year after or the year before a presidential election.

The length of terms for governors and their method of selection are a matter for each state to decide. In the nation's formative years, terms were of one, two, or even three years, with some states electing their governors by popular vote and others leaving that power in the hands of the state legislature. Over time, though, terms grew longer and election by direct popular vote became universal. In 1900 nearly half the states had four-year gubernatorial terms. In 2008 all but two states—New Hampshire and Vermont—did.

Members of Congress can serve as many terms as they wish. Presidents, though, have been limited to two terms since 1951, and most states currently impose a limit of two consecutive terms on their governors. The presidential limit required a constitutional amendment that grew from Franklin D. Roosevelt's decision in 1940 to run again after having served the two terms that had been traditional limit since George Washington. FDR won that year and again in 1944, although he served only a few months of his last term before dying. A movement in the 1990s to limit the terms of members of Congress through state legislation was stymied when the Supreme Court ruled in 1995 that limitations could be imposed only through a constitutional amendment. (See box, Limiting Terms, p. 919, Vol. II.)

Over the course of the nation's history, there have been three periods of great electoral reform. The first, in the 1820s and 1830s, saw several steps taken toward direct democracy—an expansion of the vote among white males as property and taxpaying qualifications began to be relaxed; the institution of popular balloting on a nationwide basis for presidential electors; and the advent of party conventions to nominate presidential candidates. Before conventions, the selection of a party's standard-bearer had been made in most cases by a caucus of the party's members in Congress.

The second great period of electoral reform came in the early 1900s, with the institution of direct election of senators, the creation of the first presidential primaries to give voters an advisory role in the nominating process, and the extension of the vote to women.

The third period of electoral reform came in the 1960s and 1970s. The vote was extended to millions of blacks across the South; the voting age was lowered across the country from twenty-one to eighteen; the number of presidential primaries increased, to the point they replaced conventions as the determining factor in the nominating process; and “one person, one vote” became the law of the land in drawing congressional districts. In addition, public financing of presidential elections was launched, although this method of paying for the increasingly expensive campaigns was becoming obsolete by 2008 as new methods of raising vast sums of money—particularly using the Internet—were emerging.

As the size of the electorate has grown over the decades, voter participation—as a percentage of the voting-age population—has tended to decline. However, this trend was showing signs of reversing in the early years of the twenty-first century.

In the late 1800s, for instance, around 80 percent of eligible voters often cast ballots in presidential elections. With the waves of foreign immigration around the turn of the century, followed by the expansion of the vote to women, turnout rates plunged to roughly 50 percent in the early 1920s. Turnout moved upward into the 60 percent range in the 1960s, only to begin falling downward again with the lowering of the voting age in the early 1970s. By the end of the twentieth century, the national turnout rate hovered around 50 percent for presidential elections and 35 percent for midterm elections, when the number of ballots cast is always much lower.

The 2004 election saw an upsurge in voter turnout, with 60.7 percent casting ballots. In 2008 that turnout rate dropped back to 56.8 percent in spite of intense interest in the contest as a result of the candidacy of Democrat Obama, the first African American on a major party ticket, who went on to win in November.

The national turnout rate, historically measured as a percentage of the voting-age population (VAP)—eighteen and older since 1971—became a controversial number as scholars in the latter years of the 1990s began to examine the make-up of the VAP. The historical concept included large numbers of persons who, although of voting age, were ineligible to vote. These included noncitizens, such as illegal immigrants, individuals in prison or other institutions and thereby ineligible to vote, and overseas persons previously not counted.

Adjusting the VAP for these categories provided a different, and scholars said a more accurate, way of looking at turnout, the voter-eligible population (VEP). In 2008 the VEP turnout was estimated at between 61.7 and 63 percent for president, with the variance resulting from different calculations of persons to include or exclude from the VAP. In 2004 the presidential rate was estimated between 60.1 and 60.6 percent. Both were notable improvements over the 2000 elections with a turnout rate of approximately 54 percent. (See Table 1-1, p. 6.)

Still, there are some basic constants about voter turnout. The proportion of those voting tends to increase with age, income, and education; whites tend to vote at a higher rate than minorities; and women vote at a somewhat higher rate than men.

TABLE 1-1 Growing Franchise in the United States, 1930–2008

Figures in this table are based on historical totals of voting-age citizens in the United States—the voting-age population. This number came under increased scrutiny as election analysts began excluding persons who are of legal voting age but ineligible to cast ballots, primarily because they are not U.S. citizens. When noncitizens are excluded, along with smaller numbers of individuals such as those in prison or mental institutions, voting participations percentages increase by one to three points. For this table, CQ Press editors have continued to use the traditional voting-age population concept because of the lack of accurate historical data. In addition, calculations by analysts often differ because of varying methodologies used in deciding which groups of individuals should be excluded from the voting-age table.

large and a small “d.” At first, the Democrats’ prime competition came from the ill-starred Whig Party, whose only two presidential victories (in 1840 and 1848) were followed by the death in office of the winner.

The Whigs dissolved in the political turmoil that preceded the Civil War, with the newly formed Republican Party filling the void. Rooted solely in the North and with opposition to the expansion of slavery into the territories as their primary cause, the Republicans made headway quickly, winning control of the House of Representatives in 1858, just four years after the party came into existence.

With regional fissures within the more broadly based Democratic Party turning into a chasm, Republicans captured the presidency and both houses of Congress in 1860. Democrats broke apart that year, with the northern and southern wings of the party each fielding a presidential ticket. The split enabled the GOP standard-bearer, Abraham Lincoln, to win the White House with less than 40 percent of the popular vote, the lowest winning percentage for any presidential candidate with the exception of the election of 1824.

Republicans were to dominate the political scene for the next seventy-two years—controlling the White House for fifty-six of those years, the Senate for sixty and the House for fifty. In the traumatic years in the wake of the Civil War, Republicans “waved the bloody shirt,” and offered the nation a succession of former officers in the Union Army as their presidential standard-bearers, beginning in 1868 with Ulysses S. Grant. As wartime memories faded, the GOP was able to tie together a winning coalition of urban and rural voters above the Mason-Dixon line, while the South remained solidly Democratic.

Democratic problems were compounded by their convention nominating rules. While Republicans nominated their presidential candidate by simple majority vote, Democrats until 1936 required a two-thirds majority. The result, on occasion, was a long, exhausting convention that ultimately nominated a colorless compromise candidate.

During the period from 1860 to 1932, the Republicans had only one convention that took more than twenty ballots to choose a nominee. This occurred in 1880 when the GOP took thirty-six ballots to nominate James A. Garfield. The Democrats had five conventions in that period requiring more than twenty ballots, culminating with the party’s 1924 conclave, which took 103 ballots to pick the little-known John W. Davis. Altogether, during this Republican era, GOP presidential candidates won a majority of the popular vote ten times, the Democrats only once and that in 1876, when Samuel J. Tilden lost by one electoral vote to Rutherford B. Hayes.

This era saw only two Democrats advance to the White House: Grover Cleveland, who won two nonconsecutive terms in the late nineteenth century, and Woodrow Wilson, who capitalized on the split within Republican ranks in 1912 between President William Howard Taft and former president Theodore Roosevelt. Both Cleveland and Wilson, however, were elected without a majority of the popular vote. Cleveland won in 1884 with 48.9 percent and in 1892 with 46.0 percent of the popular vote; Wilson was elected in 1912 with 42 percent and in 1916 with 49.2 percent. (See box, Electoral Anomalies, p. 8.)

Republicans rebounded strongly from the eight-years of Wilson’s presidency dominating both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue in the 1920s. The party was at its zenith at the beginning of 1929. Herbert Hoover had been elected president the previous November with 58 percent of the vote—the second-highest winning percentage up to that time in the nation’s history—and Republicans held roughly 60 percent of the seats in both the Senate and House.

Yet in the entrails of the 1928 election returns were early signs of changes to come in the party coalitions. In nominating Alfred E. Smith, the first Roman Catholic to head a major-party presidential ticket, Democrats temporarily lost much of their base in the South but made inroads among the burgeoning number of urban ethnic voters in the North, which proved lasting.

Smith was the first Democratic presidential candidate in the 1920s to win a state outside the South, carrying Massachusetts and Rhode Island. At the same time, voters in the nation’s most populous state, New York, elected Democrat Franklin D. Roosevelt as governor to succeed Smith.

With the stock market crash in October 1929 and the onset of the Great Depression, more dramatic changes in the political landscape came quickly. In the midterm election of 1930, Democrats won control of the House and pulled nearly even with the Republicans in the Senate.

DEMOCRATS TAKE CHARGE

In 1932 Democrats completed their breakthrough, easily capturing the White House and both houses of Congress. Roosevelt led the Democratic sweep, besting Hoover in all but six northeastern states, and his long coattails helped Democrats emerge with more than 70 percent of the seats in the House and more than 60 percent in the Senate.

Just as important were the next two elections that affirmed that 1932 was not a one-time anti-Republican vote but the start of a new political era in which the Democrats would dominate. Historically, the party occupying the White House has lost congressional seats in midterm elections, but in 1934 Democrats added to their hefty majorities in both the Senate and the House. In 1936 they gained even more seats, as FDR swept to a landslide reelection victory. Roosevelt carried all but two states, Maine and Vermont, securing 60.8 percent of the popular vote (second only to Lyndon B. Johnson’s 61.1 percent in 1964) and winning the electoral vote 523 to 8, the most lopsided margin in the nation’s history. Meanwhile, the Democrats emerged from the 1936 election with 333 seats in the House and 75 seats in the Senate, the most that either party has held in either chamber. At the state level, the Democratic success was equally broad, as their total of governorships soared to thirty-eight, compared with just seven for the Republicans (with the other three going to third parties or independents).

Put another way, the Republicans—who had dominated American politics since the Civil War—were about as close to extinction as any major party has been. They

ELECTORAL ANOMALIES

The American political system sometimes produces a result that deviates from what normally would be expected. One such anomaly is the phenomenon of minority presidents—the eighteen presidents elected through 2004 without receiving a majority of the popular vote. (See Table 8-3, p. 261.)

Four of those candidates actually lost the popular vote to their opponents and still won the presidency: John Quincy Adams in 1824; Rutherford B. Hayes in 1876; Benjamin Harrison in 1888; and George W. Bush in 2000.

In Adams's case, the election was thrown to the House of Representatives after he and three other candidates failed to gain the required majority of electoral college votes. Under the Twelfth Amendment, the House had to choose from among the three highest vote-getters. It chose Adams, who had run second to Andrew Jackson in both popular and electoral votes. The third contender, Treasury Secretary William H. Crawford, was paralyzed from a recent stroke. Speaker Henry Clay, who ran fourth and was therefore out of the running, helped swing the House vote to Adams.

Only one other presidential election was decided by the House. That was in 1800 when Thomas Jefferson and his intended vice president, Aaron Burr, tied in the electoral vote before the Twelfth Amendment required separate voting for president and vice president. The House chose Jefferson on the thirty-sixth ballot to succeed John Adams, father of John Quincy Adams, and Burr became vice president.

In 1876 Democrat Samuel J. Tilden outpolled Republican Hayes, but Tilden was one electoral vote short of a majority, with the nineteen electoral votes of three southern states in dispute. To resolve the crisis Congress set up a special fifteen-member commission, which decided all disputed votes in Hayes's favor, giving him a bare majority victory of 185 votes to Tilden's 184. Under a compromise that broke the impasse, Hayes agreed to remove federal troops from the South after he took office, ending the Reconstruction era that had bitterly divided the nation. Southern whites gained domination of Congress, and Republican industrial interests solidified a hold on presidential politics that lasted until Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected in 1932.

ELECTORAL VOTE EFFECT

All other instances of a president's being elected with less than a majority of the popular vote (including Harrison in 1888 and Bush in 2000) were attributable to the electoral college system, which tends to exaggerate narrow victories and permit a minority president to claim something of a mandate to enact the administration's legislative agenda.

In 1888 Republican Harrison trailed Democratic president Grover Cleveland in the popular vote, 48.6 percent to 47.8 percent, with other candidates sharing the 3.6 percent remainder. But by winning New York and other populous states of the North and West, Harrison took 58.1 percent of the electoral vote, a clear majority. Four years later the ousted Cleveland defeated Harrison to become the only president to serve two nonconsecutive terms.

In the election of 2000, Vice President Al Gore, the Democratic candidate, outpolled Republican George W. Bush by approximately 540,000 votes out of more than 105 million cast nationwide. The popular vote count was bitterly contested in Florida for a month following the election. Bush prevailed in Florida and in twenty-nine other states, winning 271 electoral votes; Gore carried twenty states and the District of Columbia, for 267 electoral votes. (Gore was officially credited with 266 electoral votes because a so-called faithless elector in the District of Columbia withheld her vote from Gore to protest the District's lack of voting representation in Congress.)

With his 49.2 percent popular vote reelection victory in 1996, Bill Clinton became only the third president in history to win two terms with less than half of the vote each time. (He won in 1992 with 43.0 percent.) The other two were Cleveland, 1884 and 1892, and Woodrow Wilson, in 1912 and 1916.

An electoral vote anomaly of another sort arose in 1872 when famed newspaper editor Horace Greeley, the Democratic/Liberal Republican presidential candidate, died after losing the election to Ulysses S. Grant. Electors from the six states he won divided their votes among other candidates. Three of the electors voted for Greeley anyway, but Congress did not recognize their votes.

In another unusual circumstance, Vice President James S. Sherman died shortly before the 1912 election that he and President William Howard Taft lost to Woodrow Wilson and Thomas R. Marshall. It was too late for Sherman's name to be changed on the ballots in every state, so his electoral votes went to his replacement, Nicholas Murray Butler.

staggered away from the election of 1936 with just 20 percent of the seats in the House of Representatives, 18 percent of those in the Senate, 15 percent of the nation's governorships, and just 2 percent of the electoral vote for president.

During the next decade, the Republicans would steadily gain ground while the Democrats lost it. The Democrats remained the nation's majority party for the next generation, however, because they were able to maintain the cornerstone of their new coalition, the South and the cities. The South, in particular, had a strong voice in the party's congressional leadership. Alben W. Barkley of Kentucky and Lyndon Johnson of Texas held the post of Senate majority leader for much of the 1940s and 1950s, while Sam Rayburn of Texas served as House speaker through much of the same period.

To be sure, Democratic dominance during this period was not monolithic. Republicans won both houses of Congress in the midterm election of 1946 and again in 1952, when Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower won the first of his two terms as president. Congressional Republicans were also able to frustrate more than one Democratic president during this period by joining with conservative Democrats, mainly from the South, to form a "conservative coalition" that prevailed on a number of issues.

Still, the Democrats' hegemony from 1932 to 1968 was about as solid as it had been for the Republicans during the

ODDITIES IN CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS

Congressional elections have produced a number of anomalies, particularly in the South, where slavery, the Civil War, Reconstruction, and racial antagonisms created special problems in the electoral process. The counting of slaves for the apportionment of House seats posed an especially difficult problem.

Under a compromise adopted in the Constitution (Article I, section 2) every five slaves would be counted as three persons. After the Civil War and the emancipation of slaves, the Fourteenth Amendment required that blacks be fully counted for apportionment purposes. On this basis, several Southern states tried to claim additional representation on readmission to the Union. Tennessee, for example, elected an extra U.S. representative in 1868, claiming that adding the full slave population entitled the state to nine instead of eight House members. Virginia and South Carolina followed suit. But the House refused to seat the additional representatives, requiring the states to wait for the regular reapportionment after the 1870 census for any changes in their representation.

A formula in the Fourteenth Amendment, designed to coerce southern states to accept black voting participation by reducing House seats wherever voting rights were abridged, never was implemented because of its complexity. Instead, the Republican-controlled House unseated Democrats from districts in former Confederate states where abuses of the right to vote were charged. Between 1881 and 1897, the House unseated eighteen Democrats on this basis.

Another anomaly, of a different sort, arose from the 1930 midterm election, when the beginning of the Great Depression threatened to end the Republicans' seventeen-year domination of the House. On election night in November it appeared that the Republicans had nevertheless retained the House by a narrow margin. The tally showed 218 Republicans elected, against 216 Democrats and one independent. But in those days, before the Twentieth Amendment moved up the convening date, thirteen months elapsed between the election and the convening of the new Congress. During that interval, an unusually large number of deaths (fourteen) occurred among the newly elected representatives.

In special elections to fill the vacancies, several had no effect on the political balance because the same party retained the seat. But in three cases

Republicans who died were replaced by Democrats, tipping the balance to the Democrats' favor in time for them to organize the new Congress in December 1931. A fourth Republican vacancy went to the Democrats in early 1932.

When the Seventy-second Congress convened on December 7, 1931, House Democrats held the edge, 219 to 215, with one independent. As the majority, they were able to elect as Speaker John Nance Garner of Texas. In 1932 Garner was elected as Franklin D. Roosevelt's first vice president.

Even without the special election gains, control of the House likely would have passed to the Democrats in 1931. Immediately after the 1930 general election, a group of Farm Belt Republicans announced that they would withhold their votes from veteran Speaker Nicholas Longworth of Ohio and allow the Democrats to organize the House, which they did. The vote for Garner as Speaker was 218 to 207, a margin greater than the three seats the Democrats gained during the preceding thirteen months.

The 1972 House election oddity resulted from the preelection disappearance of two House Democrats, Majority Leader Hale Boggs of Louisiana and Nick Begich of Alaska, during an Alaskan airplane trip. Despite their absence, both were reelected. Boggs's wife, Lindy, was elected to succeed him after he was declared legally dead in 1973. Begich was declared legally dead after the 1972 election, and a special election to replace him was held in 1973.

Similarly, a dead man was elected to the U.S. Senate for the first time in 2000. Running for a Senate seat, Democratic governor Mel Carnahan of Missouri was killed in an airplane crash three weeks before the November election. As it was too late for officials to remove his name from the ballot, Carnahan polled 50.5 percent of the vote to defeat Republican incumbent John Ashcroft. Although some in his party thought Ashcroft could make a strong case in challenging the result, Ashcroft did not. Democrat Roger B. Wilson, who succeeded to the office of Missouri governor, appointed Carnahan's widow, Jean, to the seat until a special election could be held in 2002. Alongside this Senate oddity was another unique occurrence in 2000: Hillary Rodham Clinton became the first first lady to win elective office when she captured a New York Senate seat.

previous era, except that it was just half as long. The Democrats held the White House for twenty-eight of the thirty-six years, and both the Senate and the House for thirty-two of them.

Unlike the previous GOP era, though, when Republicans were arguably strongest near its close, Democrats were most dominant at the beginning of their era—when Republicans were clearly identified as the “party of the Depression” and Democrats were associated with the activist, optimistic government of FDR's New Deal.

From 1940 through 1956, the Democratic share of the presidential vote declined each election. But it was the end of World War II, or perhaps more precisely, the death of Roosevelt in April 1945, that marked a transition from a strongly Democratic era to a more tenuous one.

Through the post-Depression years of the 1930s and the war effort in the early 1940s, FDR defined American politics. With his death, and the end of World War II several months later, the political playing field changed. The electorate began to grow more mobile, suburbs began to sprout, and voters began to show an increasing independence from the political machines and their interest group allies that held sway in the past. Neither party had a leader to loom over the political landscape as FDR did through his four presidential election victories.

The dominant mood that swept both sides of the Atlantic in the wake of World War II was a desire for change. In the British parliamentary elections of 1945, the Conservative government of Winston Churchill was thrown out of office. The following year, the Democrats lost both houses of Congress. It was also widely assumed that in 1948 the Democrats would lose the presidency as well. Roosevelt's successor, Harry S. Truman, had trouble persuading voters, and many in his party, that he was up to the job. The broad Democratic coalition that FDR patched together—from conservative white southerners on one hand, to urban ethnics, union members, and minority voters on the other—showed signs of coming apart.

Both the liberal and conservative wings of the Democratic Party fielded tickets of their own in 1948. On Truman's left was former vice president Henry A. Wallace (number two during FDR's third term), who led the Progressive Party. On Truman's right, South Carolina governor J. Strom Thurmond headed the States' Rights Party, informally called the Dixiecrats.

The rest is legend. Trailing Republican Thomas E. Dewey in the polls throughout much of the year and looking hopelessly beaten, Truman ran a spirited fall campaign that produced one of the greatest upsets in American political history. Truman carried twenty-eight states, rolling over the New York governor in every region except the Northeast, while the Thurmond and Wallace challenges were held in check. Thurmond carried four southern states, but Truman won the rest of the region. Wallace did not carry any states.

However, the Democrats' euphoria with Truman's comeback victory and the election of a Democratic Congress masked the fact that Truman had won with less than a majority of the popular vote (49.5 percent), a poorer showing than FDR in any of his four presidential election victories. The 1948 election was conducted against a backdrop of voter apathy; turnout was just 51 percent of the voting-age population, the lowest for any presidential election since the 1920s.

Four years later, Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower won the White House and helped the GOP win both houses of Congress as well. But it soon became apparent that Ike's was a personal, not a party, victory. In 1954 Democrats regained Congress, and two years later they added seats to their congressional majorities, even as Eisenhower was coasting to a landslide reelection victory.

POSTWAR POLITICS: KENNEDY AND NIXON

It was not Eisenhower—who had led the Allied troops during World War II—who defined American politics in the immediate postwar period, but two junior officers in the Navy, John F. Kennedy and Richard M. Nixon. They proved to be among the most ambitious and successful politicians of their generation.

Both won House seats in 1946: Democrat Kennedy in the Boston area; Republican Nixon in the fast-growing suburbs of southern California. Both won Senate seats in the early 1950s. Although Nixon was elected vice president in 1952, Kennedy also vaulted onto the national stage in 1956 with a nearly successful bid for the Democratic vice-presidential nomination.

The two faced each other in the presidential election of 1960 in a race that was close from beginning to end. Throughout, it had a special drama to it, particularly surrounding Kennedy. As vice president, Nixon had the air of a semi-incumbent and ran unopposed for the Republican nomination. Kennedy did not have that luxury, and as a Catholic, believed he had to demonstrate his electability in the scattered array of presidential primaries. He succeeded, culminating with a legendary victory over Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota in heavily Protestant West Virginia, which put Kennedy within reach of the nomination.

Two political campaign buttons of the 1930s promote Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Democratic Party as the remedy to the Great Depression. From the 1930s to the 1990s the Democrats were the congressional power.

Voter interest in the race, already high, was heightened that fall by a series of televised debates—the first ever between presidential nominees. On election day, 63 percent of the voting-age population turned out, the highest percentage in any presidential contest since World War I. The result was one of the closest presidential elections ever, with Kennedy winning by barely 100,000 votes out of nearly 70 million cast.

Critical to Kennedy's victory was the Democrats' urban base. His winning margin in New York City (New York), Philadelphia (Pennsylvania), Baltimore (Maryland), Detroit (Michigan), Chicago (Illinois), and St. Louis (Missouri), was larger than his victory margin in the state each was in. As Truman did twelve years earlier, Kennedy was able to win a large portion of the South.

The political environment of the 1960s, though, was buffeted by trauma and tragedy, starting with Kennedy's assassination in November 1963. The event created a sympathy vote of sorts for Kennedy's successor, Lyndon Johnson, who led a Democratic landslide the following year almost equal in scope to the party's sweeping win in 1936. Johnson defeated Republican senator Barry M. Goldwater of Arizona with a record 61.1 percent of the popular vote, and the Democrats emerged with 295 seats in the House and 68 in the Senate, their highest totals since the 1930s.

The Democratic landslide of 1964 was not nearly so total nor its effects so lasting as the one in 1936. Moderate Republicans—such as New York's Nelson A. Rockefeller, Pennsylvania's William W. Scranton, Michigan's George W. Romney, and Ohio's James A. Rhodes—still held a number of big-state governorships. While winning the Deep South, from Louisiana to South Carolina, Goldwater established a beachhead among conservative white southerners that Republican presidential candidates exploited in the following decades.

Instead of reviving the Democratic era, the election of 1964 was widely seen as the end of an era. Against the backdrop of an increasingly unpopular war in Southeast Asia and racial rioting in many of the nation's cities, Johnson launched a series of liberal and controversial programs that he called the "Great Society." In 1966 Republicans gained forty-seven seats in the House and three in the Senate. Two years later, they won the presidency.

SPLIT-LEVEL REALIGNMENT

The election of 1968 proved to be one of those rare elections, reminiscent of 1860 and 1932, that realigned American politics for the much of the next forty years. However, instead of producing a top-down realignment seen at all levels of government, the 1968 election brought about a split-level realignment, with Republicans dominating presidential contests, but Democrats retaining the upper hand in Congress for much of the period.

The political environment in 1968 was highly volatile. Not only was there war abroad and racial rioting at home, but violence affected the presidential campaign as well. Civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated in April 1968. Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York, a brother of the late president and a leading candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, was killed two months later after winning the California primary.

That August, Vice President Humphrey was nominated by the Democratic convention in Chicago, as thousands of protestors took to the streets to oppose both the Vietnam War and the lack of openness in the party's nominating process. Humphrey had not competed that spring in a single primary state, but, backed by the party establishment, he was nominated on the first ballot. Down in the polls and with the Democrats divided, Humphrey rallied in the fall but still fell roughly 500,000 votes short of Republican Nixon, with nearly ten million votes going to third-party candidate George Wallace. Nixon and Wallace emphasized law and order, though, with Wallace also touting states' rights.

Nixon won only 43 percent of the popular vote yet carried thirty-two states. The focus of political transition was in the South, where Nixon won seven states, Wallace carried five, and Humphrey, just one (LBJ's home state of Texas). It was by far the fewest number of southern states that any Democratic presidential nominee had carried since the Civil War.

For the rest of the century and into the first decade of the next, the South became the cornerstone of the Republican presidential coalition. Through the 1970s and 1980s, the GOP also dominated presidential voting in the burgeoning suburbs and much of rural America, which helped give the party five victories in a twenty-year span. The lone Democratic winner in this period was Jimmy Carter, who in the wake of the Watergate scandal that forced Nixon's resignation from office in 1974, won by a margin of only 2 percentage points two years later.

The rest of the century Republican presidential candidates won by huge margins. Nixon in 1972, Ronald Reagan in 1980 and 1984, and George H. W. Bush in 1988 each carried at least forty states, with Nixon and Reagan sweeping forty-nine in their landslide reelection victories. So dominant had the GOP become at the presidential level that by the late 1980s there was talk of a Republican "lock" on the electoral college.

In the wake of the GOP's presidential victory in 1968, many political observers assumed that it would not be long before the party dominated at other levels as well. Population trends seemingly were in their favor—with the ongoing movement from the cities to the suburbs, and from the Frost Belt of the Midwest and eastern states to the Sun Belt of the South and Southwest. The Democratic behemoths of the New Deal days—industrial states from Massachusetts to Illinois—were rapidly losing both voters and congressional seats to Republican-trending states in the booming region from Florida to California.

Yet Democrats continued to control Congress as well as most of the nation's statehouses. With an assist from Reagan's coattails, Republicans would win the Senate in 1980 for a six-year span, but would not take both houses of Congress until 1994, by which time Democrat Bill Clinton was in the White House in the only other victory by his party until 2008. Democrats also held a majority of the nation's governorships for virtually the entire period from 1968 to 1994; the GOP gained ground after that but politics in the states remained competitive.

In previous eras a party's congressional strength often ebbed and flowed with the fortunes of its presidential candidates. After 1968, however, the link between the two was conspicuously weaker. Presidential coattails shortened almost to the point of nonexistence, and congressional politics entered what might be considered a "dead ball" era.

Big partisan swings in Congress became fewer and farther between. From 1932 until 1968, for instance, there were seven elections in which there was a swing of at least forty House seats from one party to the other. Between 1968 and 2008 there were only two such elections—the post-Watergate contest of 1974, in which the Democrats added to their already hefty majorities, and 1994, when the GOP gained control of the House for the first time in forty years.

Altogether, from 1968 until 2008, one party controlled both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue for just ten of the forty years—the four years of the Carter administration in the late 1970s, the first two years of the Clinton administration in the early 1990s, and four years of George W. Bush's administration following 2000. For eighteen years, there was a Republican president and a Democratic Congress; for six years, a Democratic president and a Republican Congress. The other six years, there was a Republican president and Senate, but a Democratic House.

"Divided government" described the unique new political arrangement. It was attributable, in part, to changes in the country—namely, an increasingly independent electorate of voters willing to split their tickets. It was also attributable, in part, to changes in the system—with incumbents increasingly able to raise huge sums of money independent of declining party organizations, money that was often plowed into expensive media advertising campaigns that deterred significant competition.

In part, some say, it was attributable to attitudinal differences between the parties, with the Democrats' more positive attitude toward government enabling the party to find more attractive candidates than the GOP. In part, it was also attributable to simple bad luck that befell each party. Republican efforts to complete a top-down realignment were first stalled in the mid-1970s by the Watergate crisis that forced Nixon from office, in the early 1980s after Reagan's election, by a severe recession, and after 2000, following Bush's election, by increasing public disapproval of a war in Iraq launched by the president in 2003.

Meanwhile, Democrats were hindered by a series of divisive presidential nominating contests in the 1970s and 1980s that left their nominees in a weakened condition, with Democratic congressional candidates keeping their distance from the national ticket. The infighting in Democratic primary campaigns was a product of dramatic changes in their presidential nominating process. After the tumultuous convention in Chicago in 1968, party rules were rewritten to shift control from a cadre of Democratic leaders and elected officials to grassroots voters.

The result was a dramatic growth in presidential primaries, first spread across the calendar from midwinter to late spring, then increasingly concentrated in February and March. By the 2008 campaign the primary season had shifted even more into January for a few states and early February for many more. Growing from fifteen in 1968 to forty-one primaries in 2008 in states with electoral votes, the primaries quickly became the preeminent part of the presidential nominating process for both parties. (See Chapter 10.)

The 2008 primary season was the most remarkable of all. Although the Republican candidate, Sen. John McCain, locked up his nomination early, the Democratic contest—featuring senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Barack Obama—carried through the winter and spring before being settled conclusively with Obama the winner.

No candidate since Humphrey in 1968 has been nominated without first competing in the primaries, and no candidate since Democrat George McGovern in 1972 has been nominated without winning the most primary votes. In the process, the party's summertime convention has been reduced to little more than a giant, made-for-TV pep rally for the party faithful.

Still, the number of voters casting ballots in the presidential primaries has rarely been more than one-third of those participating in the fall election. Like so much else in America's electoral history, 2008 was a remarkable exception. More than 57 million votes were cast in the primaries of the two major parties. No other primary season had come close to the 2008 record. (See Table 10-1, p. 363.)

THE ERA OF CLOSENESS

For nearly a quarter century after 1968, the basic norm had been a Republican president and a Democratic Congress. In the early 1990s, however, the political equation reversed. Since Kennedy, every Democrat that had won the presidency has been from the South. In 1992 Democrats captured the White House with an all-southern ticket led by Arkansas governor Bill Clinton with Tennessee senator Al Gore as his running mate. The Democratic ticket consciously positioned itself near the political center.

Meanwhile, President George H.W. Bush was bedeviled on several fronts. His success a year earlier in the Persian Gulf War—where the United States led a coalition of twenty-eight nations in turning back an Iraqi invasion of neighboring Kuwait—was overshadowed by the widespread perception of recession in 1992. Conservative Republicans were restive, upset by a tax hike in the middle of his administration. Texas billionaire H. Ross Perot also mounted a well-financed Independent candidacy that aimed much of its fire at Bush and the Republicans.

Clinton won with just 43 percent of the popular vote but still scored the most sweeping Democratic presidential victory since 1964. He carried thirty-two states, making deep inroads into the suburbs and even rural America. In addition, Democratic majorities in both the Senate and the House accompanied him to Washington.

Yet there were signs in the 1992 vote that the long era of Democratic dominance on Capitol Hill was waning. In the congressional primaries that spring and summer, a post-war record nineteen incumbents were beaten, fourteen of them Democrats. That fall Democrats lost ten more House seats.

The first two years of the Clinton administration, culminating with an ill-starred attempt to overhaul the national health care system, left the Democrats even more vulnerable. Republicans in 1994 took advantage of that vulnerability with their promises for government reform outlined in a document called the “Contract with America.” Republicans gained fifty-two seats in the House and eight in the Senate, to win both houses of Congress for the first time since 1952. The GOP posted gains in all parts of the country in 1994, gaining six House seats in Washington state alone, where one of the Democratic casualties was House Speaker Thomas S. Foley. In addition, the number of Republican governors jumped to thirty, the party’s highest total in a quarter century.

Yet it was the South, already the cornerstone of the Republican presidential coalition, that was the centerpiece of the party’s landslide in 1994. The combination of anti-Clinton sentiment, a plethora of Democratic retirements, and favorable congressional redistricting that eliminated a number of racially marginal Democratic districts finally enabled the Republicans to capture dozens of districts across the South that had been voting Democratic for president for decades.

Just as it had been for the Democrats, the South quickly became the GOP’s prime building block, both at the presidential and congressional levels. It has not only provided Republicans since 1994 with more congressional seats than any other region, but also many of their leading voices on Capitol Hill, including Newt Gingrich of Georgia (House Speaker from 1995 through 1998), Trent Lott of Mississippi (Senate majority leader from 1996 until June 2001), Richard K. Armey of Texas (House majority leader from 1995 to 2003), Bill Frist of Tennessee (Senate majority leader from 2003 to 2006), and Thomas DeLay (House majority leader from 2003 to 2005). In 2000 the South was crucial to the election of Republican governor George W. Bush of Texas as president. He swept all 163 of the region’s electoral votes, 60 percent of his nationwide total.

Yet in the closing years of the twentieth century, neither party was able to expand its beachhead into dominance of the political process. The new Republican majority in Congress, led by Gingrich, was widely seen as overplaying its hand, and it steadily lost seats in the elections following 1994. President Clinton, after winning an easy reelection victory in 1996, was impeached in 1998 for lying about his relationship with a White House intern, a personal embarrassment that also discomfited his Democratic allies.

As a result, American politics at the end of the twentieth century grew closer and closer at all levels, culminating in the election of 2000, which became an instant classic because of its almost-impossible-to-resolve closeness. For the first time since 1888, there were different winners in the electoral vote (Republican George W. Bush) and the popular vote (Democrat Al Gore). Bush’s margin of five in the electoral vote was the closest since 1876; Gore’s margin of barely 500,000 votes in the popular vote was the closest since 1968.

The closeness of the election led to a historic intervention by the U.S. Supreme Court, which by a 5–4 margin halted the recount in Florida, where the national electoral college outcome hung in the balance. The Court’s ruling that the manual recount violated voters’ civil rights left an uncertain legacy for the U.S. electoral process. (See “Cliff-hanger Election: 2000,” p. 344.)

The 50–50 Senate tie that resulted from the 2000 election was the first partisan tie in the upper chamber since the election of 1880. The postelection breakdown in the House of 221 Republicans, 212 Democrats, and 2 Independents was the closest disparity between the two parties in the lower chamber since 1952.

The 2002 and 2004 elections, although retaining the narrow majorities characteristic of the late twentieth century, saw a strengthening of the Republican hold on the federal government. In an unusual midterm feat for a party controlling the White House, Republicans picked up seats in both the House and Senate in the 2002 contests, winning control of the Senate (which had reverted to Democratic hands in mid-2001) in the process. In 2004 Bush won reelection and his party again gained seats in both houses of Congress.

That GOP hold began to crumble in the 2006 elections when Democrats recaptured both the Senate and House, although by a narrow margin in the Senate. Republicans were burdened by an unpopular war in Iraq, numerous Republican scandals in Congress, and the rapidly falling popularity of their president.

The 2006 election was prelude to 2008. In that historic election Democrats retained control of Congress, significantly increasing their margins in both chambers. In a landmark event, Barack Obama, an African American, won the presidential race, winning nearly 53 percent of the popular vote and 365 electoral votes to 173 for his opponent, Sen. John McCain. Although Obama's win was not on the landslide scale of Roosevelt or Johnson, many considered it substantial enough to give the new president a legitimate mandate for a different approach to national and international issues than had prevailed under his predecessor.

A TALE OF TWO NATIONS

Geographically, the vote in the dramatic 2000 election divided the nation into two distinct sectors—a Republican-oriented “L-shaped” sector that included the South, the Plains, and the Mountain states plus Alaska; and a Democratic-oriented bicoastal, industrial heartland sector that was composed of the Northeast, the industrial Midwest, and the Pacific Coast states plus Hawaii. That pattern held in the 2004 election, where few states changed from Republican “red” to Democratic “blue” or vice versa: New Hampshire went Democratic in 2004, giving the Democrats a sweep in the Northeast, while Iowa and New Mexico went Republican.

The Republican “L” was much more rural and geographically expansive, though it did include the heart of the fast-growing Sun Belt. The Democratic bicoastal-industrial sector was more urban and generally slower growing.

In 2008 the “L” remained, but in a battered form as Obama picked up a number of states in the grouping that previously were solidly Republican. Democratic candidates for the House and Senate also scored gains in the “L” states, as well as elsewhere. Over the previous eight years the nation had moved from a nearly even split between the parties after 2000, to a decidedly Republican-leaning posture after 2004, and then to a landscape after the 2006 midterm voting and the 2008 national election that favored the Democrats. Whether that orientation would last was expected to depend on how well the newly empowered Democrats dealt with the vast issues facing the United States in 2008, including a financial crisis as severe as any since the 1930s and challenging international conflicts. Many analysts after the 2008 election theorized that if Obama and his party did well against these issues, the Democrats had the opportunity to produce a political realignment as sweeping as those that defined earlier eras.

The “L” alignment had been in the making in presidential elections for several decades. From 1968 through 1988, Republicans often won the White House by dominating the “L” so conclusively that they were free to roam at will for votes in the Democrats’ domain. In the 1990s Clinton reversed the equation, showing such strong appeal in the bicoastal-industrial midlands that he was free to make forays into the “L,” ultimately making the Republican base look like a piece of Swiss cheese.

For many years, the disparity between the two sectors was merely a phenomenon of presidential elections, because Democrats dominated congressional voting across the country. That changed in 1994 when the Republican tidal wave that swept the GOP into control on Capitol Hill came rolling out of the “L.” In 1996 Republicans won the presidential and congressional voting within the “L” (albeit the former quite narrowly), while Democrats held the edge in presidential and congressional voting outside the “L” (with the advantage quite large in balloting for the White House).

It was the 2000 election, however, that marked a full coming of age for this “tale of two nations.” The “L” was decisively Republican; the rest of the country decisively Democratic. Bush swept all but one state in the “L” (narrowly losing New Mexico—although this area became a complete sweep for Bush in 2004 with his New Mexico victory). Gore, the Democratic candidate, won nineteen of twenty-four states in the bicoastal-industrial midlands. Bush enjoyed a huge electoral-vote lead of 218 to 5 in the Republican sector of the country. Gore posted an advantage of a 261 to 53 in the Democratic sector (with the one “faithless” Democratic elector from the District of Columbia). Bush won the South, Plains states, and Mountain West by a margin of 5.3 million in the popular vote. Gore won the Northeast, industrial Midwest, and Pacific West by more than 5.8 million votes. Congressional election results followed the same overall geographic trend.

The 2004 elections, with its outcome so similar to that of 2000, only confirmed the idea of the two-nation America. In the months leading up to the 2004 contest, the airwaves and newspapers were filled with talk of “red-state” and “blue-state” America; the presidential campaign was fought primarily in the dozen or so states viewed as “purple,” or competitive.

The fundamental features of this national configuration did not entirely reverse in 2008, but there were enough changes to at least increase the future likelihood of more competitive states. Obama won the popular vote by a margin of 7 percentage points, less than a half dozen other presidents but still a clear-cut victory. He won by 9.5 million votes, the widest of any nonincumbent presidential candidate in history. It came about because the Democrats were so solidly in command on the coasts outside the “L” that Obama was free to campaign seriously in states that the party had previously conceded to the GOP. Obama won all the nineteen states that Sen. John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, had won plus nine others that had supported Bush including Florida, North Carolina, and Virginia (all historically GOP southern states); Indiana, Iowa, and Ohio (in the Midwest); and Colorado, Nevada, and New Mexico (in the West). Essentially, the Obama effort flipped the earlier “L” pattern that allowed Bush, secure in that area, to contest Democratic states.

The Democratic victory was all the more impressive because it brought into Congress an enlarged majority (a gain of eight Senate seats and a net gain of twenty-one House seats) that was more attuned to the national Democratic Party than in any recent time. In the Northeast, the single remaining Republican was defeated. Notably, the party’s southern wing was a shadow of its former self. By 2008 southern Democrats were becoming fewer and fewer, removing from the political picture an array of politicians, many in powerful congressional positions, who would not hesitate to join with Republicans in a “conservative coalition” against Democratic proposals. By 2000 that coalition was extinct. By 2008 southern Democrats still in office were only 10 percent of the party’s Senate membership and less than a quarter in the House. When Clinton won his first term as president in 1992, more than a quarter of all Senate Democrats and nearly a third of House Democrats hailed from the South. This diminution of the southern influence presented the prospect of a more united party behind the President Obama.

HISTORIC MILESTONES IN U.S. ELECTIONS

The following chronology lists the historic events in more than 210 years of U.S. elections.

1787

The “Great Compromise” at the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia pacifies the smaller states by giving each state two senators and a House delegation based on population, assuring even the smallest state at least three votes in Congress (and in the electoral college). Senators are to be elected by the state legislatures (changed in 1913 to popular vote election by the Seventeenth Amendment) for six-year terms. Representatives are to be popularly elected to two-year terms.

1789

George Washington wins the first U.S. presidential election on February 4. The election is tantamount to unanimous as Washington receives the maximum possible number of electoral votes, sixty-nine. John Adams, second with thirty-four votes, wins the vice presidency. Washington is inaugurated on April 30 in New York City.

1800

Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr tie in electoral votes for the presidency. The election devolves to the House of Representatives, which elects Jefferson. The unforeseen possibility of a tie vote leads to adoption of the Twelfth Amendment to the Constitution (1804), requiring separate electoral college voting for president and vice president.

1807

Jefferson formalizes Washington’s two-term precedent for presidents by declining to run a third time. Jefferson sets forth his reasons in a December 10 letter to the Vermont state legislature, which had asked him to run for a third term. Seven other states sent similar letters.

1824

“King Caucus” dies, ending the decades-long system of presidential candidate selection by congressional party caucuses. State legislatures nominate four candidates representing different factions of the Democratic-Republican Party. Andrew Jackson of Tennessee wins the popular vote but falls short of the required electoral vote majority, throwing the election to the House for the second time in U.S. history. The House elects John Quincy Adams of Massachusetts, who placed second in both the electoral and popular vote. Jackson’s loss leads to his election in 1828 and formation of the present-day Democratic Party.

The first national party conventions are held in Baltimore. The Anti-Masons nominate William Wirt in September and the National Republicans nominate Henry Clay in December. Both lose to President Jackson in 1832.

1832

The Democrats hold their first national convention, also in Baltimore, and adopt a two-thirds rule for presidential nomination. Jackson is nominated for reelection by the required two-thirds majority vote.

1837

For the first and only time, the Senate decides a vice-presidential election as the Constitution provides. Democrat Martin Van Buren’s running mate, Richard M. Johnson, falls one vote short of the required majority because Virginia electors object to his moral character. The Senate nevertheless votes along party lines (33–16) to elect Johnson.

1840

Van Buren and Johnson become the first sitting president and vice president defeated for reelection. They lose to Whigs William Henry Harrison and John Tyler. Harrison dies April 4, 1841, after just one month in office, and Tyler establishes the precedent for the vice president’s becoming president rather than just the “acting president.”

The Democrats nominate the first “dark-horse” presidential candidate, James K. Polk, who wins the election.

1854

Antislavery sympathizers opposed to the expansion of slavery into the western territories gather at Ripon, Wisconsin, and form the Republican Party. With the Whigs torn over the slavery issue, the Republicans soon emerge as the Democrats’ counterpart in the nation’s two-party system.

1856

Democrat Franklin Pierce becomes the only elected president denied renomination by his party. He had alienated fellow northerners by signing legislation that made the Kansas territory a bloody battleground over the slavery issue. James Buchanan wins the nomination and the presidency.

1860

The new Republican Party elects its first president, Abraham Lincoln, and the divided nation advances toward Civil War. The election is the last in which at least one state (South Carolina) has no popular voting for president. (South Carolina allows popular voting after the war, when it and other former Confederate states resume participation in presidential elections.)

1865

President Lincoln is assassinated six weeks after beginning his second term. He dies on April 15 after being shot the night before by John Wilkes Booth. Vice President Andrew Johnson succeeds to the presidency and immediately comes in conflict with the radical northern Republicans who plan harsh postwar treatment of the rebel states. The Radical Republicans gain control of Congress in the 1866 midterm elections and later impeach Johnson, who narrowly escapes conviction.

The Fifteenth Amendment, enfranchising newly freed slaves, is ratified on February 3. The first blacks are elected to Congress: Republican Hiram R. Revels of Mississippi serves in the Senate from 1870 to 1871. Mississippi Republican Blanche K. Bruce is elected to the Senate in 1874 and is the first black member to serve a full term in that chamber.

The donkey and elephant emerge as symbols of the Democratic and Republican parties after drawings by Thomas Nast. They are important as guides to illiterate and semiliterate voters and are a boon to editorial cartoonists.

1876

A special commission decides a contested presidential election for the first and only time. Democrat Samuel J. Tilden wins the popular vote against Republican Rutherford B. Hayes, but the electoral vote outcome hangs on a single vote, with votes of three southern states in dispute. Congress appoints a commission that reaches a compromise on March 2, 1877, and awards the vote to Hayes, 185–184, in return for his pledge to remove federal troops from the South.

Romualdo Pacheco, California Republican, is the first Hispanic elected to Congress.

On July 2, near the beginning of his term, President James A. Garfield is shot by Charles J. Guiteau in Washington, D.C. The bullet lodges near Garfield's spine, and he dies on September 19. He is succeeded by Vice President Chester A. Arthur, who fails to win the Republican nomination in 1884.

1887

Congress enacts the Electoral Count Act, which charges states with resolving future electoral vote disputes similar to the one that followed the Tilden-Hayes contest in 1876.

Benjamin Harrison becomes the third president elected without winning the popular vote. He defeats incumbent Democrat Grover Cleveland with 233 electoral votes to Cleveland's 168.

A mechanical voting machine built by Jacob H. Myers is used for the first time at Lockport, New York. Inventor Thomas A. Edison had received his first patent for a similar machine twenty-three years earlier.

The first presidential primary law is passed in Florida. The primary gets its biggest impetus when the 1904 Republican convention refuses seating to backers of Wisconsin governor Robert M. La Follette, leader of the party's Progressive wing. In 1905 La Follette successfully promotes legislation in his state that provides for primary election of delegates to national party conventions.

Six months after his inauguration, President William McKinley is shot in Buffalo, New York, by Leon Czolgosz, an anarchist disturbed by social injustice. The president dies a week later, on September 14, and is succeeded by Vice President Theodore Roosevelt. In 1904 Roosevelt is elected to a full four-year term.

Former president Theodore Roosevelt deserts the Republican Party to run on his own Progressive "Bull Moose" ticket. He attains the highest third-party vote in history, but the GOP split helps to elect Democrat Woodrow Wilson.

1913

Popular election of senators becomes the norm when the Seventeenth Amendment is ratified, replacing election by state legislatures. Some states instituted popular election of senators before it became mandatory, beginning with the 1914 midterm elections.

1916

The first woman, Jeannette Rankin, Montana Republican, is elected to the U.S. House, four years before the Nineteenth

The first woman to serve in Congress, Jeannette Rankin entered Congress in 1917, four years before ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment guaranteeing women the right to vote.

Amendment ensures women's suffrage in all states. During her two terms (1917–1919 and 1941–1943) Rankin becomes the only member of Congress to vote against both World Wars.

Socialist Party leader Eugene V. Debs is sentenced to ten years in prison for his antiwar statements. He nevertheless receives almost a million votes in 1920, his last election. President Warren G. Harding frees him in 1921.

1920

The Nineteenth Amendment, giving full voting rights to women, is ratified on August 26. Some states allowed women to vote as early as 1890 (Wyoming).

Harding dies in office August 2. Calvin Coolidge becomes president.

1924

The first women governors are elected: Miriam "Ma" Ferguson in Texas and Nellie Tayloe Ross in Wyoming. Both succeed their husbands.

1928

The first Roman Catholic, New York governor Alfred E. Smith, is nominated for president on a major party ticket (Democratic). The urbanite Smith favors repeal of Prohibition, opposes the Ku Klux Klan, and is an unabashed liberal—all considered "alien traits" by much of the still rural, dry United States. He loses to Republican Herbert C. Hoover.

1932

In Chicago, Democrat Franklin D. Roosevelt becomes the first major party candidate to accept the presidential nomination in person. He promises a “new deal” for the American people. The Democrats win control of the White House and Congress as the nation battles the Great Depression, the worst in U.S. history. Roosevelt’s first three and a half months in office produce an unprecedented flood of economic legislation and establish the “hundred-day” yardstick for measuring the initial success of future presidents.

The second session of the Seventy-third Congress meets for the first time on January 3 in accordance with the Twentieth Amendment (the so-called Lame Duck Amendment) to the Constitution. The amendment, ratified in 1933, also fixes January 20 as the beginning of each four-year presidential term, effective in 1937.

1936

At their convention, Democrats abolish the two-thirds majority rule for presidential or vice-presidential nomination, which previously resulted in protracted balloting. The South objects because the rule gives the region virtual veto power over any nominee. To make up for the loss, the South is given more votes at later conventions.

President Roosevelt breaks the traditional two-term limit for presidents when he is elected for a third term. His popular margin of victory narrows from four years earlier, however, in part because some voters object to his disregard of the unwritten “no-third-term” rule.

The Republicans hold the first televised national convention, in Philadelphia.

The Supreme Court in Smith v. Allwright outlaws so-called white primaries. Previously, political parties as “private” organizations, particularly in the South, were permitted to exclude blacks from membership and participation.

Roosevelt dies in office April 12 and is succeeded by Harry S. Truman.

The Twenty-second Amendment, setting a two-term limit for presidents, is ratified February 27. The law excludes Truman, who became president in 1945 on Roosevelt’s death and was elected in his own right in 1948, but Truman declines to seek another full term in 1952.

In danger of being dumped as Dwight D. Eisenhower’s running mate for ethical lapses, Richard Nixon saves himself with an emotional address to the nation September 23. It becomes known as the “Checkers speech” because Nixon refers to a little gift dog he refuses to give up.

Strom Thurmond of South Carolina becomes the only senator ever elected by write-in vote.

Hiram L. Fong, Hawaii Republican, is elected senator, making him the first Asian American member of Congress.

The first debate between presidential candidates, Democrat John F. Kennedy and Republican Nixon, is televised in Chicago on September 26. The 1960 general election is the first in which television is the dominant national news medium. With a narrow victory over Nixon, Kennedy becomes the first Catholic president.

Ratification of the Twenty-third Amendment on March 29 gives District of Columbia residents the right to vote in presidential elections.

The Supreme Court in Baker v. Carr permits federal court suits to require reapportionment and redistricting of state legislative districts that violate the principle of one person, one vote. The Court later extends the requirement to congressional districts.

Gray v. Sanders, the first major one-person, one-vote Supreme Court decision, is handed down on March 18. The Court rules that Georgia’s “county unit” system of electing officers to state posts violates the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment by giving more weight to the votes of persons in rural counties than in urban counties.

President Kennedy is assassinated by Lee Harvey Oswald in Dallas, Texas, on November 22. He is succeeded by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson, a former Senate majority leader who wins approval of much of Kennedy’s “New Frontier” legislative program.

The Twenty-fourth Amendment is ratified on February 4, abolishing the poll tax as a requisite to voting in primary or general elections for president and other federal officials. The controversial tax had often been a bar to voting, especially among poor blacks.

The Wesberry v. Sanders decision is handed down by the Supreme Court on February 17, extending the one-person, one-vote doctrine to congressional districts. The Court rules that substantial disparity in a state's district populations results in unequal representation in the U.S. House. Congressional districts should be as nearly equal in population "as is practicable."

1964

President Johnson scores the largest popular vote landslide in history, taking 61.1 percent of the vote to Barry Goldwater's 38.5 percent. LBJ's margin surpasses Franklin Roosevelt's 60.8 percent victory over Alfred M. Landon's 36.5 percent in 1936.

1964–1965

Congress passes the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which prohibits discrimination in employment, public accommodations, and federally funded programs. Passage helps pave the way for the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which provides protections for African Americans wishing to vote.

1967

The Twenty-fifth Amendment, ratified February 10, sets procedure in case of presidential disability or vacancy in the office of vice president.

1968

Urban riots break out in response to the April assassination of civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. in Memphis.

Widespread opposition to the Vietnam War prompts President Johnson to decline renomination. Robert F. Kennedy, a leading candidate for the nomination, is assassinated in Los Angeles by Sirhan Sirhan in June. Riotous protests against the candidacy of Johnson's handpicked successor, Hubert H. Humphrey, mar the Democratic convention at Chicago and the party split helps to elect Republican Nixon. At their convention the Democrats drop the controversial unit rule allowing convention delegations to vote as a whole despite minority objections. (The Republican Party never used the unit rule.)

In 1968 congressional elections, New York Democrat Shirley Chisholm becomes the first African American woman elected to the U.S. House.

1969

Powell v. McCormack, the landmark Supreme Court decision handed down on June 16, prohibits the House of Representatives from adding to the constitutional qualifications for House membership. The Court rules that the House lacked the authority to exclude a duly elected representative who met the constitutional qualifications of age, residence, and citizenship. The decision reinstates Adam Clayton Powell, New York Democrat, who was excluded for misconduct and misuse of public funds.

1971

The Twenty-sixth Amendment lowers the voting age to eighteen nationally. Ratification takes only 107 days, less than half the time required for any other constitutional amendment. It is spurred by an unusually large number of young people in the population, together with the Vietnam War, where eighteen-year-olds can be conscripted into the army.

Congress passes the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971, which creates the Federal Election Commission (FEC), limits spending for political advertising by candidates for federal office, and requires full disclosure of campaign contributions and expenditures. Major amendments are enacted in 1974 and 1976. In 1976 the spending limits are found unconstitutional except for presidential candidates who accept public financing of their campaigns.

1972

Alabama governor George C. Wallace is shot May 15 at a Laurel, Maryland, shopping center while campaigning for the Democratic presidential nomination. Partially paralyzed, he withdraws as a candidate.

President Nixon easily wins the election that culminates in the first presidential resignation. A preelection burglary at the Democratic National Committee headquarters in Washington's Watergate Hotel is traced to Republican operatives. Investigation discloses Nixon's active role in the subsequent attempted cover-up.

The Democrats adopt McGovern-Fraser Commission proposals opening the party to more participation by women and minorities. The commission's guidelines are designed to counteract rules and practices that inhibited access to the states' delegate-selection process or diluted the influence of those who had access.

Vice President Spiro T. Agnew resigns his office on October 10 as part of a plea bargain with federal prosecutors. Agnew faced trial on corruption charges from his years as governor of Maryland. In the first use of the Twenty-fifth Amendment (1967) to fill a vacancy in the vice presidency, President Nixon nominates Gerald R. Ford, who wins confirmation by Congress.

1974

Facing near-certain impeachment in the Watergate scandal, President Nixon resigns August 9 and is succeeded by Vice President Ford. Ford is the first president to take office without being elected by the electoral college as vice president or president.

In Buckley v. Valeo, the Supreme Court sanctions public financing of presidential elections but bars spending limits for candidates who reject federal funding.

The first debate of vice-presidential candidates, Democrat Walter F. Mondale and Republican Robert J. “Bob” Dole, is televised October 15 in Houston, Texas.

The Iranian hostage crisis that plagued the presidency of Jimmy Carter ends January 20 when the Americans held hostage for 444 days are freed as Ronald Reagan becomes president. Reagan is wounded in an assassination attempt March 30 outside a Washington hotel.

1984

Democratic presidential nominee Mondale chooses Geraldine Ferraro of New York as his running mate. Ferraro, a three-term House member, becomes the first woman nominated on a major party presidential ticket.

1988

Republican George H.W. Bush defeats Democrat Michael S. Dukakis to become the first sitting vice president since Martin Van Buren (in 1836) to win the presidency.

Virginia elects the first African American governor, L. Douglas Wilder, Democrat.

1990

Electing Democrat Joan Finney as governor, Kansas becomes the first state to have a woman governor, senator (Nancy Landon Kassebaum, Republican), and House member (Jan Meyers, Republican) at the same time.

Bush, also like Van Buren, is defeated after a single term in office. Texas billionaire H. Ross Perot mounts the strongest-ever individual presidential campaign and receives 18.9 percent of the popular vote as an Independent. Perot’s candidacy splits the GOP vote. Democrat Bill Clinton is elected despite accusations of infidelity during his years as governor of Arkansas.

Carol Moseley Braun of Illinois wins election as the first black woman U.S. senator. California becomes the first state to have two woman senators, Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein.

In a midterm setback to the Democratic administration of President Bill Clinton, the Republican Party wins control of both chambers of Congress for the first time in forty years. The House GOP strategy engineered by Newt Gingrich of Georgia centers on his proposed “Contract with America.” The House elects Gingrich as Speaker.

Ruling in an Arkansas case, U.S. Term Limits Inc. v. Thornton, the Supreme Court on May 22 strikes down state attempts to impose term limits on House and Senate members. Only a constitutional amendment can change the qualifications for service in Congress, the Court rules.

President Clinton is the first Democrat elected to a second full term since Franklin Roosevelt in 1936. Newt Gingrich of Georgia is the first Republican reelected as Speaker of the House in sixty-eight years.

The election results are subtly historic. Only ten years out of 140 has the country had a Democratic president and Republican Congress. The election also clearly establishes the South as the GOP’s new bastion. With the Plains and Rocky Mountain states, half the country is strongly Republican. The other half, made up of the Northeast, Midwest, and Pacific Coast states, is strongly Democratic. In 1996 some states, notably Oregon, conduct the first experiments with elections by mail, other than those associated with absentee voting.

The nation is stunned in January by revelation of a sex scandal that threatens the Clinton presidency. Clinton is accused of having an affair in 1995–1997 with a twenty-one-year-old White House intern. Clinton at first denies the allegations, both to the news media and under oath in court depositions, then later admits to having the affair. After receiving independent counsel Kenneth W. Starr’s report to Congress the House impeaches Clinton December 19 on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice.

With Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist presiding, the Senate, largely voting along party lines, acquits Clinton on both impeachment charges. With a two-thirds majority (67 votes) needed for conviction, neither article receives even a simple majority (51 votes).

2000

For the first time, the Supreme Court in effect settles a disputed presidential election. Thirty-six days after the election, the Court, voting 5–4 in Bush v. Gore, upholds George

During his 2008 presidential campaign and through the transition period, Democrat Barack Obama used the Web site Change.gov to illustrate his platform's message of change.

W. Bush's narrow popular vote victory over Al Gore in Florida. The Court rules that to continue the hand recount of punch-card ballots without uniform standards would deny Bush equal protection of the laws. The action gives Bush 271 electoral votes, one more than needed to win. It also gives the country its second father-son presidential pair, matching John Adams in 1796 and his son John Quincy Adams in 1824. Bush's father, George H.W. Bush, was elected president in 1988.

The 2000 election is the fourth in which the popular vote winner loses the election. Gore receives 48.4 percent of the popular vote to Bush's 47.9 percent.

Gore's running mate, Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, is the first person of Jewish descent to run on a major party ticket.

Hillary Rodham Clinton wins a New York Senate seat, becoming the first presidential wife elected to public office.

2001

The Senate, evenly split between the two major parties at 50–50, enters into a historic power-sharing arrangement. Although it remains under GOP control by virtue of Vice President Richard Cheney's role of breaking tie votes as presiding Senate officer, the Democrats gain equal seats on committees, equal funding, and other powers previously given only to the party in majority. The rare arrangement is short-lived, however, as Sen. James Jeffords of Vermont, a moderate, bolts the Republican Party to become an Independent in June 2001, giving control of the Senate to the Democrats for the first time since 1994.

Congress passes the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, the so-called McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, which places restrictions on soft money and issue ads. Meanwhile, the disputed 2000 election sparks passage of the Help America Vote Act of 2002, which authorizes funding to help states meet new federal election standards.

In the 2002 elections, the Republicans gain seats in the Senate and House, a rare midterm occurrence for the party in control of the White House. Senate victories enable the GOP to regain control of the upper chamber.

2004

In an election marked by heavy turnout, President George W. Bush wins reelection, defeating Democrat John F. Kerry by a slim electoral and popular vote majority. The close 51–48 percentage split in the popular vote still reflects a country deeply divided. The Republicans also win seats in both the House and Senate, solidifying the GOP's control of the legislative branch of government.

2006

Republican fortunes, burdened by an unpopular war in Iraq and plummeting polls for President George W. Bush, begin to unravel as Democrats win control of both the House and the Senate, albeit the latter by a narrow margin of 51–49. In the House Democrats win a commanding margin of 233–202.

2008

Democrats stage a noteworthy presidential primary contest that lasts until June with the junior senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, eventually defeating fellow senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, the former first lady.

Republican presidential nominee John McCain chooses then-Alaska governor Sarah Palin as his vice-presidential running mate. Palin becomes the first woman to run on a GOP presidential ticket.

In the general election the Republican Party's decline that began in 2006 turns into a rout as the nation elects Obama, its first African American president. Democrats also pick up eight seats in the Senate and a net of twenty-one in the House, capturing all seats in the Northeast, making inroads in traditionally GOP states, and relegating Republicans largely to their stronghold in the South.

Elections: An Expanding Franchise

FEW ELEMENTS of the American political system have changed so markedly over the years as has the electorate. Since the early days of the nation, when the voting privilege was limited to the upper economic classes, one voting barrier after another has fallen to pressures for wider suffrage. First, men who did not own property, then women, then African Americans, and finally young people obtained the franchise. By the early 1970s virtually every adult citizen eighteen and older had won the right to vote.

But by the end of the 1990s only about half of those eligible to vote were exercising that right in high-profile presidential elections, and only between 30 percent and 40 percent of those eligible were bothering to vote in midterm congressional elections. The highly charged partisanship that characterized American politics and the closely fought elections after the turn of the twentieth century, which brought more voters to the polling booth, increased the turnout rate. For the 2008 presidential election turnout was nearly 62 percent of eligible voters as measured by the calculations of one voting scholar. Nevertheless, voting in midterm elections for Congress only remained low and even the higher presidential turnout still meant that nearly four of ten Americans could not or chose not to go to the polls.

The actual turnout rate was difficult to determine because of different ways of measuring the size of the voting population, which was driven in large part by an increasing influx of immigrants, who were not American citizens and therefore could not vote. Census Bureau surveys asking persons if they had voted tended to show higher turnout rates than examinations of actual voting data by scholars and voting analysts. (See box, Measuring Voter Turnout, p. 27; Tables 2-1 and 2-2, pp. 24, 28; Figure 2-1, p. 25; and Table 1-1, p. 6.)

The comparatively low turnout led some observers to speculate that people stayed away from the polls because they were disillusioned with the political process. Others said concern about low turnout was overblown, often pointing to voter registration, which—in spite of questions about its accuracy—suggested that a substantial portion of citizens who cared enough about participating in the election process did in fact go to the polls.

MORE VOTERS, CHANGING VOTER PATTERNS

What was indisputably true was that over the course of more than two centuries, the United States brought increasingly more citizens into the election process. During the nation's first decades, all thirteen of the original states restricted voting to adult male property holders and taxpayers. The Framers of the Constitution apparently were content to continue this time-honored practice. The Constitutional Convention adopted without dissent the recommendation of its Committee of Detail that qualifications for the electors of the House of Representatives "shall be the same... as those of the electors in the several states of the most numerous branch of their own legislatures."<sup>1</sup>

Under this provision fewer than half of the adult white men in the United States were eligible to vote in federal elections. With women and indentured servants disqualified, fewer than one of every four white adults could cast a ballot. Slaves also were ineligible to vote, although freed slaves could vote in some states if they met whatever other qualifications the state placed on its voters.

Those practices actually represented a liberalization of restrictions on voting that had prevailed at one time in the colonial period. Roman Catholics had been disenfranchised in almost every colony; Jews in most colonies; Quakers and Baptists in some. Not until 1842 did Rhode Island permit Jews to vote.

For half a century before the Civil War, the electorate was steadily broadened. The new western settlements supplied a stimulus for allowing all men to vote, and Jacksonian democracy encouraged its acceptance. Gradually, seven states that had limited voting strictly to men who owned property substituted a taxpaying qualification, and by the middle of the century most states had removed even that requirement.

The Fourteenth Amendment, ratified in 1868, made everyone born or naturalized in the United States a citizen and directed Congress to reduce the number of representatives from any state that disenfranchised adult male citizens for any reason other than commission of a crime. Although no such reduction was ever made, that amendment—together with the Fifteenth Amendment, which said that the right to vote could not be denied on the basis of “race, color, or previous condition of servitude”—legally opened the polling booths to black men.

TABLE 2-1 The Nation's Voters, 1980–2006 (Percentages of voting-age populations who said they had voted)

This table is based on figures reported by the Census Bureau from its periodic survey of voters. The totals shown at the bottom are higher than compilations using voting totals compared to the number of persons eligible to vote in an election. One reason for the difference may be the social norm that holds voting as an appropriate action for a citizen. This may prompt some respondents to say they voted even if they did not. The bureau also notes that its questions ask only if a respondent voted, not the contest in which the ballot was cast. For a comparison of total turnout rates using actual votes and an estimate of eligible voters, see Table 2-2, p. 28, and box, Measuring Voter Turnout, p. 27. See also Table 1-1, p. 6.

Former slaves did vote in the years immediately following the Civil War, but by the turn of the twentieth century, most southern states had in place laws and election practices that effectively barred blacks from voting. Not until passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 would the promise held out by the Fifteenth Amendment begin to be fulfilled.

Women fought for nearly ninety years to win their right to vote; success came with ratification of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920. In 1971 the Twenty-sixth Amendment lowered the voting age to eighteen for federal, state, and local elections. A Supreme Court ruling in 1972 effectively required states to reduce the time citizens had to live there to be eligible to vote; no state now requires more than a thirty-day residency. By the beginning of the 1990s, only insanity, a felony conviction, or failure to meet a residency requirement barred voting-age citizens from going to the polls, and there was growing controversy over whether the vote should be denied to felons—especially those who had completed their sentences.

By the first decade of the twenty-first century, all of these issues were being debated. States around the country had differing rules about whether to allow people with mental illness or a mental disability to vote, and the issue had sparked discussion, including among those working with disabled people and senior citizens suffering from dementia, as to who should be allowed to participate in the voting process. As of 2008, only two states, Maine and Vermont, placed no limitations on felons' voting rights. Requirements varied in other states, and some were considering changes; in 2007 Florida, for example, restored voting rights to more than 115,000 felons who met certain qualifications. States also had varying laws when it came to residency requirements for voting.

Residents of the District of Columbia were given the right to vote in presidential elections with ratification of the Twenty-third Amendment in 1961. In 1970 Congress authorized residents of the nation's capital to elect a nonvoting delegate to the House of Representatives. In early 2009 legislation passed both chambers of Congress giving the District a representative in the House with full voting rights. As part of the legislative deal, the chamber was enlarged by two seats: one for the heavily Democratic District and a second to Utah, a Republican-leaning state. However, by spring the bill was caught up in controversy over a Senate amendment concerning gun controls in the city. In addition, the legislation if it became law was expected to be challenged in court as unconstitutional.

Turnout Trends

Most significant liberalizations of election law have resulted in a sharp increase in voting. From 1824 to 1856, a period of gradual relaxation in the states' property and taxpaying qualifications for voting, voter participation in presidential elections increased from 3.8 percent to 16.7 percent of the population. In 1920, when the Nineteenth Amendment gave women the franchise, participation rose to 25.1 percent.

Between 1932 and 1976 both the voting-age population and the number of voters in presidential elections roughly doubled. Except for the 1948 presidential election, when barely half the people of voting age went to the polls, the turnout in the years after World War II through 1968 was approximately 60 percent, according to Census Bureau surveys. The surveys roughly matched the actual calculation of presidential votes as a percentage of the voting-age population. This relatively high figure was attributed to a high sense of civic duty that permeated American society in the immediate postwar years, a population more rooted than it was to be later in the century, and to new civil rights laws encouraging blacks to vote.

Despite larger numbers of people voting, the rate of voter participation slumped after 1968. In that year's presidential election, 61 percent of the voting-age population went to the polls. In the following years, the turnout rate fell to between 50 and 55 percent for the rest of the century, as measured against the voting-age population standard then widely in use, before starting to rise again.

The famous postwar baby boom, together with a lower voting age, had produced by the early 1970s a disproportionate number of young voters, many of whom Census Bureau studies showed were the least likely to vote. In the 1972 presidential election, the first in which eighteen-year-olds could vote nationwide, some 11 million young voters entered the electorate. But the actual number of voting participants was only 4.4 million greater than in 1968, resulting in a five-point drop in the ratio of eligible to actual voters.

Reasons for changing turnouts have been long debated. One often-stated opinion is public cynicism about the political process. Mark Mellman, a Democratic campaign consultant, expressed a typical view: “There’s a sense that the political system is out of their control on one hand and not responsive on the other.” Campaigns that once thrived at the grassroots level—with storefront political headquarters manned by volunteers and stocked with buttons and stickers—were being waged through the more impersonal medium of television and, more recently, the Internet and other electronic devices such as cell phones and other personal communication devices.

But another school of thought has contended that low turnout might be overrated as an indicator of voter apathy and cynicism. As expressed by Richard Scammon, former director of the U.S. Bureau of the Census: “Peace and prosperity can generally operate to keep the vote down.... In a sense, a low voter turnout is consent. A pool of disinterest may be valuable for a democracy.”<sup>2</sup>

Others who have studied voter turnout doubt there has been a real decline. Prof. Michael P. McDonald of George Mason University, who has done extensive examinations of voter eligibility, wrote that declining turnout rates after 1971 were “entirely explained by the increase in the ineligible population.”<sup>3</sup> McDonald and other scholars, and even the U.S. Census Bureau, note that the voting-age population has increasingly been skewed by the presence of persons of legal age but who are not citizens or otherwise entitled to vote, largely immigrants but also including prison felons, individuals on probation, and mentally incapacitated persons. McDonald contended that in 1972 the number of noncitizens in the United States was under 2 percent of the voting-age population, but had increased to nearly 8.5 percent by 2004. (See below and box, Measuring Voter Turnout, p. 27; and Table 2-2, p. 28.)

Even so, McDonald noted that his calculations showed an average national midterm turnout rate from 1974 to 2002 of 39.4 percent, which meant that six out of ten potential voters chose not to go to the polls. His calculations for presidential election years showed higher turnout, but still rarely above 55 percent starting in 1972.

Public opinion polls have long detected public disenchantment with politics. But the Scammon view was given new impetus in the elections of the first decade of the twenty-first century.

The 2000 election with no incumbent drew 105.4 million people to the polls, creating a voter turnout of 51 percent, as measured by the traditional all-inclusive standard of voting-age population. (McDonald calculated the turnout at 54.2 percent.) But the 2000 presidential race was as contentious as any in the past half century, with the winner—George W. Bush—losing the popular vote and winning the electoral vote, and the White House, only after the Supreme Court decided against ballot recounts in the contested state of Florida. The anger over this election, combined with Bush administration policies and decisions, set the stage for ever-higher public interest in public issues over the next eight years.

Traumatic national events—particularly the 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States, but also the Bush administration’s decision to invade Iraq in a war that was still continuing in 2009—fueled partisan fervor that pointed to the converse of Scammon’s argument.

Bush won reelection in 2004—both the electoral and popular votes—but the controversy that surrounded him and his policies helped push voter turnout to more than 122 million, with a turnout rate of at least 60 percent and more by some calculations.

The swirling controversies of this period carried into the 2006 midterm elections, in which the Democrats recaptured control of both houses of Congress—for the House, this was the first time Republicans had lost control since 1994. Most analysts attributed the Republican defeat to popular disapproval of the Iraqi war, which was reinforced by various other GOP woes, including a series of ethics and lobbying corruption scandals. The 2006 elections set new records for voter participation. Political analyst Rhodes Cook wrote that the turnout rate for the U.S. House was the highest since 1982. “Then, 39.5 percent of the citizen voting age population took part. This time the rate was 39 percent of the eligible citizen voting-age population,” Cook wrote.<sup>4</sup>

Unexpected developments can propel voting participation. Two occurred in 2007 and 2008. One was a worldwide financial crisis that began in 2007 and produced the most serious economic contraction since the Great Depression of the 1930s. Second was the candidacy and eventual election as president of the country’s first African American, Barack Obama, in 2008. That year there were about 208 million eligible Americans of voting age (excluding noncitizens who were of voting age); an estimated 74 percent of these people registered to vote, a record. The estimated registration rate of eligible voters between 1960 and 2008 ranged from 66 percent to this record-breaking 2008 figure. Of those more than 131 million persons cast ballots for all presidential candidates that year.

Outside the issue of how many Americans voted, one other question persistently asked is whether the results would be different if everyone voted. In a paper that they wrote in 1998, two University of California political scientists, Benjamin Highton and Raymond E. Wolfinger, answered: probably not. “The two most common demographic features of nonvoters are their residential mobility and youth, two characteristics that do not suggest political distinctiveness,” they wrote. “To be sure, the poor, less educated, and minorities are overrepresented among nonvoters. But the young and the transient are even more numerous....

MEASURING VOTER TURNOUT

Calculating the number and the percentage of citizens who vote in U.S. elections is a commonly used measure of the political involvement of American citizens. Increasingly, the numbers are in dispute because there are different ways to define the universe of citizens who make up the voting population. Most calculations show the turnout rate in midterm congressional elections is dismally low, about 33 percent to 40 percent of potential voters. The turnout rate for presidential elections is higher, sometimes reaching more than 60 percent, but even that level means a substantial slice of voters could not vote or did not care enough to vote.

The controversy that has arisen in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries are rooted in identifying the correct number of citizens of voting age—eighteen years since 1972—who are eligible. A sizeable number of persons over eighteen are not eligible to vote because they are—in the largest numbers—immigrants who are not citizens or who are otherwise barred from voting because they are in prison or on parole or mentally incapacitated, which are barriers in most states.

The largest and all inclusive group of people who meet the age standard is called the voting-age population (VAP) and historically has been based on Census Bureau surveys done near election days. As scholars have taken a closer look at the component of VAP that cannot vote, thereby creating a voter-eligible population (VEP), accurate measurement has become more possible, almost always resulting in a higher voter turnout number. However, there is no single authority for a VEP number and the historical VAP framework has continued to be used in many analyses.

For the 2004 election, the Census Bureau calculated that 58.3 percent of the VAP voted. But it also calculated what it called the citizen population, removing noncitizens from the base. By this measure 63.8 percent of eligible voters went to the polls. The bureau also noted a third criterion: registration, which is required in every state except North Dakota before a person can vote. The bureau, using its survey results, calculated that 88.5 percent of registered voters went to the polls, but noted that about 55 million persons who said they were a citizen were not registered.

Care should be taken with these numbers as well. When states report turnout rates, they calculate the participation based on the numbers of voters on their rolls, though some states differentiate between active and inactive voters. For 2004 there were only a handful of states with turnout rates below 60 percent or more than 80 percent. It is likely that many political observers have access to these numbers when they compare turnout figures over time. This comparison reflects so-called “list inflation,” which means many names remain on the voter rolls after ineligibility occurs, normally by simply moving to a new address or another jurisdiction. The bureau survey approach attempts to minimize this impact.

Some students of voting behavior note that Census Bureau numbers are based on survey techniques and not actual nose counts, as is done—in effect—with ballots that when tallied provide a definitive number. But the bureau clearly states that its surveys ask if a respondent voted, not the specific election contest in which he or she voted. Still others may have responded positively reflecting the societal norm that voting is a “good” thing for an American citizen to do.

Many scholars have spent considerable effort trying to sort out the issues involved in measuring turnout rates as part of the larger academic goal of determining whether the American electorate really is as disinterested in politics as many observers, such as editorial writers, have long lamented.

Generally, efforts to fine-tune the numbers at the state and national level, mostly by excluding persons of age but who cannot vote, have shown modestly higher voting rates than ascribed to the electorate in most popular renditions. One such scholar, Michael P. McDonald at George Mason University, calculated the 2004 presidential VAP rate at 55.4 percent and the VEP rate at 60.1 percent, still lower than the Census Bureau’s estimates. (See Table 2-2, p. 28.) But other scholars and organizations, including the Center for the Study of the American Electorate at the American University, have produced different turnout estimates.

In addition, many estimates historically have been calculated using the vote for the highest office. In presidential years, that is the vote for White House candidates. But in midterm elections in a state it usually is a race for governor or senator, if such an office is up for election. For national purposes, however, an alternative measurement that is often used is the total vote for House candidates, even though that number may be skewed by two factors: (1) several states do not report voting totals in individual races where there was only one candidate even though voters actually went to the polls; and (2) even in states that do report voting totals for all congressional races, many voters just do not cast any ballot in these uncontested races.

The basic problem confronting any analysis of turnout behavior remains. It is not how many persons cast ballots, but rather which rate is used and how the universe of eligible persons is calculated.

What our findings have demonstrated is that the ‘party of nonvoters’ is truly heterogeneous. Taken as a whole, nonvoters appear well represented by those who vote.”<sup>5</sup>

Nonetheless, studies by the Census Bureau have shown marked differences in participation among various classes of voters. Older voters tend to vote at a higher rate than younger voters. Well-educated voters tend to vote at a higher rate than those less educated. Whites tend to vote at a higher rate than blacks and Hispanics. (See Table 2-1, p. 24.)

Growth of Independents

Although more people identify themselves as Democrats than Republicans, there has been a steady rise over the past half century in voters who do not identify with either party. The American National Election Studies (ANES), a long-running detailed record of voting behavior, recorded for 2004 that 49 percent of voters identified themselves as Democrats, 41 percent as Republicans, and 10 percent as independents. (The figures for 1952, the first year of ANES

TABLE 2-2 Eligible Voter Turnout Rates

Scholars, journalists, and voting analysts have for years lamented what appeared to be a declining rate of voter turnout in elections, which they feared showed a national lack of interest in politics and in deciding which party would control governmental powers. Not everyone agrees.

Declining turnout analyses have traditionally used actual vote counts compared to the voting-age population (VAP), persons eighteen years and older. (See Table 1-1, p. 6.)

But the VAP number increasingly came under scrutiny as one of its components—immigrants of age but not U.S. citizens and therefore not eligible to vote—grew rapidly in the 1990s and after 2000. Scholars began to look at a turnout rate that showed votes cast in terms of the voter eligible population (VEP). To get a VEP analysts removed from the VAP persons of legal age but who are not eligible to vote because they are not citizens. Increasingly, the largest group was immigrants, but included others in prison, on probation, or mentally incapacitated. With this approach the turnout rate is higher than calculations using VAP.<sup>1</sup>

The figures in the table below were prepared by Prof. Michael P. McDonald of George Mason University. He estimates that the average midterm turnout rate from 1974 to 2002 was 39.4 percent. His calculations include votes for House and Senate seats and for governor depending on which drew the highest number of votes.

Presidential election years		Congressional election years
2008	61.6
2004	60.1	2006	40.3
2000	54.2	2002	39.5
1996	51.7	1998	38.1
1992	58.1	1994	41.1
1988	52.8	1990	38.4
1984	55.2	1986	38.1
1980	54.2	1982	42.1

1. Another often quoted measure of turnout came from Census Bureau surveys that asked a representative sample of Americans if they had voted. The bureau's numbers showed a higher turnout rate than analyses using actual votes cast and either VAP or VEP. (See Table 2-1, p. 24.)

data, were 57, 34, and 6 percent.) But when the ANES survey data was broken into finer parts, the 2004 results showed 33 percent of respondents said they were Democrats, 28 percent said they were Republicans, and 39 percent said they were independents. (See Figure 2-2, p. 29.) The latter category included persons who said they were either an independent Democrat or an independent Republican. In 1952 this larger grouping showed 23 percent of respondents identifying themselves as independent.

The impact of an expanding independent political population was seen in the dramatic midterm elections of 2006, in which Democrats won control of both the House and the Senate after being in the minority in the House every year since 1994 and most of the time in the Senate. Exit polls in 2006 showed that Democratic candidates were favored by 57 percent of voters who claimed they were not affiliated with their major party. Moreover, this group made up 26 percent of all voters, a huge target population that many analysts believed held the balance of power in future elections.

Yet when it comes to the act of voter registration, most voters still sign up with one of the two major parties; at least that is the case in the twenty-nine states (and the District of Columbia) where there is such a choice to be made. According to a compilation by the political newsletter Ballot Access News, prepared by Richard Winger, in early 2007, Democrats had the registration advantage in thirteen states plus the District of Columbia (a total that included the four most populous states where voters can register by party—California, Florida, New York, and Pennsylvania). Republicans led in seven states (all in the Plains or Rocky Mountain region), and independents had the edge in nine states, four of them in the Northeast (Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and New Jersey). The distribution was roughly the same as a decade earlier. Winger's compilation showed 42 percent of the registrants were Democrats and 32 percent Republicans. Significantly a quarter of the registrants identified themselves as independent, a finding in keeping with other measurements of the voting population that showed the continued growth in this segment. Winger updated the study using registration information as of October 2008 and found that approximately 44 percent were Democrats and approximately 31 percent Republicans, with a little more than a quarter considering themselves independents or members of smaller parties. This time, Democrats were ahead in fifteen states plus the District; Republicans ahead in five (Arizona, Kansas, Nebraska, South Dakota, and Wyoming); and independents in nine.<sup>6</sup>

Over the years, slightly different measurements have been taken by political analyst Curtis Gans. He reported that in 2006, 37 percent registered as Democrats, 31 percent as Republicans, and 17 percent as “other,” a category made up largely of persons claiming independent status. In 1962, when data was available for only thirteen states, the totals were 48 percent Democratic registration, 25 percent Republican, and only 1.4 percent “other.” This time snapshot reflected measurements by other scholars and polling organizations that recorded the steady strengthening of the Republican Party to increasing parity with Democrats, who had dominated since the New Deal days of the 1930s. In 2008 Gans estimated that partisan registration trends for that year in the states that register by party were as follows: 38.7 percent Democratic, 28.9 percent Republican, and 22.7 percent other.

However, the number of registered voters nationwide at any given time is impossible to calculate. States have different registration deadlines; people who move may be registered in more than one state at the same time, or temporarily may not be recorded in any state; and some states do not require preregistration before voting, while others do not require towns and municipalities to keep registration records. (See box, Measuring Voter Turnout, p. 27.)

Competitive Election Changes

After years of lackluster election competition in the latter decades of the twentieth century, a more robust political scene appeared to be underway starting with the 2000 national elections. The presidential election that year was essentially a draw with the Democratic candidate, Al Gore, capturing the popular vote by more than a half-million ballots, while the Republican, George W. Bush, won the electoral vote and the White House. Four years later Bush improved slightly on his first election by winning both the popular and electoral counts, but by narrow margins that had been seen only rarely in the twentieth century. Most analysts said the parties at that level were in a nearly dead heat with the outcomes heavily dependent on issues of the day and the organizational strengths of each candidate. That pattern shifted with Obama's election in 2008; the Democrat won a solid victory in the electoral college, as well as in the popular vote, thanks in part to the unpopularity of the outgoing Bush administration and a collapsing economy.

The midterm congressional elections showed a continuing pattern of largely noncompetitive House races, at least until 2006, when voter anger on several issues cost Republican incumbents more than in recent past elections. Senate contests also showed the value of incumbency, although that too suffered in 2006, but the peculiarities of contests for that chamber—especially the election of only one-third of the members each time—made senatorial contests less useful as a national measure of political competitiveness in Congress.

On the other hand, all members of the House are elected every two years. Scholars for years noted that most of the 435 races do not involve serious competition between the two major parties. In 1994, the year the GOP won control of Congress for the first time since 1952, there were nearly one hundred competitive districts, measured by a winning percentage of less than 55 percent of the total vote. In 2002 the number was less than fifty seats; in 2004 it was just thirty-two seats. But in 2006 the number of districts with winners below 55 percent jumped to sixty-eight, the highest in a decade; the figure was sixty-two in 2008. Political analyst Rhodes Cook noted that the Democratic victory in 2006 was national in scope, with Democrats gaining in all regions, that two-thirds came in states or districts carried by President Bush in 2004, that most defeated Republicans were not newcomers but veterans with the advantage of incumbency, and that most of the losing GOP members did not have close races in 2004. These dramatic changes were interpreted largely as voter anger over an unpopular war in Iraq, a variety of GOP ethics scandals, and a bungled federal government response to the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina on a number of southern states in 2005.

The Democrats did well again in 2008; Cook noted that the party succeeded throughout the country, with most of their House pickups in seats that President Bush had won in 2004. Democrats picked up eight Senate seats, ousting five incumbent Republicans and winning three open seats. Democrats also picked up twenty-four House seats (including three in special elections held earlier in 2008). One difference from 2006, according to Cook, is that about half the Republican losses were in seats where there was no incumbent running for reelection; of those who lost, some were longtime veterans while others were relatively new. Republicans, however, managed to win four House seats they had lost in 2006 or in 2008 special elections, and they snapped up the seat of Louisiana Democrat William Jefferson, who was under indictment, in a December 2008 runoff.

Blacks, including a Union soldier, are depicted casting their first ballots in an image published November 16, 1867. In fact, it would take another hundred years to secure voting rights for African Americans.

THE BLACK VOTE: A LONG, PAINFUL STRUGGLE

In no period of American history were all black people excluded from the polls. At the time of the Constitutional Convention, free blacks had the right of suffrage in all the original states except Georgia, South Carolina, and Virginia. Their right to vote stemmed from the fact that the first black people were brought to America not as slaves but as indentured servants, who could expect freedom after a fixed number of years' service to a master. By 1800, however, the majority of black people were held in slavery. As it grew, so did disenfranchisement. At the outbreak of the Civil War, black Americans were disfranchised, solely on the basis of their race, in all except six of the thirty-three states.

President Abraham Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation of 1863 freed the slaves but did not accord them voting rights. To ease the impact of change on the South, Lincoln preferred to move cautiously in expanding the black electorate. After the Civil War several southern states promptly enacted "Black Codes" barring the newly liberated slaves from voting or holding office. Radical Republicans in Congress responded by passing the Reconstruction Act of 1867, which established provisional military governments in the Southern states. The return of civilian control was conditioned on their ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, which buttressed individual liberty with "due process" and "equal protection" under the law. The amendment's second section threatened to reduce any state's representation in Congress for denying the vote to any male citizen twenty-one years of age or older.

The Reconstruction Act further stated that a secessionist state could not be readmitted to the Union unless it extended the franchise to all adult males, white and black. Congress followed in February 1869 by submitting the Fifteenth Amendment, prohibiting racial discrimination in voting, to the states. It was ratified twelve months later.

The Radical Republican majority in Congress feared that unless blacks were allowed to vote, Democrats and ex-rebels would quickly regain control of the national government. In the presidential election of 1868, in fact, Gen. Ulysses S. Grant defeated his Democratic opponent, Horatio Seymour, by fewer than 305,000 votes; the new black vote probably decided the election.

Former slaves obtained important positions in the governments formed under the Reconstruction Act of 1867. P.B.S. Pinchback served briefly as acting governor of Louisiana; Mississippi, South Carolina, and Louisiana had black lieutenant governors. Between 1870 and 1900, southern states sent twenty-two black men to Congress—two of them, Hiram R. Revels and Blanche Kelso Bruce, represented Mississippi as senators. Bruce served a full six-year term (1875–1881) and was a presiding officer of the Republican National Convention of 1880.

The white South did not yield gracefully to this turn of events. Gunnar Myrdal noted in his landmark study of black people in America, An American Dilemma, that: "The Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments were... looked upon as the supreme foolishness of the North and, worse still, as an expression of ill-will of the Yankees toward the defeated South. The Negro franchise became the symbol of the humiliation of the South."<sup>7</sup>

After Reconstruction

Congress in 1870 passed an enforcement act to protect black voting rights in the South, but the Supreme Court in 1876 ruled that Congress had exceeded its authority. In the case of United States v. Reese, the Court held that the Fifteenth Amendment did not give anyone the right to vote; it simply guaranteed the right to be free from racial discrimination in exercising that right. The extension of the right to vote itself, the Court said, was up to the states, not the federal government. Therefore, the Court said, Congress had overreached its power to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment when it enacted the 1870 law that penalized state officials who denied blacks the right to vote, or refused to count their votes, or obstructed them from voting.

At the same time, the North clearly was growing weary of the crusade for betterment of the condition of blacks. When the first federal troops were withdrawn in April 1877, the remaining Radical Reconstruction governments in the South quickly disintegrated. Some of the newly enfranchised citizens continued to vote, but by 1900, according to historian Paul Lewinson in his book Race, Class and Party, “all factions united in a white man’s party once more, to put the Negro finally beyond the pale of political activity.”<sup>8</sup>

Mississippi led the way in prohibiting black political activity. A new state constitution drawn up in 1890 required prospective voters to pay a poll tax of two dollars and to demonstrate their ability to read any section of the state constitution or to interpret it when read to them.

Literacy Tests for Voters

In Mississippi and other southern states that adopted voter literacy tests, care was taken not to disfranchise illiterate whites. Five states exempted white voters from literacy and some other requirements by “grandfather clauses”—regulations allowing prospective voters, if not otherwise qualified, to register if they were descended from persons who had voted, or served in the state’s military forces, before 1867. Other provisions allowed illiterates to register if they owned a certain amount of property or could show themselves to be of good moral character—requirements easily twisted to exclude only blacks.

At one time or another, twenty-one states imposed literacy requirements as a condition for voting. The first to do so, Connecticut in 1855 and Massachusetts in 1857, sought to disqualify a flood of European immigrants. Between 1890 and 1910, Mississippi, South Carolina, Louisiana, North Carolina, Alabama, Virginia, Georgia, and Oklahoma adopted literacy tests—primarily to restrict the black vote.

Nineteen of the twenty-one states demanded that voters be able to read English, and all but four of them (New York, Washington, Alaska, and Hawaii) required the reading of some legal document or passage from the state or federal Constitution. Either in lieu of or in addition to the reading requirements, fourteen states required an ability to write.

As applied in the South, literacy tests and other voting restrictions virtually disenfranchised black citizens. Outside the South the New York test was by far the most stringent, although there were seldom any complaints that it was applied in a discriminatory way. Despite pressures by civil libertarians, Congress declined for years to void literacy tests on grounds that to do so would violate a state’s right to impose its own voting requirements.

Reports of extreme voter discrimination in the South gradually moved Congress to search for remedial legislation. In 1965 it passed a sweeping Voting Rights Act that suspended literacy tests in seven southern states and parts of another. Five years later Congress expanded the law to bar all voter-literacy tests. The landmark legislation was extended repeatedly in the following years, becoming the foundation for a transformation of the political structure of the Southern states.

Poll-Tax Barrier to Voting

The first poll taxes in America were substitutes for property ownership and were intended to enlarge the voting franchise. But only a few states retained them at the time of the Civil War. They were afterward revived for a far different purpose—to restrict the franchise—in all eleven states of the old Confederacy: Florida (1889), Mississippi and Tennessee (1890), Arkansas (1892), South Carolina (1895), Louisiana (1898), North Carolina (1900), Alabama (1901), Virginia and Texas (1902), and Georgia (1908).

The ostensible purpose was to “cleanse” elections of mass abuses, but the records of constitutional conventions held in five southern states during the period revealed statements praising the poll tax as a measure to bar blacks and poor whites from the polls. Some historians have asserted that the main intent of these measures was to limit the popular base of a so-called agrarian revolt inspired by the Populist Party against the existing political structure.<sup>9</sup>

After the Populist era many states voluntarily dropped use of the poll tax, including six southern states—North Carolina (1920), Louisiana (1934), Florida (1937), Georgia (1945), South Carolina (1951), and Tennessee (1953). Proposals to abolish the poll tax were introduced in every Congress from 1939 to 1962. By 1960 only four states still required its payment by voters. In August 1962 the House approved a constitutional amendment—already accepted by the Senate—that outlawed poll taxes in federal elections, and that amendment, the Twenty-fourth, was ratified in January 1964. In 1966 the Supreme Court held that the poll tax was an unconstitutional requirement for voting in state and local elections as well. “Voter qualifications have no relation to wealth nor to paying or not paying this or any other tax. Wealth, like race, creed, or color, is not germane to one’s ability to participate intelligently in the electoral process,” Justice William O. Douglas wrote for the majority in Harper v. Virginia Board of Elections.

White Primaries

Even more than literacy tests or poll taxes, perhaps the most effective disfranchisement of southern blacks was their exclusion from the Democratic Party’s primary elections. In the solidly Democratic South of the post-Reconstruction era, winning the party’s nomination virtually assured election. Being excluded from voting in the primary was equivalent to being excluded from voting altogether.

Not until 1941 did the Supreme Court make clear that Congress had the power to regulate primary, as well as general, elections. Indeed, in a 1921 decision involving campaign spending, Newberry v. United States, the Court seemed to say that Congress lacked power to regulate primary elections. This doubt about the reach of federal power encouraged the eleven states that had composed the Confederacy to begin systematic exclusion of black voters from the primary. The Democratic Party was often organized on a statewide or county basis as a private club or association that could freely exclude blacks.

The effort of Texas to use the white primary to shut blacks out of the political process came before the Supreme Court in five cases, brought over a span of twenty-five years. In 1923 the Texas Legislature passed a law forbidding blacks to vote in the state Democratic primary. Dr. L.A. Nixon, a black resident of El Paso, challenged the law, arguing that it clearly violated the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. In the case of Nixon v. Herndon, decided in 1927, the Supreme Court agreed with Nixon's Fourteenth Amendment claim.

After the 1927 Herndon decision, the Texas Legislature authorized the executive committees of state political parties to establish their own qualifications for voting in the primary. Dr. Nixon again sued, challenging the law as racially discriminatory. Attorneys for the state argued that the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause did not apply because the party, not state officials, set up the allegedly discriminatory standards.

With Justice Benjamin N. Cardozo writing for a five-member majority, the Court held in 1932 that the executive committee of the Democratic Party acted as a delegate of the state in setting voter qualifications and that its action was equivalent to state action and was thus within the scope of the equal protection guarantee, which it violated (Nixon v. Condon).

The Texas Democratic Party responded by acting without state authorization to put itself off-limits to black voters. Confronted with this situation, the Court in 1935 retreated to its Newberry reasoning and ruled, in Grovey v. Townsend, that in this instance the party had acted not as a creature of the state but as a voluntary association of individuals. As such, its actions—even in controlling access to the vote—were not restricted by the Constitution.

In 1941 the Court switched signals again, discarding the Newberry doctrine in the case of United States v. Classic. Classic was not a racial discrimination case but instead concerned a man convicted of falsifying election returns. His conviction was based on a federal law that made it a crime “to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution.” He challenged his conviction, arguing that the right to vote in a primary election was not a right secured by the Constitution.

But the Court upheld the conviction, ruling that the primary was an integral part of the election process. The authority of Congress under Article I, section 4, to regulate elections included the authority to regulate primary elections, wrote Justice Stone, “when, as in this case, they are a step in the exercise by the people of their choice of representatives in Congress.”

Three years later, in 1944, the Court overturned Grovey and held the all-white primary unconstitutional. This case, Smith v. Allwright, arose out of the refusal of S.S. Allwright, a county election official, to permit Lonnie E. Smith, a black man, to vote in the 1940 Texas Democratic primary. Smith sued, saying Allwright had deprived him of his civil rights. Smith was represented by two attorneys for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), William H. Hastie and Thurgood Marshall. Both were later made judges, with Marshall becoming the first black member of the Supreme Court.

The relentless effort of Texas Democrats to maintain the white primary at last came to an end in 1953 with another Supreme Court decision. In one Texas county an all-white Democratic organization conducted all-white primary elections under the name of Jaybird Club, a self-declared private club. In Terry v. Adams the Court declared this a ploy in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment.

Physical and Psychic Coercion

Throughout this period legal devices to curtail black political activity were buttressed by physical and economic intimidation. As Myrdal wrote: “Physical coercion is not so often practiced against the Negro, but the mere fact that it can be used with impunity... creates a psychic coercion that exists nearly everywhere in the South.... [I]t is no wonder that the great majority of Negroes in the South make no attempt to vote and—if they make attempts which are rebuffed—seldom demand their full rights under the federal Constitution.”<sup>10</sup>

Any who summoned up the courage to try to register encountered various delays and harassment. The scornful question “What do you want here, nigger?” often sufficed to send a black person away. If the applicants persisted, the registrar was likely to ignore them, tell them that there were no more registration forms, or direct them to another place of registration, which, if it existed, was usually closed. Southern registrars also displayed a tendency to lose registration forms filled out by black applicants.

More subtle practices limited black political participation in the North as well. With the exception of Chicago, white-controlled city machines excluded black people from any significant role in politics for the first half of the twentieth century. During that time, Congress did virtually nothing to encourage black voting.

Civil Rights Legislation

Not until the 1950s, when the civil rights movement began to gather force, did Congress, at the urging of the executive branch, begin to reassert federal power to ensure the right of black citizens to vote. Its first action was passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1957, which was intended to enforce the voting guarantee set out in the Fifteenth Amendment.

The 1957 act authorized the attorney general to bring lawsuits to halt public and private interference with the right of black people to vote, and expanded federal jurisdiction over such suits. The law also created the Civil Rights Commission to investigate and publicly disclose problems of racial discrimination, including voting problems. The investigatory procedures of the commission and the authorization of the federal lawsuits were upheld by the Supreme Court in 1960, in United States v. Raines.

Responding to reports that progress in securing voting rights for blacks still was slow even under the provisions of the 1957 act, Congress in 1960 passed a measure that permitted the U.S. attorney general to sue a state for deprivation of voting rights even if the individuals named initially as defendants—usually voting registrars—had left office. This provision remedied a situation that had arisen in a suit brought by the United States against Alabama voting officials. In addition, Title VI of the 1960 law authorized the appointment of special federal “voting referees” to oversee voter registration in counties where a federal court detected a pattern of voter discrimination.

The Civil Rights Act of 1964 mandated state adoption of standard procedures and requirements for all persons seeking to register to vote. The law also required local officials to justify rejecting an applicant who had completed the sixth grade or had equivalent evidence of intellectual competence. Other provisions of the 1964 law expedited the movement of voting rights cases to the Supreme Court.

In two cases brought under the 1964 act, United States v. Louisiana and United States v. Mississippi, the Supreme Court in 1965 sanctioned the government’s efforts to break the pattern of case-by-case litigation of voting rights violations. The Court upheld federal power to challenge a state’s entire constitutional legal framework for voter registration and conduct of elections.

The Voting Rights Act

But progress still was slow. In Dallas County, Alabama, three new federal laws and four years of litigation had produced the registration of only 383 black voters out of a potential pool of fifteen thousand. On March 8, 1965, the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. led a “Walk for Freedom” to dramatize the need for additional efforts in behalf of registering black voters in Selma, the county seat, and elsewhere in the South. The violence of the reaction of local white law enforcement officers and white bystanders to the peaceful demonstration drew nationwide attention to the dimensions of the problem.

A week later, President Lyndon B. Johnson addressed a joint session of Congress to ask for passage of a new voting rights measure to close legal loopholes that enabled local officials to stall black voter registration. Johnson explained that “no law that we now have on the books... can ensure the right to vote when local officials are determined to deny it.” Later that month, NAACP official Roy Wilkins appeared before a Senate committee on behalf of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights to urge Congress to “transform this retail litigation method of registration into a wholesale administration procedure registering all who seek to exercise their democratic birthright.” Within five months Congress had approved the sweeping Voting Rights Act of 1965.

The law suspended literacy tests and provided for the appointment of federal supervisors of voter registration in all states and counties where literacy tests or similar qualifying devices were in effect on November 1, 1964, and where fewer than 50 percent of the voting-age residents had registered to vote or voted in the 1964 presidential election.

The law established criminal penalties for persons found guilty of interfering with the voting rights of others. State or county governments in areas of low voter registration were required to obtain federal approval of any new voting laws, standards, practices, or procedures before implementing them. A state or county covered by the act could escape from the law’s provisions if it could persuade a three-judge federal court in the District of Columbia that no racial discrimination in registration or voting had occurred in the previous five years.

The act placed federal registration machinery in six southern states (Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Virginia), Alaska, twenty-eight counties in North Carolina, three counties in Arizona, and one in Idaho.

Passage of the Voting Rights Act heralded a significant increase in the number of blacks registered to vote. Within four years, almost a million blacks had registered to vote under its provisions. The Civil Rights Commission reported in 1968 that registration of blacks had climbed to more than 50 percent of the black voting-age population in every southern state. Before the act, black registration had exceeded 50 percent in only three: Florida, Tennessee, and Texas. The most dramatic increase occurred in Mississippi, where black registration rose from 6.7 percent to 59.8 percent of the voting-age population.<sup>11</sup>

Voting Law Extended

In renewing the act in 1970 for an additional five years, its supporters turned back the efforts of southern senators to dilute key provisions. State and local governments were forbidden to use literacy tests or other voter-qualifying devices, and the triggering formula was altered to apply to any state or county that used a literacy test for voting and where less than 50 percent of the voting-age residents were registered

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS FOR HOUSE AND SENATE ELECTIONS

ARTICLE I, SECTION 2

The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature.

No Person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined By adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

ARTICLE I, SECTION 3

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one Vote.

Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the second Year, of the second class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies.

No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

ARTICLE I, SECTION 4

The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators.

on November 1, 1968, or had voted in the 1968 general election.

Under the 1970 law, the preclearance requirement applied to those areas affected by the 1965 law and ten more: three Alaska districts; Apache County, Arizona; Imperial County, California; Elmore County, Idaho; the Bronx, Kings (Brooklyn), and New York (Manhattan) counties, New York; and Wheeler County, Oregon.

By the time the act was due for its second extension in 1975, an estimated two million black people had been added to the voting rolls in the South, more than doubling the previous total. The number of blacks holding elective office also increased. The Joint Center for Political Studies reported that the number of black elected officials in the seven southern states covered by the Voting Rights Act had gone up from fewer than one hundred in 1964 to 963 in just ten years. The total included one member of the House of Representatives, thirty-six state legislators, and 927 county and municipal officials.

The Voting Rights Act was renewed for seven years and substantially expanded in 1975. The triggering formula was amended to bring under coverage of the law any state or county that was using a literacy test in 1972 and where less than 50 percent of the residents eligible to vote had registered as of November 1, 1972. Two additional provisions gave greater protection to certain language minorities, defined as persons of Spanish heritage, Native Americans, Asian Americans, and Alaskan natives.

The federal preclearance provisions were expanded to apply to any jurisdiction where:

- The Census Bureau determined that more than 5 percent of the voting-age citizens were of a single language minority.
- Election materials had been printed only in English for the 1972 presidential election.
- Fewer than 50 percent of the voting-age citizens had registered for or voted in the 1972 presidential election.

These amendments significantly expanded coverage of the act, bringing in all of Alaska, Texas, and Arizona, and selected counties in several other states, including California and Florida. In addition, provisions were added requiring certain parts of the country to provide bilingual voting materials.

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different day.

ARTICLE I, SECTION 5

Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a smaller Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide.

AMENDMENT XIV

(RATIFIED JULY 28, 1868)

Section 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Congress approved a third extension of the act on June 23, 1982, two months before the law was due to expire. The 1982 legislation represented a major victory for a coalition of civil rights groups that included black, Hispanic, labor, religious, and civic organizations. Many of them had criticized President Ronald Reagan's administration for its hesitation and reservations about earlier versions and certain features of the measure.

However, the bill received widespread bipartisan support and strong backing from members of both chambers, including southerners. More than twice as many southern Democrats in both the Senate and House voted for passage in 1982 than in 1965 when the law was first approved. The steady upward trend in southern support for the act reflected changing social and political mores, and a great increase in black voting in the South.

The 1982 law had four main elements. First, it extended for twenty-five years provisions that required nine states and portions of thirteen others to obtain Justice Department approval for any changes in their election laws and procedures. Second, starting in 1984, a jurisdiction could be released from the restrictions by showing a clean voting

AMENDMENT XVII

(RATIFIED MAY 31, 1913)

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

AMENDMENT XX

(RATIFIED JANUARY 23, 1933)

Section 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

Section 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3rd day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

rights record for the previous ten years. Third, it overturned a 1980 Supreme Court ruling that "intent to discriminate" must be shown to prove a violation. Fourth, it extended the bilingual election provisions through 1992.

The requirement for Justice Department approval of election-law changes figured prominently in redistricting being carried out in the affected states on the basis of the 1990 census. While that proved to be a matter of considerable controversy, which continued even after the next census in 2000, there is little doubt that the Voting Rights Act has had a positive effect on the numbers of blacks winning elective office. According to the most recent compilation by the Joint Center for Political Studies as of early 2007, the number of black elected officials nationwide totaled 9,101. By comparison the number in 1970 was 1,469. The total in 2001 also included nearly 597 state legislators and one governor, more than 900 positions at the county level, just above 4,000 in municipal offices, 1,044 in judicial or law enforcement positions, and 1,937 in education offices. (These totals were from the fifty states, the District of Columbia, and the Virgin Islands.) In addition, as of early 2009, there were forty-one black House members and one black senator.

Black Voting Patterns

went to Democratic candidates. The 2006 black vote was 10 percent of the total, the same as in 1998 (flawed exit polls in 2002 were not made public). Census Bureau surveys showed that black turnout declined modestly over the twenty-five years from the 1982 midterm elections to 2006. From a high of 43 percent in 1982 the rate declined to 41 percent in 2006. Exit polls in 2006 indicated the turnout rate was 40.4 percent. Due to the interest in Obama's candidacy in 2008, black voter participation increased, according to exit polls, from 11 percent to 13 percent of the overall electorate. Obama won 95 percent of the black vote that year.

Not surprisingly, the unprecedented assertion of federal power over electoral and voting matters embodied in the Voting Rights Act was immediately challenged as exceeding the constitutional authority of Congress and encroaching on states' rights. But in 1966, in direct contrast to its post-Civil War rulings, the Supreme Court firmly backed the power of Congress to pass such a law. In that case, South Carolina v. Katzenbach, the state argued that Congress had exceeded its authority in suspending South Carolina voting standards, permitting the use of federal election examiners, and adopting a "triggering" formula that affected some states but not others. At the Court's invitation, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Virginia filed briefs in support of South Carolina's challenge. Twenty other states filed briefs in support of the law.

The Supreme Court rejected all constitutional challenges to the act. “Congress,” wrote Chief Justice Earl Warren for the decision’s 8–1 majority, “has full remedial powers [under the Fifteenth Amendment] to effectuate the constitutional prohibition against racial discrimination in voting.” The federal approval requirement for new voting rules in the states covered by the act, Warren observed, “may have been an uncommon exercise of congressional power, as South Carolina contends, but the Court has recognized that exceptional conditions can justify legislative measures not otherwise appropriate.”

Although the basic constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act was now settled, a steady stream of voting rights cases came to the Court in the late 1960s and the 1970s, testing the scope and application of the law. But the Court continued to back and broadly interpret the act. In the 1969 case of Gaston County v. United States, for example, the Court refused to let a North Carolina county reinstate a literacy test.

Some Exceptions Allowed

In 1975, however, the Court held in Richmond v. United States that a federally approved annexation plan did not violate the Voting Rights Act—even if it reduced the percentage of black voters in the city’s population—so long as there were legitimate reasons for the annexation. Despite its willingness to affirm the sweeping provisions of the 1965 law, the Court refused to interpret it as forbidding all use of racial criteria in legislative redistricting or as requiring that blacks be given proportional representation on elected bodies.

In a 1976 decision, Beer v. United States, the Court upheld a city’s reapportionment of the districts from which city council members were chosen. The change resulted in an increase in the number of black council members, but not in a proportional representation of black voters among the council members. The Court held that the Voting Rights Act was satisfied so long as such changes did not reduce the voting strength of racial minorities.

The next year, in United Jewish Organizations of Williamsburg v. Cary, the Court upheld New York’s 1974 redistricting law, which purposely redrew certain districts to give them nonwhite majorities. The county (Kings) affected in the case was one of three in New York that had been brought under the coverage of the Voting Rights Act by the 1970 amendments to that law. The Hasidic Jewish community of the Williamsburgh section of Brooklyn objected that the new boundaries divided their voting strength between two districts. The objectors argued that such use of racial criteria in the redistricting deprived them of equal protection guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment and diluted their voting strength in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment.

The Constitution did not prevent all use of racial criteria in districting and apportionment, wrote Justice Byron R. White for the seven-member Supreme Court majority in that case. Nor, he continued, did it “prevent a State subject to the Voting Rights Act from deliberately creating or preserving black majorities in particular districts in order to ensure that its reapportionment plan complies with [the act]...”

“There is no doubt,” White continued, that the state, in drawing new district lines, “deliberately used race in a purposeful manner. But its plan represented no racial slur or stigma with respect to whites or any other race, and we discern no discrimination violative of the Fourteenth Amendment nor any abridgment of the right to vote on account of race within the meaning of the Fifteenth Amendment.”

In the 1980 case of Mobile v. Bolden, the Court for the first time narrowed the reach of the Voting Rights Act. Justice Potter Stewart wrote on behalf of a 6–3 majority that the fact that no black person had ever been elected city commissioner in Mobile, Alabama, under the city’s challenged system of at-large elections was not enough to prove the system was in violation of the Voting Rights Act and the Constitution. “The Fifteenth Amendment does not entail the right to have Negro candidates elected,” Stewart wrote, but only guaranteed that blacks would be able to “register and vote without hindrance.”

Mobile Decision Overturned

The decision set off a reaction in Congress that resulted in specific language being written into the 1982 extension of the Voting Rights Act declaring that a voting practice or law that had the effect of discriminating was in violation of the federal law, whatever the local intent might have been. In 1986 the Court applied the new test to Thornburg v. Gingles, ruling that six of North Carolina’s multimember legislative districts impermissibly diluted the strength of black votes in the state. The fact that very few black candidates had been elected from those districts was enough to prove that the system was in violation of the law, the Court held.

In 1991 the Supreme Court relied on the 1982 revisions of the Voting Rights Act to rule that the act applied to the election of judges.

Later Court Decisions

Entering the 1990s, blacks and Hispanics were still underrepresented in Congress. To remedy this situation, the Justice Department sought to use the “preclearance” provision of the Voting Rights Act to encourage states with histories of minority voting rights violations to create so-called majority-minority districts—districts where black or Hispanic populations were in the majority. With newly drawn majority-minority districts, the 1992 election produced a large increase in the total of black and Hispanic House members. The number of blacks jumped from twenty-six to thirty-nine, the number of Hispanics from eleven to seventeen. But some of the districts were sharply criticized as a form of racial gerrymandering because of their irregular shapes, and the Supreme Court in 1993 demonstrated that these districts would come under tough legal scrutiny.

At issue in 1993 was a district that wound its way in a snakelike fashion through central North Carolina, picking up black neighborhoods in four metropolitan areas. The district, drawn at the urging of the Justice Department, was challenged by a group of white voters who alleged that North Carolina had set up “a racially discriminatory voting process” and deprived them of the right to vote in “a color-blind” election. Their suit was dismissed by a federal district court but reinstated by the Supreme Court in a 5–4 decision, Shaw v. Reno (1993).

In her opinion for the Court, Justice Sandra Day O’Connor acknowledged that racial considerations could not be excluded from the redistricting process. But she said that in “some exceptional cases” a plan could be “so highly irregular that, on its face, it rationally cannot be understood as anything other than an effort to segregate voters on the basis of race.” To justify such a plan, O’Connor said, the government must show that it is narrowly tailored to serve a compelling government interest.<sup>12</sup>

The Shaw v. Reno decision returned the case to a lower court for further hearings. Meanwhile, challenges to racially drawn redistricting plans were proceeding in other states, which the Court used to refine its position on racial redistricting. In 1995 the Court struck down a Georgia plan that had created three black-majority districts, including one that stretched from the Atlanta suburbs across half the state to the coastal city of Savannah. The 5–4 vote in Miller v. Johnson was the same as in the North Carolina case, but the Court made clear that challenges were not limited to plans with irregularly shaped districts.

Writing for the majority, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy argued that government should not treat citizens as members of a racial class, and he said that the Georgia map could not be justified on the grounds that it was necessary to comply with the Voting Rights Act because the Justice Department had incorrectly interpreted the law to require the maximum number of majority-black districts be created. Redistricting plans were subject to challenge, Kennedy said, if race was “the predominant factor motivating the legislature’s decision to place a significant number of voters within or without a particular district.”

The decision was widely criticized. President Bill Clinton called the ruling “a setback in the struggle to ensure that all Americans participate fully in the electoral process.” But the criticism did not sway the Court’s majority. In 1996 the same five-justice majority in Shaw v. Hunt rejected the serpentine North Carolina district that it had scrutinized in 1993, arguing that the state had neglected traditional districting criteria, such as compactness, while overemphasizing the importance of race. The Court in Bush v. Vera (1996) also found that Texas had improperly used racial considerations in the drawing of three congressional districts. District maps in parts of Florida, Louisiana, New York, and Virginia were also successfully challenged on the basis of race. The Court, however, let stand Illinois’ Hispanic majority-minority district after the state argued successfully that it had a “compelling state interest” in it.

Civil rights groups complained that the effect of the rulings would make it more difficult for minorities to be elected to Congress. But their warnings were tempered by the election results. In 1999 there were thirty-seven blacks in the House (down two from 1993) and eighteen Hispanics (up one from 1993). Similar results were seen in the elections in the first decade of the twenty-first century. At the beginning of the 111th Congress in 2009 there were forty-two blacks and twenty-seven Hispanics, not including nonvoting delegates. (See Chapter 20.) In addition, Obama had won the presidency in 2008, the first African American to do so.

In a setback for civil rights organizations, the Court ruled in January 2000 that governments covered by the Voting Rights Act can obtain federal approval for election law changes as long as the revisions do not leave minorities worse off than before. In an earlier related decision, in 1997 the Court said the Justice Department could not withhold approval solely because an election law change diluted minority voting strength. At issue was the law’s section requiring localities with a history of discrimination to obtain prior approval from Justice before making any change in voting practices or procedures.

In a 2003 case, however, the Court gave states subject to the law discretion to move blacks out of majority-minority districts if they offset the reduced voting strength with gains in minority groups’ political influence elsewhere. The ruling upheld a legislative districting plan in Georgia, written by Democrats, that moved blacks out of majority-minority districts to increase Democratic voting strength in adjoining districts.

In 2006 the Court ruled in a matter involving a redistricting plan in Texas that had been spearheaded several years earlier by powerful Republican Rep. Tom DeLay, in an effort to maximize the number of House seats in the state held by the GOP. The Court upheld the bulk of the Texas plan but also ruled that a geographically large district represented by a Hispanic Republican was in violation of the Voting Rights Act.

The Voting Rights Act was reauthorized for twenty-five years in 2006. In 2009 the Court ducked a challenge to the law’s key section that required many jurisdictions, mostly in the South, to have federal oversight of election practices because of past discriminatory actions. But the court appeared skeptical of the need for continued oversight, which observers said could mean the statute would face future challenges.

WOMEN’S VOTE: A VICTORY IN STAGES

The drive for women’s suffrage, which began in the late 1830s, was closely related in the beginning to the movement for abolition of slavery. Women, because of their extensive legal disadvantages under the common law, often compared their lot to that of slaves and thus directed the bulk of their political activity against proposals for extending slavery. Women were disfranchised at every level of government. Only in New Jersey did they have a theoretical right to vote. That right had been included inadvertently in the state constitutions of 1776 and 1797, but the state legislature repealed the provision at the outset of the nineteenth century when some women actually attempted to vote.

Early victories for the women’s suffrage movement came mostly in connection with school elections. Kentucky in 1838 gave the right to vote in such elections to widows and unmarried women with property that was subject to taxation for school purposes. Kansas in 1861 gave women the vote on all school questions, and by 1880 Michigan, Utah, Minnesota, Colorado, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts had followed suit.

Supporters of the Nineteenth Amendment—giving women the right to vote—picket the White House in 1916. The Nineteenth Amendment was ratified in 1920.

The Woman's Rights Convention at Seneca Falls, New York, in July 1848 is generally cited as the beginning of the women's suffrage movement in the United States. But the Declaration of Principles, which Elizabeth Cady Stanton read at that meeting and which thereafter became a sacred text for the movement, was a much broader and more revolutionary document than a simple claim for the franchise.

Steps toward the Vote

Direct-action tactics first were applied by suffragists shortly after the Civil War, when Susan B. Anthony urged women to go to the polls and claim the right to vote under terms of the newly adopted Fourteenth Amendment. In the national elections of 1872, Anthony voted in her home city of Rochester, New York; she subsequently was tried and convicted of the crime of "voting without having a lawful right to vote." For almost a quarter of a century, Anthony and her followers pressed Congress for a constitutional amendment granting women's suffrage. On January 25, 1887, the Senate finally considered the proposal but rejected it by a 16–34 vote.

The suffrage forces had more success in some western states. As a territory, Wyoming extended full suffrage to women in 1869 and retained it upon becoming a state in 1890. Colorado, Utah, and Idaho granted women voting rights before the turn of the century. But after that the advocates of suffrage for women encountered stronger opposition, and it was not until the height of the Progressive movement that other states, mostly in the West, gave women full voting rights. Washington granted equal suffrage in 1910, California in 1911, Arizona, Kansas, and Oregon in 1912, Montana and Nevada in 1914, and New York in 1917.

Opponents argued that women were the "weaker sex," that their temperament was unsuited to make the kinds of decisions necessary in casting a ballot, and that suffrage might alter the relationship between the sexes. In the two decades preceding women's enfranchisement, extravagant claims were made by extremists on both sides. Radical feminists often insisted that women voters would be able to cleanse American politics of its corruption and usher in some ill-defined, utopian golden age. Antifranchise forces were as far-reaching in their claims. During World War I, Henry A. Wise Wood, president of the Aero Club of America, told the House Committee on Woman Suffrage that giving women the vote would mean "the dilution with the qualities of the cow of the qualities of the bull upon which all the herd's safety must depend." The January 1917 issue of Remonstrance, an antisuffrage journal, cautioned that women's suffrage would lead to the nationalization of women, free love, and communism.<sup>13</sup>

Constitutional Amendment

On the eve of World War I, the advocates of militant tactics took the lead in a national campaign for women's rights. In the congressional elections of 1914, they set out to defeat all Democratic candidates in the nine states (which had increased to eleven by election day) where women had the right to vote. They held the majority Democrats in Congress responsible for not submitting a constitutional amendment to the states for their approval of women's voting rights. Only twenty of the forty-three challenged candidates were elected. However, this showing of electoral strength did not move President Woodrow Wilson to take up their cause.

President Wilson's opposition to a constitutional amendment prompted a series of stormy demonstrations by the suffragettes around the White House and other sites in Washington after the United States had entered World War

I. The demonstrators insisted that it was unconscionable for this country to be denying its female citizens a right to participate in government while at the same time it was fighting a war on the premise of “making the world safe for democracy.”

At the direction of the administration, thousands of the women demonstrators were arrested and brought to trial. Some were beaten by hostile crowds—often made up of soldiers and sailors who viewed the demonstrations as unpatriotic. At their trials, many of the women stood mute or made speeches advocating suffrage and attacking President Wilson for his refusal to endorse the constitutional amendment.

The jailing of many of these women caused a severe housing problem for District of Columbia penal authorities and created a wave of sympathy for the suffragettes. Public support for their position was heightened by the prisoners’ claims that they had been treated inhumanely and had been subjected to unsanitary conditions in prison. To protest these conditions, some of the prisoners went on a hunger strike, and the authorities resorted to forced feeding, an action that aroused even greater public sympathy.

President Wilson capitulated, announcing on January 9, 1918, his support for the proposed suffrage amendment. The House approved it the next day by a 274–136 vote, one vote more than the necessary two-thirds majority. But the Senate fell short of the two-thirds majority in October 1918 and again in February 1919. However, when the Congress elected in November 1918 met for the first time on May 19, 1919, it took little more than two weeks to gain the required majorities in both chambers.

On August 18, 1920, Tennessee became the thirty-sixth state to approve the amendment, enough for ratification. On August 26, Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby signed a proclamation formally adding the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution. It stated simply that “The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of sex.”

In the 1920 presidential election, the first in which women could vote, it was estimated that only about 30 percent of those who were eligible actually voted. Analyses of the 1924 election indicated that scarcely one-third of all eligible women voted while more than two-thirds of the eligible men had done so. The women’s electoral performance came as a bitter blow to the suffragists. In more recent national elections, however, surveys by the Census Bureau have found that voting participation by women is about the same as that of men.

Even so, by 2006 women’s representation in Congress was well below half although their numbers continued to increase: in the 110th Congress, which began in 2007, seventy-one women served in the House and sixteen in the Senate. In addition, three additional women represented Guam, the Virgin Islands, and the District of Columbia. At the start of the 111th Congress, in 2009, there were seventeen women in the Senate and seventy-four in the House, plus the three delegates from Guam, the Virgin Islands, and the District of Columbia, marking a record number of women in Congress.

The 110th Congress also saw an historic first: Rep. Nancy Pelosi, a Democratic representative from the San Francisco area of California, was elected Speaker of the House, the first time in history that a woman had risen to that position. She was reelected to the post for the 111th Congress, which began in January 2009.

The 2008 presidential election saw for the first time a female contender for the White House with a reasonable chance of winning. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former first lady who was serving her second term as a Democratic senator from New York, fell short, losing in the Democratic primary to eventual presidential victor Barack Obama. She waged a long, drawn-out battle, but her candidacy inspired many women voters to participate in the electoral process. Also in 2008, Alaska governor Sarah Palin became the first woman on a Republican national ticket when presidential nominee John McCain chose her as his running mate (Geraldine Ferraro had been Walter Mondale’s running mate on the Democratic ticket in 1984).

THE EIGHTEEN-YEAR-OLD VOTE

Twenty-one was the minimum voting age in every state until 1943, when Georgia lowered it to eighteen—the age at which young men were being drafted to fight in World War II. The slogan “Old enough to fight, old enough to vote” had a certain logic and public appeal. But no other state followed Georgia’s lead until after the war. In 1946 South Carolina Democrats authorized eighteen-year-olds to vote in party primaries, but later withdrew that privilege. In 1955 Kentucky voters lowered the voting age to eighteen. Alaska and Hawaii, upon entering the Union in 1959, adopted minimum voting ages of nineteen and twenty, respectively.

Meanwhile, in 1954, President Dwight D. Eisenhower had proposed a constitutional amendment granting eighteen-year-olds the right to vote nationwide, but the proposal was rejected by the Senate. Eventually Congress was persuaded—perhaps by the demographics of America’s fast-expanding youth population, which during the 1960s had begun to capture the nation’s attention; perhaps by the separate hopes of Republicans and Democrats to win new voters; perhaps by the Vietnam War in which the young were called on to fight again. In the Voting Rights Act of 1970, Congress added a provision to lower the voting age to eighteen in all federal, state, and local elections, effective January 1, 1971.

On signing the bill into law, President Richard Nixon restated his belief that the provision was unconstitutional because Congress had no power to extend suffrage by statute, and directed Attorney General John N. Mitchell to ask for a swift court test of the law's validity. The Supreme Court, ruling in Oregon v. Mitchell only weeks before the law was due to take effect, sustained its application to federal elections but held it unconstitutional in regard to state and local elections.

After the Court ruled, Congress wasted little time in approving and sending to the states a proposed Twenty-sixth Amendment to the Constitution, stating: "The right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of age. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." The proposal received final congressional approval March 23, 1971, and was ratified by the necessary three-fourths of the states by July 1, record time for a constitutional amendment.

More than 25 million Americans became eligible to vote for the first time in the 1972 presidential election. It was the biggest influx of potential voters since women won the right to vote in 1920. But the younger age group has not fulfilled its potential power at the polls; in election after election, younger voters have had the lowest turnout rate of any age category.

The Census Bureau, however, reported that young adults in the eighteen- to twenty-four-year-old-range showed a substantial increase in both registration and voting between the 2000 and 2004 national elections. Its voter survey showed that between those two elections the registration rate increase 7 percentage points and the voting rate increased 11 percentage points. Exit polls for the 2008 race indicated that youth voter turnout was up slightly, due in large part to Obama's appeal to young people and their enthusiasm for his candidacy.

REMOVING OBSTACLES TO VOTING

In the late twentieth century the federal government and the states took steps to increase participation in the electoral process. The Voting Rights Act of 1970 helped pave the way in removing residency restrictions on new voters. Another major federal initiative, the "motor-voter" law of 1993, was designed to increase the ease of voter registration. Other measures to increase voter turnout came at the state level, with a number of states experimenting with new voting methods, such as mail-in ballots.

Reducing Residency Requirements

Every state at some time has imposed a minimum period of residence in the state (and some of them a shorter period of residence in a county or voting district) as a qualification for voting. The rationale for this practice has been that individuals cannot vote intelligently, at least on state and local affairs, until they have lived in an area for a given period of time. Until the 1970s most of the states required one year's residence for voting. At one time or another, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Rhode Island, and South Carolina required residency of as much as two years.

In 1970 thirty-three states imposed residency requirements of one year, fifteen required six months, and two

(New York and Pennsylvania) three months. As another condition for voting in 1970, every state except New Hampshire required voters to have lived in the same county or voting district for a stipulated period of time. The most stringent of these requirements were in Maryland and Texas, where six months was required in the county and voting district.

Federal voting rights legislation in 1970 permitted voting in presidential elections after thirty days of residence. This provision, upheld by the Supreme Court, extended the franchise to about five million people who might otherwise have been disqualified from voting in the 1972 presidential election. Soon thereafter the Court decided (Dunn v. Blumstein) that a state cannot constitutionally restrict the franchise to persons who lived in the state at least one year and in the county at least three months. The 6–1 opinion, rendered March 21, 1972, caused all the states to change their residency requirements. By 1980 nineteen states and the District of Columbia had no minimum residency requirement, and no other state imposed more than a thirty-day residence requirement except Arizona, which required fifty days. Ten years later, Arizona lowered its requirement to twenty-nine days.<sup>14</sup>

Voters Living Abroad

In 1976 President Gerald R. Ford signed legislation establishing uniform voting procedures for American citizens who lived overseas. The law gave Americans abroad the right to vote by absentee ballot in federal elections in the state in which they had their last voting address. The Senate Rules Committee had reported in May 1975 that studies showed that “nearly all of these private citizens outside of the United States in one way or another are strongly discouraged, or are even barred by the rules of the states of their last domicile, from participation in presidential and congressional elections.”<sup>15</sup>

In 1978 Congress approved legislation that prevented states from using evidence that an American living overseas voted in a state or federal election as proof of residency for tax purposes. Sponsors said many Americans living abroad did not vote because they feared they might have to pay additional taxes.

In 2008 the issue was focused on members of the military who were outside the United States. A January 2009 study by the Pew Center on the States, titled “No Time to Vote: Challenges Facing America’s Overseas Military Voters,” charged that “more than a third of states do not provide military voters stationed abroad with enough time to vote or are at high risk of not providing enough time.”

Election Reform: New Efforts

Efforts to update the country’s voting system have challenged voting experts and politicians for decades. They have struggled to reconcile the need for accessibility, to allow the greatest number of eligible voters access to the polls, while also ensuring that the voting system remains secure and immune to fraud and cheating. These efforts were sparked by the chaos surrounding the 2000 election, although some related reforms already had been made.

With the exception of North Dakota, all states require a person to register before being allowed to vote. Consequently, numerous organizations including political parties, interest groups, and citizen organizations have increasingly focused on getting individuals on the voting rolls well in advance of election day.

In most Western nations government agencies sign up voters, but the United States places the burden for qualifying for electoral participation on the citizen. Although the procedure is still somewhat cumbersome, a variety of state and federal legislation, capped by the National Voter Registration Act or so-called motor-voter legislation, and the 2002 Help America Vote Act have made voter registration a higher profile activity and in many ways more convenient.

Signed into law by President Bill Clinton on May 20, 1993, motor-voter required states to provide all eligible citizens the opportunity to register when they applied for or renewed a driver’s license. It also required states to allow mail-in registration and to provide voter registration forms at agencies that supplied public assistance, such as welfare checks or help for people with disabilities. Compliance with the federally mandated program was required by 1995. Costs were to be borne by the states.

Partly as a result of the legislation, a record number of new voters, some ten million, signed up in the first three years following implementation of the act. By the 2004 elections, the Census Bureau reported that 142 million Americans who were eligible to vote were registered.

Congressional Republicans had opposed the legislation on political grounds, primarily because they believe that it would allow citizens of traditional Democratic constituencies—the urban poor and minorities, among others—easier access to the voting booth. Opponents also argued that easier registration could lead to election fraud.

But motor-voter had neither the negative results that critics feared nor the positive impact that supporters hoped. One year after the law was enacted, Republicans won control of both houses of Congress; they retained control of the House until January 2007 and held the Senate for most of that same period. Meanwhile, in spite of the increased number of registered voters, election turnout continued to decline until the elections starting in 2000.

For the 2004 election, according to the Census Bureau’s survey for that year, 19 percent of registered voters obtained their registration while getting a driver’s license or identification card at a motor vehicle department. This was second to registrations done at a county or other government registration office, a quarter of the registered total.

Election Reform after 2000

In the wake of the disputed 2000 presidential election, many lawmakers and others decided that it was time to take a hard look at the country's voting system. Images of poll watchers in Florida examining hanging chads, black-robed judges weighing the fate of the state's vote tally, and, most importantly, the nation—and the world—remaining uncertain for more than a month after election day of the identity of the next president sparked an interest in reforming the election process.

Among the various commissions formed was the National Commission on Federal Election Reform, headed by former presidents Gerald R. Ford and Jimmy Carter under the auspices of the Century Foundation. The panel released a report in August 2001; among its recommendations were that each state should have a statewide system of voter registration, that each state should allow provisional voting by any voter claiming to be qualified to vote there, that Congress should pass legislation to hold federal elections on holidays, and that Congress should approve legislation to make absentee voting easier.

On October 29, 2002, just days before the midterm elections, President George W. Bush signed the Help America Vote Act of 2002 into law. The measure authorized almost $3.9 billion over three years to help states meet new federal election standards. It called for the federal government to assist states in purchasing new voting equipment and training poll workers and election officials. It also mandated that states allow voters to cast provisional ballots if the voter's eligibility was in question and correct mistakes on their ballots before leaving the polling location. It also included provisions against voter fraud, stating that first-time voters would need to show a driver's license or give the last four digits of their Social Security number. Voters registering by mail would need to show a photo identification card or document that verified their name and address.<sup>16</sup>

"The vitality of America's democracy depends on the fairness and accuracy of America's elections," Bush said in remarks at the signing ceremony for the bill. "When problems arise in the administration of elections, we have a responsibility to fix them. Every registered voter deserves to have confidence that the system is fair and elections are honest, that every vote is recorded and that the rules are consistently applied."

The bill had passed overwhelmingly in Congress, 92–2 in the Senate and 357–48 in the House, following partisan fights and negotiations that lasted for months. Most of the provisions were designed to take effect in the few years following Bush's signing of the law.

Among the changes put into place by the Help America Vote Act was the creation of a federal Election Assistance Commission. Its mandate included providing technical assistance in federal election administration, administering payments to states to meet the law's requirements, and developing a national program for testing and certification of voting systems.

The Help America Vote Act was mostly an outgrowth of the controversies that swirled around the contentious 2000 national election—the closest and perhaps the most hotly debated presidential election in modern U.S. history—but also of election problems that had been obvious to voting officials for years. By the turn of the twenty-first century states were also experimenting with various other measures designed to increase voter turnout, including election-day voter registration, easier absentee balloting, and elections by mail.

In the late 1970s President Carter proposed federal legislation to allow voters to register at the polls on election day, but it was not enacted. Several states, though, have adopted election-day registration on their own, including Minnesota. In 1998, when Reform Party candidate Jesse Ventura closed fast to win the Minnesota governorship, more than 330,000 citizens registered to vote on election day (which represented 16 percent of the ballots cast). As of October 2008, according to the National Association of Secretaries of State, eight states (Idaho, Iowa, Maine, Minnesota, Montana, New Hampshire, Wisconsin, and Wyoming) allowed election-day registration, three others (Alaska, Connecticut, and Rhode Island) allowed it for voters wishing to vote for president, and North Carolina offered it during its early voting period but not on election day. Of the remaining states, most required registration twenty to thirty days before an election but others set the deadline at fifteen or fewer days before the polls opened.

Because many potential voters do not have the time or capability to travel to the polls on a given day absentee voting gained wider acceptance in the first years of the new century, with Western states taking the lead. As of 2008, more than half the states had an "early voting" option, including "no-fault" absentee voting open to all voters with no need to plead sickness, disability, or any other reason for wanting to vote before election day. In recent years, a few states, such as Colorado, Texas, and Tennessee, tried opening voting-style booths before election day in stores or other public places.

Some states have tested another alternative: dispensing with voting booths altogether and conducting elections by mail to encourage higher participation. Proponents argue that the benefits of voting by mail—including convenience, speed, and lower costs—outweigh the disadvantages, including the possible abuse of the system, and the lost sociability that comes with gathering at the polls.

By the 2004 election, according to the Census Bureau's survey that year, 80 percent of voters reported they voted on election day and 20 percent voted earlier, either in person or by mail. More than 12 percent of those votes were by mail. Oregon led the way to mail voting, starting with using mail-in votes to fill a vacant Senate seat in 1996. The winner was Democrat Ron Wyden, the first senator elected by mail. The new procedure, begun that year, received good reviews. More than three-quarters of Oregonians polled said they preferred voting by mail over going to the polling places. Women and older voters were strongest in favor of mail voting.

Oregon subsequently became the first state to decide to hold all elections by mail, approving a ballot measure in 1998 requiring vote by mail in biennial primary and general elections. The measure eliminated polling places, but it did not affect existing law allowing absentee ballots or voting at local election offices. By October 2008 thirty-seven of Washington state's thirty-nine counties had vote-by-mail-only systems; overall, seven states had jurisdictions where vote-by-mail was the primary form of voting.

The bitterly contested 2000 presidential election exposed serious flaws not just in how Americans cast their ballots, but in how the news media project and report the results. In the aftermath of the thirty-six-day Florida count-down, there was broad agreement that both systems needed overhauling. In Congress, state legislatures, and network television boardrooms, proposals for change abounded. Many of the changes were made in time for the 2004 elections. These changes proved, however, not to be a panacea. There were widespread complaints in 2004 that the new, computerized voting machines lost votes or gave them to the wrong candidate, with no way to prove the mistakes because the devices left no "paper trail" for a recount.

Voting Systems

- Punch Cards. Among all the proposals for reforming voting systems, the one that seemed to command the widest agreement was phasing out the obsolescent punch cards widely used in 2000 in Florida and in much of the nation. The technology, introduced in the 1960s, features the infamous chad, the tiny bit of paper that the voter punches out with a stylus to indicate his or her candidate choice. Failure to dislodge the chad fully (leaving it "hanging" or "dimpled") can lead to the vote's not being counted by the electronic reader.

The lack of standards for discerning the voter's intent by visual inspection of punch-card ballots was at the heart of Florida's recount problem and the U.S. Supreme Court's action in Bush v. Gore, which halted the spectacle of election officials holding ballots up to the light, looking for dented or incompletely detached chads. Florida counties using punch cards reported about 4 percent of six million ballots cast (240,000 ballots) were void, four times the rate of counties using optical scanning systems.

Nationwide, two basically similar punch-card systems, the Votomatic and the Datavote, were still in widespread use in 2004. According to the Federal Election Commission (FEC), 18.6 percent of voters used punch-card systems in 2004, down from 37.0 percent in 2000.

- Optical Scans. The most common voting system in 2004 was the increasingly popular marksense or optical scanning device used by 32.2 percent of voters. In marksense systems, the voter uses a marker to fill in an incomplete arrow or other empty block to indicate candidate choice on a ballot card. The card is then fed into a device that "reads" the card and tabulates the votes.

An advantage of optical scan over punch cards is that the cards leave a "paper trail" that can be inspected in a manual recount. Ballots spoiled by overvotes or marks outside the designated areas are rejected by the machine and deposited by precinct officials in a locked receptacle. The voter is then given a new ballot, which the machine reads and stores if the new card is properly filled out. In case of a manual recount, the voted ballot cards can be tabulated with little or no guesswork as to the voter's intent. Nevertheless, this is not a fool-proof system. A disputed 2008 Senate race in Minnesota, which was so close it was not resolved until June 30, 2009, when the state's highest court ruled for the challenger, involved contested ballots. Many of those were never counted.

- Mechanical Lever Machines. Other than paper ballots, lever machines are the oldest type of voting system. One invented by Jacob H. Myers, a maker of safes, was first officially used at Lockport, New York, in 1892, twenty-three years after Thomas A. Edison patented a similar machine. By the 1930s voting machines were being used in almost all major U.S. cities.

The machine booths typically featured a large lever that closed a privacy curtain as the voter entered. The voter pressed small levers to indicate candidate choices, or a larger lever to vote a straight party ticket. The lever that closed the curtain also opened it, returned the levers to their unvoted position, and rotated counters to record the vote. When the polls closed the machines were sealed to prevent tampering in case of a recount.

In the 2004 presidential election 12.8 percent of voters used mechanical voting machines. But these machines were no longer being made, and computer-based systems were rapidly taking their place.

- Paper Ballots. Before voting machines came into widespread use, most states adopted a type of government-printed ballot introduced in Australia in 1876. It gave voters more privacy by sparing them the need to ask for a party-printed ballot. In the age of computers, 6.0 percent of U.S. voters in 2004 still used paper ballots, primarily in small communities. Absentee voting was also largely by paper ballot. One state, Oregon, was conducting all elections by mail.

- Direct Recording Electronic. Called DRE for short, these are the newest voting systems. They display choices that the voter enters by touch-screen, button, or rotation device. A keyboard may be provided for write-in votes. The voter's choices are directly recorded in electronic memory and added to the totals for each candidate. According to the FEC, 28.9 percent of voters used DREs in 2004.
- Mixed. The remaining 1.5 percent of voters in 2004 were in jurisdictions using combinations of old and new voting technologies.

Polls taken after the 2000 election showed broad public support for a stronger federal role in election administration. Many voters indicated they were unaware that states set most of the voting rules, even for presidential and congressional elections. A Washington Post–ABC News poll showed most Americans favored moving toward a national voting system, including a standard ballot design, a uniform poll closing time, and consistent rules for manual recounts.

Many reform bills proposed funding for studies or modernization of equipment. Florida officials estimated it would cost $25 million to replace punch-card systems in twenty-four counties. In states where election officials were elected, as in Florida, reformers called for switching to bipartisan or nonpartisan appointed boards.

Although computer voting raised privacy and security concerns, prospects were bright for increased use of Internet voting systems. Arizona pioneered in this area in its 2000 Democratic primary, which gave voters a choice of using paper ballots, computer terminals, or mail-in ballots. The innovation produced a record turnout.

Media Projections

The news media's past success in calling election results minutes after the polls close was based on exit polling, a relatively new technique. Through 2004, exit polls had been widely used in only six presidential elections. Until the system went spectacularly wrong in Florida in 2000, it had been remarkably accurate. But it took only that one embarrassment to force the media to reexamine themselves and promise changes to ensure the Florida mistake would not be repeated.

The reporting troubles began at 7:47 p.m. on November 7, 2000, when the networks called Vice President Al Gore the winner in Florida. About two hours later, they began retracting the call for Gore. At 2:16 a.m., some networks projected Texas governor Bush as the winner; they later retracted in a race too close to call.

Most of the projections were based on data from Voter News Service (VNS), a consortium formed by the Associated Press and the ABC, CBS, CNN, Fox, and NBC networks. Until 2000 VNS had only one other major error—in 1996 when for a time it projected a Democrat as the upset winner of a U.S. Senate seat in New Hampshire.

Warren Mitofsky, a former Census Bureau statistician hired by CBS, is credited with developing exit polling in the 1960s. By interviewing many thousands of citizens just after they have voted, pollsters could accurately predict election results without waiting for the official vote count. They also could gain some insight into why the voters acted as they did, along with indications of how the vote divided along lines of age, sex, race, religion, and income.

Before the formation of VNS, Jimmy Carter's decision to concede to Ronald Reagan in the 1980 presidential race at about 10:00 p.m. eastern time on election day, while polls were still open in California, aroused controversy about exit polls and the networks' decisions to "declare" winners early. Some felt that this practice discouraged voters who had not yet cast their ballots because they thought their votes could not make a difference.

A few states subsequently tried to ban exit polls by creating so-called no-First-Amendment-zones near voting places, making it difficult if not impossible for poll takers to identify and interview people who had just voted. But the courts ruled that First Amendment free speech and free press rights cannot be excluded from selected areas.

Congress considered similar legislation, but none was passed. In 1985 the broadcast networks pledged to Congress that they would not release exit poll results from a state until the polls closed there. The premature, erroneous call for Gore in Florida in 2000, as in the national 1980 case, drew criticism because it came while people were still voting in the state's mostly Republican western panhandle, in the central time zone. Although voting in the state's large eastern time zone had already closed, some potential voters in the panhandle said they stayed home after hearing Gore had "won" Florida.

What caused the wrong call? VNS managers said it was "a combination of many factors," including an unexpected increase in absentee ballots and possible underestimation of the black and Cuban votes. The later call for Bush, also wrong, was based on incorrect data from Volusia County and underestimating Palm Beach County's outstanding votes, the report said. VNS founder Mitofsky, an election night analyst for CBS and CNN, said later he probably would have made the same call for Gore again. "Every bit of information we had was clearly pointing to a Gore call." That information was based on actual vote totals, he said, so exit polls were "not the source of the problem."

In early 2001 ABC, CBS, and NBC promised not to declare winners in future elections in any state until all of its polls are closed. Members of Congress were skeptical, saying they had heard the same thing in 1985. The networks also pledged they would review VNS's performance and make changes in their coverage, including more explanations of exit polling and how races are called.

In 2004, under new guidelines and a new consortium, the National Election Pool, the networks again paid thousands of dollars for exit polling, again with seriously flawed results. Two firms, Edison Media Research of New Jersey and Mitofsky International of New York, collected the pool data, which were to be released to the networks in six batches, beginning at 1 p.m. on election day. The networks had pledged to withhold these figures from televised reports until polls had closed in that state. Soon after the first scheduled release, the results began appearing on the Internet. They had been leaked to blogs, short for Web logs, operated by independent journalists or commentators. They showed the Democratic challenger, John Kerry, leading in swing states that President Bush actually carried.

What went wrong this time? In a postelection report and interviews, the two pollsters in charge, Joe Lenski of Edison Media and Mitofsky, suggested several reasons: that exit pollers were too far away to interview voters, that Democrats were more willing to be interviewed than were Republican voters, that Republicans may have snubbed the poll takers because of perceived media bias, that too few women were included in the samples, and that bloggers who disseminated the leaked data did not fully understand what they were putting on the Web.

But the exist polling business got better marks in the subsequent elections. In the 2008 national elections the system performed better than earlier.

Elections in 2006 and 2008

The midterm congressional elections in 2006 were the first held after the 2002 Help America Vote Act was fully in force. The elections were widely considered a success because only one race was challenged over registration or voting irregularities that could have changed the outcome. In Florida's 13th district, the race was decided by 369 votes, with Republican Vern Buchanan declared the winner. He was sworn in at the beginning of the 110th Congress. The loser, Democrat Christine Jennings, contested the outcome, charging that it was skewed by electronic voting machine errors. Jennings filed suit in a Florida court. A task force of the House Administration Committee also was looking into the dispute in mid-2007, but the following year, the House dismissed Jennings's challenge. Buchanan defeated Jennings in a 2008 rematch.

But voter activist groups pointed to problems in numerous jurisdictions in 2006, including incorrect registration information, voter identification rules requiring photo identification cards, voting machine problems and insufficient ballots, poorly trained or absent poll workers, and long waiting lines. Nevertheless, the potential voting catastrophe that some observers had predicted, partly from major issues that surfaced during 2006 primaries, did not materialize. Preliminary studies after the November 2008 voting indicated that the elections system in place also operated relatively smoothly.

The controversial voter identification requirements in Indiana and Georgia, requiring a government issued photo identification card, proved to be less of an issue that originally feared as voter turnout increased relative to 2004. Critics of the identification card requirements, however, said the increased turnout was not a full measure because it did not account for voters who may have stayed away from the polls because they lacked a picture identification card.

A challenge to the Indiana law, Crawford v. Marion County Election Board, rose to the Supreme Court, which decided in April 2008 in favor of Indiana. The justices turned aside arguments that the Indiana law made it difficult for the poor and members of minority groups. In October 2008 the Court also ruled on another voting case, Brunner v. Ohio Republican Party, that had direct bearing on the ability to challenge voters' eligibility. The state Republican Party had sued the state secretary of state, Democrat Jennifer Brunner, to compel her to provide local officials with information about any mismatching data that could make it more difficult for a given voter to cast a ballot. The Supreme Court overturned a lower court ruling that had sided with the state Republicans. Ohio had been a highly contested state in 2004, with the Republican Bush narrowly winning its electoral votes; it was a battleground again in 2008, but this time the Democrat Obama won.

Voting machines also turned out to be less of an issue than feared. Some electronic machines, in the words of one observer, began to "show their age," but few serious problems were reported, even in areas using the most advance touch screen equipment.

Nevertheless, that nation experienced the first drop in the use of electronic voting equipment, according to a study released in October 2008 by the group Election Data Services. The percentage of registered voters using electronic voting equipment declined from 37.6 percent in 2006 to 32.6 percent in 2008. The group reported that more than 58.9 percent of U.S. counties would use optical scan voting systems in the 2008 election, representing more than 56.2 percent of registered voters, up from 49.6 percent of voters using that system in 2006. In addition, 0.10 percent of voters would use punch cards, 6.7 percent lever machines, and 0.2 percent hand-counted paper ballots; 4.2 percent lived in counties with mixed systems in use.

Meanwhile, various states around the country were trying new methods to make voting more accessible while retaining measures of security. The National Association of Secretaries of State (NASS), in a fall 2008 study, reported that the task was large, given that the country had approximately 7,800 local election jurisdictions, 200,000 polling sites, two million poll workers, and 125 million voters. NASS noted that twenty-four states were conducting public outreach campaigns in advance of the voting, focusing particularly on new voters. Thirty-seven states provided toll-free voter hotlines for comments and questions; and half the states were working to get voters familiar with the equipment they would be using. The NASS report also said that most states accept requests for ballots by fax, phone, or e-mail, and that eleven states allow a voter to return his or her ballot via e-mail.

Early voting also was introduced on a larger scale than ever before in 2008. An estimated 38 million early votes were cast in those states that allowed persons to cast ballots prior to the normal November election day. But whether early voting, and other “convenience voting” such as no excuse absentee voting, election-day registration, and all types of mail balloting, increased voter participation remained controversial. Political analyst Curtis Gans said 2008 convenience voting did not help turnout and may have hurt. Gans argued that in most years—1998 was an exception—“states which adopt these reforms have a worse performance in the aggregate than those who do not.” He added that election-day registration, however, did tend to help turnout.

The exit polling business also was getting ready for election day, trying to overcome problems of the past. In an October 29, 2008, interview with the Pew Research Center’s Andrew Kohut, Edison Media Research’s Joe Lenski said that his group was working to avoid previous problems. Among the steps they had taken: finding older interviewers, giving networks more historical data, and adhering to a 5 p.m. quarantine before disseminating its findings to the news organizations. Unlike recent elections, the exit polling that was done on election day went relatively smoothly with none of the huge mistakes of earlier years.

Voter registration and polling place delays were important concerns for 2008. Although the election was marked in some places by long lines, overall there seemed to be fewer problems than in the previous two presidential elections, perhaps due to the scrutiny the election officials were under.

Even with the relative smoothness of 2008 voting experts said that many issues remained. Among these were:

- Poll Workers. Better screening and much enhanced training was needed for the persons hired to run the voting booths on election day, especially as registration verification and voting systems became more complex.
- Poll Watchers. These are groups, usually associated with political parties, that are present outside polling places who are sometimes confused by voters as being election officials. Poll watchers historically emerged to challenge potential voter fraud, with individuals from all parties keeping watch on others. But local officials were increasingly worried that voters might be intimidated by challenges from these groups.
- Voter Registration Groups. Another concern of voting analysts is the role played by organizations formed, or hired, to register voters. While getting more people registered to vote is desirable in principle, there were increasing instances of registration groups innocently or intentionally misusing the registration information they gathered, such as by turning in only names they think support their interests or creating false registrations that election officials have inadequate time to check.

Campaign Finance

CAMPAIGN FINANCE changed dramatically during the past century, going from its early free-wheeling days to a heavily regulated system. Campaigns now must disclose where their money comes from and how it is spent. Contributors must adhere to specific limits on how much they can give to federal candidates. Detailed campaign reports are available for public scrutiny, even on the Internet. Presidential candidates have the option of limiting their election spending in return for public funds. Campaigns have to hire lawyers and bookkeepers just to comply with federal laws.

The changes have, indeed, been striking. Yet the similarities have been striking as well. Demands for reform at the beginning of the twentieth century sounded much the same as those voiced at the end. Reformers still were calling for curbs on the ability of special interests and wealthy individuals to dominate the flow of campaign money and for disclosure of the sources and uses of money moving outside federal disclosure requirements.

Some of these calls were answered at the beginning of the twenty-first century with the passage of the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA)—also called the McCain-Feingold act after its two Senate sponsors, John McCain of Arizona and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin. That law's primary goals were to ban unlimited and basically unregulated "soft" money contributions to the national political parties, and to regulate preelection "issue advertising" by independent groups. Even though both of these provisions were intended to curtail campaign spending, candidates for federal office spent $1 billion more in 2004 than in 2000 and in 2008 spent $1 billion more than they did in 2004.

Campaign Finance Debate

Continuing debates on campaign finance reform over the past century have highlighted the vastly different views people held on the system and on what, if anything, needed fixing. Democrats and Republicans have typically taken opposing views on issue after issue, with many votes in Congress routinely dividing along partisan lines. Some proposals were favored by one chamber but not the other, or by Congress but not the White House.

Despite the lack of consensus, there were some issues that repeatedly surfaced. Members of Congress were well aware that the consequences of constant fund-raising were both personal and institutional. This underscored for many the fundamental issues in the enduring debate: one was the high cost of running for office; that in turn led to another problem—the incessant search for contributions to pay the bills, often from wealthy and interested donors.

The relentless search for money would spawn other controversies over the years. For a time, political action committees (PACs) were seen by many reformers as the villains. Others saw the fund-raising advantage of incumbents as a nearly insurmountable obstacle for congressional challengers. In the 1990s new controversies erupted and the targets for reform changed yet again. Soft money contributions and issue advocacy ads were seen by many as major loopholes in the system. The secrecy surrounding the political activities of some unregulated groups also galvanized new reform efforts at the turn of the twenty-first century.

Campaigns' High Costs

"Politics has got so expensive that it takes lots of money to even get beat with," humorist Will Rogers remarked in 1931.<sup>1</sup> If it was true then, it is much more so today.

For some prospective candidates, that cost is too high. These people and others see the high costs and the perception that elections are "bought and sold" as contributing to public cynicism about the political process. Others have raised concerns that the cost of running for office has given wealthy candidates the advantage over others of more modest means and that it may have fueled reliance on more sophisticated—often negative—media advertising. But on the other side of the issue are those who say that the expenditures are not too high—maybe not even high enough—when compared to overall government spending or commercial advertising. For example, The $4 billion spent by the nation's leading advertiser in 2004, General Motors, roughly equaled the total amount estimated by the Center for Responsive Politics to have been spent by all candidates and groups in the 2004 federal elections.<sup>2</sup> The latter group projected the 2008 federal elections would cost $5.3 billion.<sup>3</sup>

CAMPAIGN FINANCE GLOSSARY

Following is a glossary of some commonly used terms in the campaign finance field. It was drawn from documents produced by the Federal Election Commission (FEC), Center for Responsive Politics, Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress, and Congressional Quarterly. The definitions reflect the laws and regulations in force as of 2009.

Bundling. The practice of aggregating separate contributions from various individuals for delivery to a candidate, thereby generating clout for the individual or organization that collects and delivers the contributions. The bundler may focus on employees of a particular business, members of a particular profession, or activists committed to a particular policy. Because the bundler typically merely forwards batches of checks made out by individuals to a candidate, the contributions do not count against the bundler's contribution limits.

Hard Money. Money raised and spent for federal election campaigns under the limitations, prohibitions, and requirements of the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA).

Independent Expenditures. Money spent for such things as broadcast advertisements or direct mail that expressly advocates the election or defeat of a federal candidate and deemed "independent" so long as the individual or group making the expenditure does not coordinate, cooperate, or consult in any way with the candidate's campaign. These expenditures are regulated by federal election laws, and while individuals or groups may spend unlimited amounts of money on independent campaign efforts, they must report these expenditures to the FEC once they reach a certain level.

Issue Advocacy Advertising. Refers to advertisements by individuals and groups that typically discuss candidates in the context of certain issues without specifically advocating a candidate's election or defeat. Such ads may not be subject to election law regulation and thus may be financed with soft money. The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (McCain-Feingold) and FEC rules have sought to regulate at least some of these ads, that is, television and radio ads that refer to a clearly identified federal candidate and are targeted to voters within thirty days before a primary election or sixty days before a general election. Under McCain-Feingold, such ads are considered "electioneering communications, which may not be financed" by corporations or unions. (A 2007 Supreme Court ruling narrowed the effect of this prohibition by permitting some nonprofit corporations to finance such communications if they are not clearly related to an election.) Individuals and unincorporated groups may also make electioneering communications, but they must disclose the identity of those funding the ad (if the cost of the communication exceeds $10,000) as well as the names of large donors.

Political Action Committee (PAC). Organizations created by interest groups to raise and spend money for candidates. They are typically begun by corporations, industries, trade associations, labor unions, ideological groups, and others with shared policy interests. A "leadership PAC" is such a committee run by one or more congressional leaders, or other members who aspire to leadership positions. When members outside the leadership structure started creating PACs, the term "politician's PAC" also came into use. Contributions to this type of PAC are considered separate from contributions to the campaign committee of the individual member who sponsored the PAC. These PACs are subject to the same constraints as other PACs.

Soft Money. Money raised and spent outside the limitations and prohibitions of the FECA and, therefore, impermissible for activities directly related to federal election campaigns, but which may have at least an indirect impact on federal elections. Until McCain-Feingold, this money was raised primarily by the national, state, and local Republican and Democratic parties, initially for grassroots and party-building activities and later for issue ads. The parties could use the funds for get-out-the-vote efforts, administrative costs, generic party advertising, and to help state and local candidates. (Activities that benefited both federal and state and local candidates had to be funded in part by hard money.) McCain-Feingold prohibited national parties, members of Congress, federal officials, and federal candidates from raising soft money. Officeholders and candidates can, however, raise up to $20,000 per donor for nonprofit groups involved in federal elections. McCain-Feingold also required that state, local, and district party committees fund "federal election activities" (as defined) only with hard money. An exception—known as the "Levin Amendment"—was made to allow state and local parties to fund purely grassroots voter registration and get-out-the-vote efforts with soft money (contributions are limited to $10,000 per party organization), as long as state law permits. Federal officeholders and national parties, however, cannot raise "Levin funds," and all receipts and disbursements of these funds must be disclosed.

527 Groups. 527 groups are tax-exempt organizations that engage in political activities, most commonly PACs, party committees, and candidate committees. In recent years, however, 527 organizations have been established to engage in issue advocacy only and have thus been able to finance their activities through unlimited soft money donations. In 2000 Congress required that these 527s had to register with the IRS and file periodic disclosure reports on contributors and spending.

Herbert Alexander, a prominent scholar of campaign financing, estimated the total for campaign spending at all levels of U.S. elections in 1996 at $4.2 billion. The price tag for federal campaigns was $2.8 billion, $500 million more than in 1992.

Several factors have contributed to the spiraling costs of campaigns. The most obvious cause has been inflation. As the costs of other goods and services in the economy have inflated, so too have those of campaigns. But even when inflation is accounted for, the cost of campaigns has increased dramatically in recent decades. A key reason has been the rise in the cost of fund-raising and of educating the electorate.

Since the 1960s campaigns have undergone tremendous change. Most campaigns have been transformed from the simply having volunteers stuff envelopes and the candidate canvass voters to highly technical, mechanized ones that are likely to use computerized mass mailings and Internet sites to solicit contributions and thirty-second television ads to get their message across to voters. Candidates hire political consultants to direct their campaigns and polling companies to tell them how they are doing. All of the high-tech trappings of modern campaigns cost money—big money.

Population growth affects campaigns—as the electorate expands so too does the cost of reaching voters. With the U.S. population going from 203,302,031 in 1970 to 281,421,906 in 2000, the population of a congressional district, on average, went from 467,000 to 647,000.

House candidates' campaign costs are also affected by the demographics of districts. Candidates in urban, suburban, or rural districts run different campaigns with different price tags. Television ads may not be cost-effective in an urban district, but they may be the only way a rural candidate can reach far-flung constituents.

The proliferation of media outlets has increased the cost as well. People are listening to or watching many more stations than they used to, so to reach them, campaigns have to spread their ads around.

The level of competition in a campaign also affects spending. A crowded field of candidates seeking their party's presidential nomination will generate greater spending than uncontested races. The same is true for congressional candidates. Costs stay down if an incumbent has little or no opposition, but expenses rise sharply if an electoral threat appears. This is also true of contests for open congressional seats, which frequently are the most competitive races. In open-seat races, explained political scientist Gary Jacobson, "neither candidate enjoys the benefits of incumbency, both parties normally field strong candidates, and the election is usually close." Senate races also tend to attract money, according to Jacobson, because incumbent senators are often perceived as vulnerable, most of their challengers are well-known public figures, and elections to the 100-member Senate have a greater political impact than do those to the 435-member House.<sup>4</sup>

Some observers believe that so much money is raised in campaigns because so much money is available. But candidates have reasons to raise as much money as they can. One of these is "deterrence." Front-runners and incumbents want to use their campaign "war chests" to scare off potential opponents. If this deterrence does not work, incumbents want to be ready for any surprises their opponents may create.

Incumbents also feel more secure with sizable reserves in the bank. President Bill Clinton felt vulnerable in the wake of the GOP takeover of Congress after the 1994 election. To ensure that he would not be a one-term president, the Democratic Party raised record amounts money, including soft money for use in issue ads. Similarly, congressional incumbents like the security of deep reserves. They want to be ready in case a millionaire opponent decides to run against them. They want to be able to counter negative issue ads or independent expenditures. House members may anticipate a tough challenge because of an upcoming redistricting. Others stockpile money in case they decide to run for higher office, such as a House member running for the Senate or a senator running for the presidency.

Quest for Money

By many accounts, one of the most onerous tasks a politician faces is fund-raising. The public funding system was aimed in part at relieving presidential candidates of this burden. However, candidates still must raise a certain amount to qualify for matching funds during the presidential primaries. Moreover, even though presidential campaigns may be publicly funded, the candidates still play a major role in their parties' fund-raising activities, and, increasingly, candidates are choosing not to participate in the public finance system.

In congressional races, fund-raising "takes a toll of the time, energy, and attention of legislators," according to political scientist Frank J. Sorauf, who has written extensively on campaign financing. "It is a task that tires even the most enthusiastic fund-raisers, and it depresses those incumbents who find it distasteful."<sup>5</sup>

Facing reelection contests every two years, members of the House are essentially campaigning and fund-raising all the time. One election campaign runs into the next. Even in the Senate, where the six-year term was once considered a luxury, members are beginning their campaigns earlier and earlier. Races with multimillion-dollar price tags require increased attention to fund-raising.

For some that price is too high. When Democratic Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg of New Jersey announced that he would not seek a fourth term in the Senate in 2000, he said that a powerful factor in his decision was "the searing reality" that he would have had to spend half of every day between his mid-February 1999 announcement and the November 2000 election fund-raising. He explained:

To run an effective campaign, I would have to ask literally thousands of people for money. I would have had to raise $125,000 a week, or $25,000 every working day. That's about $3,000 an hour—more than lots of people earn in a month—distracted from the job I was hired to do.<sup>6</sup>

More than a few find the task demeaning as well. At one Democratic Party training session, candidates were offered the following advice: "Learn how to beg, and do it in a way that leaves you some dignity."<sup>7</sup> That may be easier said than done, as former senator Tom Daschle, D-S.D., found during his successful 1986 campaign to unseat an incumbent senator: "You're with people you have nothing in common with. You have a cosmetic conversation. You paint the best face you can on their issues and feel uncomfortable through the whole thing. You sheepishly accept their check and leave feeling not very good."<sup>8</sup>

At least he left with the check, which is more than can be said for many challengers. Attempting to unseat a sitting member of Congress is an enormously difficult task for a number of reasons, not the least of which is the obstacle of having to bankroll a campaign. Rep. David E. Price, D-N.C., a political scientist who ran successfully against an incumbent in 1986, said that he had undertaken few ventures as difficult and discouraging as raising money for his primary campaign. He held small fund-raisers, sent mail appeals to party activists, and approached potential large contributors, with mixed success. He and his wife contacted people on their old Christmas card lists, as well as professional colleagues and family members. They took out a second mortgage on their home. Price won the primary but still found fund-raising for the general election a continuing struggle. He later reflected on his campaign:

I will...never forget how difficult it was to raise the first dollars. I understand quite well why many potentially strong challengers and potentially able representatives simply cannot or will not do what it takes to establish financial "viability" and why so many who do reach that point can do so only on the basis of personal wealth. The modus operandi of most large contributors, PACs, and even party committees often makes their calculations of an incumbent's "safety" a self-fulfilling prophecy.<sup>9</sup>

The difficulties that surround fund-raising have institutional, as well as personal, consequences. For one thing, the time members of Congress spend raising money is time away from the business of legislating. Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., said that one of his biggest problems when he served as Senate majority leader was accommodating the senators' need for time away from the floor to raise money for their campaigns. "They have to go raise the money and they don't want any roll-call votes," Byrd lamented. "Now how can a majority leader run the Senate under such circumstances?" To Byrd the culprit was clear: "Mad, seemingly limitless escalation of campaign costs."<sup>10</sup> Byrd ended up revamping the Senate's work schedule in 1988 to give members time off to campaign and attend fund-raisers.

As Price indicated, there is another institutional consequence: the high cost of elections discourages people from running for Congress. "Potential challengers or candidates for open seats realize that unless they can raise a lot of money, they have little chance of winning," political scientists David Magleby and Candice Nelson wrote in 1990. As a result, party committees have found "it is increasingly hard to convince people to run, given the low probability of success and the high investment of time and money necessary to even hope to be competitive."<sup>11</sup>

CONTROVERSY SURROUNDS FINANCING SYSTEM

Critics of the campaign financing system became increasingly vocal in the closing decades of the twentieth century. But reaching a consensus on what was wrong with the system, let alone what would make it right, seemed almost impossible at times.

Some expressed dismay at skyrocketing campaign costs, but others said the costs were small when compared with a major corporation's advertising budget or what Americans spent on cosmetics or gambling.<sup>12</sup>

Some deplored the influx of unlimited "soft" money from corporations, labor unions, and individuals to the political parties, but others welcomed the resulting resurgence of parties as major players in electoral politics.

Some wanted to regulate advertising they said crossed the line between advocating issues to advocating particular candidates, but others defended the ads as important tools in educating voters.

Some condemned the role special interests, particularly political action committees (PACs), played in American politics, but others defended this role as a manifestation of democracy's pluralism.

Some called for limits on congressional campaign spending, but others charged that limits would only further entrench incumbents and put challengers at a disadvantage.

Some saw public money as the way to eliminate outside influences in politics, but others scoffed at the use of taxpayer money.

Some criticized independent expenditures for or against candidates, but others saw such spending as part of their First Amendment right to free speech.

Beyond specific policy disagreements was the less tangible love-hate relationship some politicians had with the system. A presidential candidate might call for a ban on soft money, while at the same time benefiting from an elaborate advertising campaign paid for with party soft money. Members of Congress were being asked to vote to change a system that returned the vast majority of them to the halls of Congress election after election. As West Virginia senator Byrd once explained: “We are afraid to let go of the slick ads and the high-priced consultants, afraid to let go of the PAC money and the polls, unsure that we want to change the rules of the game that we all understand and know so well.”<sup>13</sup>

The McCain-Feingold reform act of 2002 did more to change the way federal campaigns were financed than any legislation since the 1970s. But the new system continued to be the subject of fierce debate along with calls continued for additional reform.

History of Uncertainty

Reformers for decades faced the enormous task of proposing legislation that would bridge the differences between Democrats and Republicans, representatives and senators, incumbents and challengers. Politicians were apprehensive of the unknowns that surrounded change—how each party would adapt to it and whether it might give the opposing party an advantage.

Their caution was well-founded. It was difficult to calculate all the ramifications of the many reform proposals on the table at any one time. As political scientist Sorauf described it: “Available money seeks an outlet, and if some outlets are narrowed or closed off, money flows with increased pressure to the outlets still open. It is the law that systems of campaign finance share with hydraulic systems.”<sup>14</sup>

There had been ample examples of changes with unanticipated results. Congressional attempts to curtail the influence of the wealthy “fat cat” donors in the wake of the 1970s Watergate scandal resulted in limits more stringent on individual contributions than on political committees. This made contributions through PACs much more attractive to some givers and in turn became a significant factor in the rise of PACs.

Section 527 of the tax code—written in the wake of the Watergate scandal to set tax rules for political groups—contained a loophole allowing a new breed of political organizations to avoid disclosing their campaign spending, which Congress has made some efforts to change since 2000.

The dramatic growth of soft money was another example of a development no one had anticipated. Soft money was the unlimited, largely unregulated money contributed primarily to political parties for activities and expenses not directly related to specific federal elections. It was called “soft” to distinguish it from the “hard money” that was used for federal election campaigns and regulated by the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA)—money that was “hard” to raise because of the FECA’s limits and restrictions. Although corporations and labor unions had been prohibited from participating directly in federal elections for a good part of the twentieth century and individuals were subject to an aggregate contribution limit beginning in the 1970s, soft money opened a whole new outlet for contributing to the parties or spending on purportedly non-federal activities.

In the 1970s the Federal Election Commission (FEC), the independent agency charged with overseeing compliance with the federal election laws, relaxed some of the rules covering the separation of federal campaign funds from state and local parties’ nonfederal money. The FEC allowed the state and local parties for the first time to use nonfederal soft money to pay for a portion of their administrative expenses, as well as voter drives and generic party activities, even if they had an indirect effect on federal campaigns. Congress then passed legislation to encourage greater participation of these parties in presidential election campaigns, allowing them to spend unlimited amounts of hard money on things such as voter drives and campaign materials.

The combination of these actions by the FEC and Congress triggered the surge in soft money. Once the national parties determined that they, too, could use soft money for certain expenses, they began raising millions of dollars for their nonfederal accounts. Soon the money was being spent not only for get-out-the-vote drives but for major advertising campaigns said to promote party issues, not candidates. Being able to use soft money for certain party expenses had the added advantage of freeing up more hard dollars for direct aid to federal candidates, further fueling the upward spiral of campaign spending.

Uncertainty over the effect of rewriting campaign finance law permeated the 2001–2002 debate on reform legislation. Both parties had become quite proficient at raising soft money. Which party would have the advantage if soft money were curtailed or eliminated? Which would benefit if some of the contribution limits on hard money were raised as a tradeoff for a soft money ban? If the parties no longer had access to soft money, would special interests have an increased advantage? Much was at stake, and the political ramifications of each provision and each amendment were carefully weighed as Capitol Hill once again contemplated changing the system.

Public Dissatisfaction with the System

Though debates over how to change the system were fueled by partisan concerns, public disapproval was the driving force behind the move to reform federal campaign finance laws. At the close of the twentieth century, the public registered a deep disdain for the system.

A 1997 public opinion survey found that a majority of Americans (57 percent) were dissatisfied with the state of the political system, and the role of money was one of the main sources of that discontent. About two-thirds of those polled cited as major problems the excessive influence of political contributions on elections and government policy, as well as the conflict of interest created when elected officials solicited or took contributions while making policy decisions. Majorities also said that elected officials spent too much time fund-raising and that the high cost of campaigns discouraged good people from running for office.

Similarly, a Gallup poll in January 2001 found that 56 percent of Americans were dissatisfied with the country's campaign finance laws, and another poll in March 2001 showed that Americans, by a margin of 76 percent to 19 percent, favored new laws limiting contributions by individuals or groups to the political parties.<sup>15</sup>

But fundamental changes in the campaign finance system have never come easily. Reform advocate Fred Wertheimer, while serving as Common Cause president, summed it up: "There are no fights like campaign finance fights because they are battles about the essence of politics and power."<sup>16</sup>

FINANCING CAMPAIGNS: HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT

More than 100 years worth of events led up to the passage of the McCain-Feingold act of 2002. These events shed light on how the law's central objectives were determined and why, after decades of resistance, Congress passed major reform legislation. The history of campaign finance also helps explain the criticisms this most recent law has faced in ensuing elections. (See box, Campaign Finance History in a Nutshell, p. 94.)

In early American politics the source of money to finance a political campaign was never a question. Politics was a gentleman's pursuit and the gentleman paid. But, as political scientist Robert Mutch pointed out, the expenses were small and campaigns in the modern sense were few. "Candidates were supposed to attract support by virtue of their reputations, not by actually mingling with voters," Mutch wrote.<sup>17</sup> Candidates' expenses might have included the costs of printing and distributing campaign literature or perhaps providing food and drink for the voters on election day.

George Washington, for example, during his campaign for the House of Burgesses in Virginia in 1757, dispensed twenty-eight gallons of rum, fifty gallons of rum punch, thirty-four gallons of wine, forty-six gallons of beer, and two gallons of cider royal! "Even in those days this was considered a large campaign expenditure," writer George Thayer observed, "because there were only 391 voters in his district, for an average outlay of more than a quart and a half per person."<sup>18</sup>

But by the early nineteenth century, money had begun to play an increasingly significant role. Politics no longer was the exclusive domain of the wealthy merchant or the gentleman farmer. The professional politician had emerged. Lacking personal wealth, the new breed was dependent on others for campaign support and on salaries for their livelihood. The need for campaign money also grew with the expansion of the electorate in the 1820s, as more and more states switched to a system of selecting presidential electors by popular vote. Candidates found that reaching an expanded pool of voters required mass propaganda, and that, in turn, required money.

Modern political parties also had begun to emerge, and with them came the spoils system. When a new president came in, government jobs were transferred to his supporters. It was not long before the new appointees were having to pay for the privilege of a government job, with the political parties exacting percentages from the salaries of federal employees.

The first known cases of assessments on government workers were levied by the Democratic Party on U.S. customs employees in New York City during the 1830s. But attempts to legislate against the practice went nowhere because, as Mutch noted, "few politicians were willing to eliminate such a valuable source of party funds, and the system of assessments continued to grow."<sup>19</sup>

The first provision of federal law relating to campaign finance was incorporated into an act of March 2, 1867, making naval appropriations for fiscal 1868. The act's final section read:

And be it further enacted, That no officer or employee of the government shall require or request any workingman in any navy yard to contribute or pay any money for political purposes, nor shall any workingman be removed or discharged for political opinion; and any officer or employee of the government who shall offend against the provisions of this section shall be dismissed from the service of the United States.

Reports circulated the following year that at least 75 percent of the money raised by the Republican Congressional Committee came from federal officeholders. Continued agitation on this and other aspects of the spoils system in federal employment—tragically highlighted by the assassination in 1881 of President James A. Garfield by a disappointed office seeker—led to adoption of the 1883 Civil Service Reform Act. The act, also known as the Pendleton Act, authorized the establishment of personnel rules, one of which stated, “That no person in the public service is for that reason under any obligation to contribute to any political fund...and that he will not be removed or otherwise prejudiced for refusing to do so.” The law made it a crime for any federal employee to solicit campaign funds from another federal employee.

But shrewd campaign managers found money elsewhere. Business money had become increasingly important in the post–Civil War period and was dominant by the close of the century. In the legendary 1896 campaign between Republican William McKinley and Democrat–Populist William Jennings Bryan, McKinley’s successful effort was managed by Marcus A. (Marc) Hanna, a wealthy Ohio financier and industrialist who turned the art of political fund-raising into a system for assessing campaign contributions from banks and corporations.

As these political contributions grew, so too did public concern over the role of corporate money in politics. “The concern among the electorates of the industrialized nineteenth century was that their elected representatives might not be the real policymakers, that government might still be controlled by those who provided campaign funds,” Mutch wrote.<sup>20</sup> In the late 1800s, several states enacted campaign finance laws, some requiring disclosure of information on the sources and uses of campaign contributions and others actually prohibiting corporate contributions. The push was on for action on the national level.

Early Legislation

Reacting to the increasingly lavish corporate involvement in political campaigns, the hearty band of reformers known as the “muckrakers” pressed for the nation’s first extensive campaign finance legislation. During the first decade of the twentieth century, they worked to expose big business’s influence on government through unrestrained spending on behalf of favored candidates.

Corporate Contribution Ban

Revelations during congressional hearings that several corporations had secretly financed Theodore Roosevelt’s 1904 presidential campaign provided impetus for change. The establishment of the National Publicity Law Organization, headed by former representative Perry Belmont, D-N.Y., focused further attention on the issue.

President Roosevelt, in his annual message to Congress, proposed on December 5, 1905, that “all contributions by corporations to any political committee or for any political purpose should be forbidden by law.” Roosevelt repeated the proposal the following December, suggesting that it be the first item of congressional business.

Congress in 1907 passed the first federal campaign finance law, the Tillman Act, which made it unlawful for a corporation or a national bank to make “a money contribution in connection with any election” of candidates for federal office. Although Roosevelt is generally regarded as having initiated the series of actions leading to the 1907 law, Mutch points out that the bill passed by Congress had actually been written and introduced five years earlier.<sup>21</sup>

Also in 1907, Roosevelt gave his support to a drive for public funding of party organizations, but nothing would come from that effort until the 1970s.

Disclosure Mandated

Three years later, the first Federal Corrupt Practices Act (also known as the Publicity Act of 1910) was passed, establishing disclosure requirements for U.S. House candidates. Specifically, the law required every political committee “which shall in two or more states influence the result or attempt to influence the result of an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected” to file with the clerk of the House of Representatives, within thirty days after the election, the name and address of each contributor of $100 or more, the name and address of each recipient of $10 or more from the committee, and the total amounts that the committee received and disbursed. Individuals who engaged in similar activities outside the framework of committees also were required to submit such reports.

The following year legislation was passed extending the filing requirements to committees influencing Senate elections and requiring candidates for House and Senate seats to file financial reports. (Popular election of senators, instead of election by state legislatures, was mandated by the Seventeenth Amendment, approved by Congress in 1912 and ratified in 1913.) Both pre- and postelection reports were required. The most important innovation of the 1911 act was the limit that was placed on the amount candidates could spend campaigning for nomination and election: candidates for the Senate, no more than $10,000 or the maximum amount permitted in their states, whichever was less; for the House, no more than $5,000 or the maximum amount permitted in their states, whichever was less.

1925 Corrupt Practices Act

No further changes in federal campaign law were made for more than a decade. But then the system was overhauled with passage of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, which served as the basic campaign finance law until the early 1970s.

The Teapot Dome scandal gave Congress the push it needed to pass reform legislation. During a congressional investigation of alleged improprieties in the Harding administration's leasing of naval oil reserves to private operators, it had been discovered that an official of the company that had leased the Teapot Dome reserve in Wyoming had not only bribed the official in charge of the leasing but had also contributed generously to the Republican Party to help retire the party's 1920 campaign debt. The contribution had been made in a nonelection year and therefore did not have to be reported under existing law—a loophole that was closed by the 1925 act's requirement that contributions of $100 or more be reported, whether made in an election year or not.

The 1925 act regulated campaign spending and disclosure of receipts and expenditures by House and Senate candidates, as well as disclosure by national political committees and their subsidiaries and by other committees seeking to influence elections in more than one state. The 1925 act limited its restrictions to general election campaigns because the Supreme Court in 1921 had ruled that Congress did not have jurisdiction over primaries.

The act revised the amounts that candidates could legally spend. Unless a state law prescribed a smaller amount, the act set the ceilings at $10,000 for a Senate candidate and $2,500 for a House candidate; or an amount equal to three cents for each vote cast in the last preceding election for the office sought, but not more than $25,000 for the Senate and $5,000 for the House.

The 1925 act incorporated the existing prohibition against campaign contributions by corporations and national banks, the ban on solicitation of political contributions from federal employees by candidates or other federal employees, and the requirement that reports on campaign finances be filed. It prohibited giving or offering money to anyone in exchange for his or her vote. In amending the provisions of the 1907 act on contributions, the new law substituted for the word "money" the phrase "a gift, subscription, loan, advance, or deposit of money, or anything of value."

The Corrupt Practices Act, however, was riddled with loopholes and contained no provisions for enforcement. It did not mandate publication of the reports or review of the reports for errors and omissions. It did not require reports of contributions and expenditures in either presidential or congressional primary campaigns, nor in connection with a party's presidential nomination. It did not require reports by political committees so long as they confined their activities to a single state and were not actual subsidiaries of a national political committee. Frequently, congressional candidates reported they had received and spent nothing on their campaigns, maintaining that the campaign committees established to elect them to office had been working without their "knowledge and consent."

Candidates were able to evade the spending limitations by channeling most of their campaign expenditures through separate committees that were not required to report federally, thus making the federal ceilings, from a practical standpoint, meaningless.

No candidate for the House or the Senate ever was prosecuted under the 1925 act, although it was widely known that most candidates spent more than the act allowed and did not report all they spent. Only two persons elected to Congress—Republicans William S. Vare of Pennsylvania and Frank L. Smith of Illinois, both elected to the Senate in 1926—were excluded from office for spending in excess of the act's limits.

The 1925 act's requirement that political committees seeking to influence the election of presidential electors in two or more states file contribution and spending reports was challenged in the courts as an unconstitutional infringement on states' rights. The Supreme Court in 1934, in Burroughs and Cannon v. United States, upheld the act's applicability to the election of presidential electors and implicitly sanctioned federal regulation of campaign financing in congressional elections.

On the topic of disclosure, the Court stated: "Congress reached the conclusion that public disclosure of political contributions, together with the names of contributors and other details, would tend to prevent the corrupt use of money to affect elections. The verity of this conclusion reasonably cannot be denied."

Hatch Act and Labor Restrictions

During the period between the early efforts to regulate spending and the broad reforms of the 1970s, some laws related to campaign financing were enacted, although they had less direct effects than the corrupt practices laws. A 1939 law, commonly called the Hatch Act but also known as the Clean Politics Act, barred federal employees from active participation in national politics and prohibited collection of political contributions from persons receiving relief funds provided by the federal government.

A 1940 amendment to the Hatch Act made several significant additions to campaign finance law. It placed a ceiling of $3 million in a calendar year on expenditures by a political committee operating in two or more states. (In practice, however, the parties easily evaded this stipulation.) The 1940 amendment forbade federal contractors, whether individuals or companies, to contribute to any political committee or candidate. It also asserted Congress's right to regulate primary elections for the nomination of candidates for federal office and made it unlawful for anyone to contribute more than $5,000 to a federal candidate or political committee in a single year. But Congress opened a big loophole when it specifically exempted from this limitation "contributions made to or by a state or local committee."

Three years later Congress passed the War Labor Disputes Act (Smith-Connally Act), temporarily extending the 1907 prohibition on political contributions by national banks and corporations to include labor unions. This prohibition was made permanent by the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (Taft-Hartley Act).

Restrictions on Primaries

Legislative and judicial decisions in the first half of the twentieth century repeatedly redefined the relationship of campaign finance laws to primary elections. The 1911 act limiting campaign expenditures in congressional elections covered primaries as well as general elections. In 1921, however, the Supreme Court in the case of Newberry v. United States struck down the law's application to primaries on the ground that the power the Constitution gave Congress to regulate the "manner of holding elections" did not extend to party primaries and conventions. The Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 exempted primaries from its coverage.

The Hatch Act amendments of 1940 made primaries again subject to federal restrictions on campaign contributions despite the Newberry decision. This legislation was upheld in 1941, when the Supreme Court in United States v. Classic reversed its Newberry decision by ruling that Congress had the power to regulate primary elections when the primary was an integral part of the process of selecting candidates for federal office. The Classic decision was reaffirmed by the Court in 1944 in Smith v. Allwright. When the Taft-Hartley Act was adopted in 1947, its prohibition of political contributions by corporations, national banks, and labor organizations was phrased to cover primaries as well as general elections.

Loopholes Abound

Even with the revisions of the 1930s and 1940s, the campaign system was filled with loopholes, which were the target of legislation offered in Congress since the 1950s. In a 1967 message to Congress proposing such reforms, President Lyndon B. Johnson said of the Corrupt Practices and Hatch acts: "Inadequate in their scope when enacted, they are now obsolete. More loophole than law, they invite evasion and circumvention."

Contributors' Loopholes

The Corrupt Practices Act required the treasurer of a political committee active in two or more states to report at specified times the name and address of every donor of $100 or more to a campaign. To evade such recording, a donor could give less than $100 to each of numerous committees supporting the candidate of his choice. A Senate subcommittee in 1956 checked the contributions of sums between $50 and $99.99 to one committee. It found that of ninety-seven contributions in that range, eighty-eight were more than $99, including fifty-seven that were exactly $99.99.

Technically, an individual could not contribute more than $5,000 to any national committee or federal candidate. However, he or she could contribute unlimited funds to state, county, and local groups that passed along the money in the organization's name.

Members of the same family could legally contribute up to $5,000 each. A wealthy donor wanting to give more than $5,000 to a candidate or a political committee could privately subsidize gifts by relatives.

Both parties relied on big contributors. Well-known contributors to the Republicans included the Mellons, Rockefellers, and Whitneys. Among the Democrats' donors were the Laskers, Kennedys, and Harrimans. Large contributions also came from foreigners.

Corporations. Corporations could skirt the prohibition of contributions to a political campaign by giving bonuses or salary increases to executives in the expectation that as individuals they would make corresponding political contributions to candidates favored by the corporation.

Political campaign managers learned to watch for contribution checks drawn directly on corporate funds and to return them to avoid direct violation of the law. Often this money made its way back to the political managers in some other form.

Corporations were allowed to place advertisements in political journals, even though there was no apparent benefit to the corporations from the ads, and they could lend billboards, office furniture, equipment, mailing lists, and airplanes to candidates or political committees. If a loan of this kind was deemed a violation of the letter of the law, the corporation could rent these items to a candidate or committee, instead of lending them, and then write off the rental fee as uncollectible.

Unions. Labor unions could contribute to a candidate or political committee funds collected from members apart from dues (thus the origin of separate segregated funds, or political action committees; see below). Money from union treasuries could be used for technically "nonpartisan" purposes, such as promoting voter registration, encouraging members to vote, or publishing the voting records of members of Congress or state legislators.

Organized labor's registration and get-out-the-vote drives overwhelmingly supported Democratic candidates, being keyed to areas where regular Democratic efforts were considered deficient or where an overwhelming Democratic vote was traditionally necessary to overcome a Republican plurality in some other section of the district, state, or country.

Public service activities, such as union newspapers or radio programs, could be financed directly from regular union treasuries. As with corporate newspapers and radio programs, a sharply partisan viewpoint could be, and often was, expressed.

Candidates' Loopholes

Federal or state limitations on the amount of money a candidate might knowingly receive or spend were easily evaded. A loophole in the law enabled numerous candidates to report that they received and spent not one cent on their campaigns because any financial activity was conducted without their "knowledge or consent." In 1964 four senators reported that their campaign books showed zero receipts and zero expenditures.

Four years later, when Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D., reported no receipts or expenditures, one of his staff explained that they were careful to make sure that McGovern never saw the campaign receipts. Two senators elected in 1968—William B. Saxbe, R-Ohio, and Richard S. Schweiker, R-Pa.—reported general election expenditures of $769,614 and $664,614, respectively, to their state authorities, while reporting expenditures of only $20,962 and $5,736, respectively, to the secretary of the Senate.

Another measure of the recorded figures' incompleteness was the contrast between the reported total political spending in 1960—$28.3 million—and the $175 million spending estimate by political experts. In 1962 candidates reported $18.4 million spent in congressional races, but Congressional Quarterly estimated the actual total at almost $100 million.

The credibility gap fostered by the "knowledge or consent" loophole was widened further because the Federal Corrupt Practices Act applied only to political committees operating in two or more states. If a committee operated in one state only and was not a subdivision of a national committee, the law did not apply. If a committee operated in the District of Columbia only, receiving funds there and mailing checks to candidates in a single state, the law did not cover it.

Limits on the expenditures that a political committee might make were evaded by establishing more than one committee and apportioning receipts and expenditures among them, so that no one committee exceeded the limit. Because the law limited spending by a political committee operating in two or more states to $3 million annually, the major parties formed committees under various names, each of which was free to spend up to $3 million.

Although the Corrupt Practices Act provided criminal penalties for false reporting or failure to report, successive administrations ignored them, even though news reporters repeatedly uncovered violations. Eisenhower administration attorney general Herbert Brownell stated in 1954 the Justice Department's position that the initiative in such cases rested with the secretary of the Senate and the clerk of the House, and that policy was continued.

Secretaries of the Senate and clerks of the House for many years winked at violations of the filing requirements. The situation changed in 1967 when former representative W. Pat Jennings, D-Va., became House clerk. He began sending lists of violations to the Justice Department for prosecution, but the department refused to act.

Attempts at Reform

Attempts to rewrite the 1925 act were made regularly during the 1950s and 1960s but with little success.

In April 1962 the President's Commission on Campaign Costs issued a report recommending proposals to encourage greater citizen participation in financing presidential campaigns. The commission had been named in October 1961 by President John F. Kennedy. Alexander Heard, dean of the University of North Carolina Graduate School, was the chairman. Herbert Alexander, director of the Citizens' Research Foundation, was the executive director. Among the commission's recommendations were that:

- Tax credits or deductions be given for certain levels of individuals' political contributions.
- The existing limits on expenditures of interstate political committees and individual contributions to those committees be repealed, leaving no limit.
- All candidates for president and vice president and committees spending at least $2,500 a year be required to report expenditures made in both primary and general election campaigns.
- A Registry of Election Finance be established to help enforce political financing regulations.
- The government pay the transition costs of a president-elect during the period between election and inauguration.

In May 1962 President Kennedy submitted to Congress five draft bills encompassing proposals identical or similar to the commission's. But the only bill reported was one to finance transition costs, and it died on the House floor.

Tax Checkoff Attempt. Congress did not act again in the area of campaign finance until the mid-1960s, when it passed a tax checkoff plan to provide government subsidies to presidential election campaigns. An act approved in 1966 authorized any individual paying federal income tax to direct that one dollar of the tax due in any year be paid into a Presidential Election Campaign Fund. The fund, to be set up in the U.S. Treasury, was to disburse its receipts proportionately among political parties whose presidential candidates had received five million or more votes in the preceding presidential election. Congress, however, failed to adopt the required guidelines for distribution of the funds, so the act was in effect voided in 1967 (the idea was later enacted into law in 1971).

Concern over Skyrocketing Costs. But the mood in Washington was beginning to change. In addition to growing irritation with the toothlessness of the disclosure laws, uneasiness was increasing over campaign costs.

Rising campaign costs were evident soon after World War II ended. Heard wrote in 1960:

Radio and television broadcasting eat up millions. Thousands go to pay for rent, electricity, telephone, telegraph, auto hire, airplanes, airplane tickets, registration drives, hillbilly bands, public relations counsel, the Social Security tax on payrolls. Money pays for writers and for printing what they write, for advertising in many blatant forms, and for the boodle in many subtle guises. All these expenditures are interlarded with outlays for the hire of donkeys and elephants, for comic books, poll taxes and sample ballots, for gifts to the United Negro College Fund and the Police Relief Association, for a $5.25 traffic ticket in Maryland and $66.30 worth of “convention liquor” in St. Louis.<sup>22</sup>

Radio and television ads came to occupy a greater and greater portion of campaign budgets, as broadcasting emerged as the dominant political medium in the 1960s. “Overall, political broadcasting increased from 17.3 percent of the estimated total of all political spending ($200 million) in 1964 to 19.6 percent (of $300 million) in 1968, ensuring its position as the largest single cost in political campaigns,” according to Herbert Alexander.<sup>23</sup>

Congressional incumbents came to see limits as necessary to prevent media costs from draining campaign treasuries and making candidates increasingly dependent on wealthy contributors and powerful lobbying groups. Many Democrats saw a limit on TV outlays as a way to overcome what they viewed as the Republicans’ lopsided advantage in raising money.

In addition, incumbents of both parties feared that, without limits, rich challengers could use TV “blitzes” to overpower them, a concern that had been fanned in 1970 by the high-cost campaigns of two relative unknowns—Rep. Richard L. Ottinger of New York and Ohio parking-lot magnate Howard M. Metzenbaum—who succeeded in winning Democratic primary races for the U.S. Senate, although they lost in the general election.

Against this backdrop of skyrocketing campaign costs, the administration of Richard Nixon tightened enforcement of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, successfully pressing charges in 1969 against corporations (mostly in California) that had contributed money in 1968.

CAMPAIGN FINANCE REFORM IN THE 1970s AND 1980s

By the 1970s, all sides acknowledged the need for new campaign finance legislation. Within a five-year period—between 1971 and 1976—Congress passed four major laws that changed the way political campaigns for national office were financed and conducted. While the first of these laws were initiated before the campaign abuses exposed during the Watergate scandal, those revelations intensified the efforts of reformers at the national and state levels, as well as the courts.

1971 Reform Laws

In 1971 Congress passed two separate pieces of legislation: the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) of 1971, which for the first time set a ceiling on the amount federal candidates could spend on media advertising and required full disclosure of campaign contributions and expenditures; and the Revenue Act of 1971, which included a tax checkoff section to allow taxpayers to contribute to a general public campaign fund for eligible presidential candidates.

FECA: Media Limits and Disclosure

The 1971 act was the first major piece of campaign finance legislation passed since 1925. It combined two sharply different approaches to reform. One section clamped limits on how much a federal candidate could spend on all forms of communications media. The second part provided, for the first time, for relatively complete and timely public reports by candidates on who was financing their campaigns and how much they were spending. Meaningful disclosure would reduce the likelihood of corruption and unfair advantage, it was argued.

Media Limits. The bill went into effect April 7, 1972, sixty days after President Nixon signed it. The heart of the new law was the section placing ceilings on media costs, which was applicable separately to the primary campaign and to the general election. For a House candidate, the limit was set at $50,000 or ten cents for each voting-age person in the congressional district, whichever was greater. For a Senate candidate, the limit was $50,000 or ten cents for each voting-age person in the state.

The ceiling, which was to rise automatically with the cost of living, applied to spending for television, radio, newspaper, magazine, billboard, and automated telephone advertising. The centerpiece of this section was the restriction that no more than 60 percent of the overall media total could go for radio and television advertising. In practice, this meant in the 1972 elections that a candidate for the House could spend no more than $52,150 for all media outlays in the primary campaign and no more than $52,150 in the general election campaign. (The cost-of-living factor had raised these figures from the initial $50,000.) In each case, only $31,290 of the overall media total could go for radio and television.

Because of population differences between states, the figures for Senate races ranged from an overall media limit of $52,150 in thinly populated states such as Alaska and Montana (of which only $31,290 could be for radio and television) to as much as $1.4 million in California (of which about $840,000 could be for radio and television).

Presidential limits also were computed on the basis of ten cents per voting-age person. For each presidential candidate, the overall media limit was $14.3 million, of which less than $8.6 million could be used for radio and television.

Disclosure Requirements. The 1971 FECA required that any candidate or political committee in a federal campaign file quarterly spending and receipts reports that itemized receipts or expenditures of $100 or more by listing the name, address, occupation, and place of business of the contributor or recipient. During election years, reports were also required to be filed fifteen and five days before an election, and any contribution of $5,000 or more had to be reported within forty-eight hours if received after the last preelection report.

Closing numerous loopholes in previous law, the statute applied the reporting requirements to primaries, conventions, and runoffs as well as to the general election. Any political committee had to report, even if it operated in only one state, provided it spent or received in excess of $1,000 a year. This meant, in effect, that the loophole of avoiding reports by having separate finance committees in each state was eliminated for presidential candidates and that members of Congress with finance committees operating only in their home states would henceforth have to report their receipts and expenditures.

The reports were to be filed with the House clerk for House candidates, secretary of the Senate for Senate candidates, and General Accounting Office (GAO) for presidential candidates. These would be made available for public inspection within forty-eight hours of being received and would be periodically published; reports also were required to be filed with the secretary of state of each state and made available for public inspection by the end of the day on which they were received.

On the theory that disclosure was the key to eliminating corruption, all the prior, ineffective spending and contribution limits were repealed, except provisions barring contributions directly from corporate funds and directly from union dues money. (However, voluntary funds raised from union members and administered by a separate segregated fund (political action committee) were permitted.)

Proponents of reform, cognizant of the partisan considerations that could have threatened any revision of campaign laws, worked to avoid writing a law that would favor any political party or candidate. Republicans, aware of the relatively healthy financial condition of their party in 1971, were eager to protect their coffers; Democrats did not want to jeopardize their large contributions from organized labor.

The reform movement also included various groups outside Congress, such as the National Committee for an Effective Congress, the chief pressure group; Common Cause; labor unions; and some media organizations.

Tax Checkoff to Fund Presidential Campaigns

The Revenue Act of 1971 containing the income tax checkoff cleared Congress on December 9, 1971, after a bitter partisan debate dominated by the approaching 1972 presidential election. President Nixon reluctantly signed the bill, but he forced a change in the effective date of payouts from the fund until the 1976 election as the price of his acquiescence.

The plan gave each taxpayer the option beginning in 1973 of designating one dollar of his or her annual federal income tax payment for a general campaign fund to be divided among eligible presidential candidates. Those filing joint returns could designate two dollars.

Democrats, whose party was $9 million in debt following the 1968 presidential election, said the voluntary tax checkoff was needed to free presidential candidates from obligations to their wealthy campaign contributors. Republicans, whose party treasury was well stocked, charged that the plan was a device to rescue the Democratic Party from financial difficulty.

1972 (Watergate) Election

Both 1971 laws were campaign finance milestones, but they left intact the existing system of private financing for the 1972 presidential campaign. While the FECA drew high marks for improving campaign disclosure and received some credit for reducing media costs, its successes were overshadowed by the massive misuse of campaign funds that characterized Watergate, one of the nation's worst political scandals.

The predominant theory at the time of the FECA's passage was that merely by writing a good, tight campaign finance law emphasizing disclosure, Congress could reduce excessive contributions from any one source to any one candidate. Candidates, according to this theory, would want to avoid the appearance of being dominated by a few large donors. Good disclosure would allow the public to identify the political activities of special interest groups and take necessary corrective action at the polls.

But it did not work that way. Huge individual and corporate donations were near the center of the Watergate scandal as largely unreported private contributions financed the activities of the 1972 Nixon reelection campaign. Of the $63 million collected by the Nixon camp, nearly $20 million was in contributions from 153 donors giving $50,000 or more. More than $11 million was raised during the month before the FECA disclosure rules took effect on April 7, 1972, including $2.3 million on April 5 and $3 million on April 6.<sup>24</sup>

The Finance Committee for the Reelection of the President kept its lists covering the pre-April 7 period confidential until a Common Cause lawsuit sought disclosure under provisions of the old Federal Corrupt Practices Act and forced them into the open in 1973. Such reticence was partly explained by the existence of questionable contributions to the Nixon campaign: $200,000 in financier Robert Vesco's attaché case; a $100,000 secret donation from millionaire industrialist Howard Hughes, which Nixon confidant Bebe Rebozo purportedly kept locked in a safe deposit box; and $2 million pledged to Nixon by the dairy industry.

Illegal corporate gifts also motivated secrecy. In a report issued in July 1974, the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities (known as the Senate Watergate Committee) charged that "during the 1972 presidential campaign, it appears that at least thirteen corporations made contributions totaling over $780,000 in corporate funds... Of these, twelve gave approximately $749,000 to the president's reelection campaign, which constituted the bulk of the illegal corporate contributions."

The primary sources of such corporate money, according to the Senate committee, were "foreign subsidiaries." Other sources included corporate reserves and expense accounts. The committee added that "although the bulk of the contributions preceded April 7, 1972, there was no disclosure of any of the contributions until July 6, 1973—or fifteen months after almost all of them were made."

Presidential lawyer Herbert Kalmbach, who headed the corporate gifts campaign, in June 1974 was sentenced to six to eighteen months in jail and fined $10,000 after pleading guilty to illegal campaign operations. Kalmbach collected more than $10 million from U.S. corporations, the bulk of it before April 7, 1972. According to staff reports of the Senate Watergate Committee, Kalmbach and other fund-raisers sought donations on an industry-by-industry basis, by using an influential corporate executive to raise money among other executives in his industry.

The leading individual giver in the 1972 campaign was Chicago insurance executive W. Clement Stone, chairman of the Combined Insurance Co. of America. In the April 7–December 31, 1972, reporting period monitored by the GAO, Stone was listed as giving $73,054 to reelect Nixon. But even before the revelations forced by Common Cause, Stone had admitted to pre-April giving of $2 million. The second highest giver was Richard Scaife, heir to the Mellon banking and oil fortune, who contributed $1 million to Nixon's reelection before April 7.

John Gardner, then the head of Common Cause, said in April 1973:

Watergate is not primarily a story of political espionage, nor even of White House intrigue. It is a particularly malodorous chapter in the annals of campaign financing. The money paid to the Watergate conspirators before the break-in—and the money passed to them later—was money from campaign gifts.<sup>25</sup>

Gardner's charge was dramatically confirmed by President Nixon's August 5, 1974, release of a June 23, 1972, tape recording of conversations between himself and his chief of staff, H. R. Haldeman. The tape revealed that Nixon was told at that time of the use of campaign funds in the June 17, 1972, Watergate break-in and agreed to help cover up that fact. Nixon's resignation August 9, 1974, followed the August 5 disclosure.

Disclosure's Role in 1972 Elections

The campaign disclosure provisions of the 1971 FECA proved extremely useful, enabling scholars and the relevant committees of Congress to get a clear picture for the first time of patterns of contributions and spending. Emerging from the reports were data on enormous contributions by the milk industry, on corporate contributions, on formerly concealed large contributions by individuals, and on "laundered money"—information that played a key role in uncovering misconduct in the Watergate scandal.

Although thousands of reports were late or faulty, overall compliance with the disclosure law probably was fairly good. Nevertheless, a great many problems remained. The reports, especially those made in the last few days before the election, were extremely difficult for a reporter or a rival political camp to collate and decipher. Multiple contributions by a wealthy individual made to one candidate through a system of dummy organizations with cryptic names were difficult to track rapidly. Investigating an industry-wide campaign of financial support to a candidate or a group of candidates proved to be an extremely tedious task.

State finance committees and other committees—with titles such as Democrats for Nixon or Writers for McGovern—were created to prevent big contributors from being inhibited by high gift taxes. An individual could give up to $3,000, tax-free, to an independent campaign committee. Records showed that the Nixon campaign benefited from 220 of these finance committees. McGovern had 785 such committees, according to his national campaign treasurer, Marian Pearlman, "created for Stewart Mott." General Motors heir Mott, who donated about $400,000 to McGovern, even declared himself a campaign committee.

The Internal Revenue Service (IRS) interpreted campaign committees as being independent if one out of three officers was different from officers for other committees, if the candidates supported by the committees were different, or if the committees' purposes were different. As a result, campaign finance committees proliferated in 1972, and contributors were hardly deterred from giving large sums to one candidate.

More important, the crucial element in effectiveness of the law was enforcement. The Justice Department was given sole power to prosecute violations, despite its forty-six-year record of somnolence in enforcing previous regulations. It was traditionally understood that Justice Department bureaucrats feared to undertake vigorous enforcement lest they endanger the party in power and be fired.

The question became: Would the department make a powerful, massive effort not only to round up serious violators but to require that reports be on time and complete? Without such action from the department, the practice of filing sloppy, incomplete, or even misleading reports, and filing them late, would clearly vitiate much of the effect of the law and render it null in practice.

Although thousands of violations—some serious but most technical (late or incomplete)—were referred to the Justice Department in 1972 and 1973 by the House, Senate, and GAO, only a handful of prosecutions resulted. During the 1972 campaign the department had only one full-time attorney supervising enforcement of the act, according to reports.

Another provision in the law requiring periodic reporting of contributions and expenditures further impeded enforcement. According to many members of Congress, the frequent filing of these reports during primary and general election campaigns by all political committees of candidates created monumental bookkeeping chores for the candidates. Correspondingly, the mammoth number of reports filed with the House clerk, the Senate secretary, and the comptroller general made closer scrutiny practically impossible.

To remedy the latter problem, Common Cause, at a cost of more than $250,000 and thousands of hours from volunteer workers, organized teams of people in 1972 to collect and collate information on reports, which it then distributed to the press in time for use before election day.

Fred Wertheimer, who at that time was the legislative director of Common Cause, said the aim was to make the law work and to give it a good start. But it was clear that depending on private organizations alone probably would be inadequate. Unless some permanent way were found, perhaps at government expense, to speed up collation and distribution of the materials—particularly late in the campaign—the objectives of disclosure would be undermined.

Media Expenditures in 1972

The 1972 election was more expensive than any that preceded it. About $425 million was spent in all races, with the Senate Watergate Committee estimating that the presidential race cost about $100 million, more than double the $44.2 million spent in the 1968 presidential election. During the 1972 campaign, presidential and Senate outlays for radio and television campaign advertising dropped sharply compared with 1968 and 1970, but whether this decline resulted from the FECA's media advertising limits was unclear.

In the presidential race, part of the drop was because of the strength of incumbent Nixon, who had loads of free airtime available to him when he chose to address the nation in “nonpolitical” speeches as president, instead of seeking paid time as merely a candidate.

The drop in Senate spending was less easily explained, but many senators said one factor was the realization that broadcast media, while enormously effective, did not provide the quantum leap in campaigning techniques that had been expected. The notion that television could “do it all,” which was virtually an article of faith in the late 1960s and in 1970, had begun to fade, and more resources were put into other forms of advertising and into traditional organizational and legwork efforts. Broadcast spending totals also were reduced by the requirement in the 1971 law that TV stations charge politicians the lowest unit rate for that time slot.

Also, many senators learned in 1972 that TV station coverage was not well designed for campaign purposes in many areas. In some large states, such as Kentucky, it was impossible to cover the whole state with stations broadcasting only within that state. To cover border areas, it was necessary to buy time on stations located in other states, only a portion of whose viewers were in Kentucky. To send a message to one corner of the state a candidate had to pay for coverage outside the state as well, a wasteful and costly practice.

The same was true in some large central metropolitan areas located between two or three states. For northern New Jersey, a candidate had to pay rates for New York too, because many of the stations in that area broadcast simultaneously to New York City, Connecticut, and northern New Jersey.

Some senators found it cheaper under these conditions to use other ways of reaching the voters. Federal Communications Commission (FCC) reports showed that while a handful of senators went slightly over their campaign limits, the TV limits as a whole were observed. Because of the TV “targeting” problems, many in Congress began to argue that a flat spending limit for TV was too inflexible. They said an overall spending limit for all campaign costs—similar to that repealed in 1971, but with real scope and enforcement teeth—would be better. Such a proposal, they argued, would still limit any massive use of TV because a candidate would not be able to exceed his total campaign spending limit. But it would allow greater flexibility as to which portion of overall costs went to TV and which to other items.

The media limits were repealed in 1974.

1974 FECA Amendments

Almost two and a half years after it passed the FECA of 1971, Congress, reacting to presidential campaign abuses and public opinion favoring reform, enacted another landmark campaign reform bill that substantially overhauled the existing system of financing election campaigns. Technically, the 1974 law was a set of amendments to the 1971 legislation, but in fact it was the most comprehensive campaign finance bill Congress had ever passed, before or since.

The new measure, which President Gerald R. Ford signed into law October 15, repealed some provisions of the 1971 law, expanded others, and broke new ground in such areas as public financing and contribution and expenditure limitations.

The Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments of 1974:

- Established a Federal Election Commission (FEC) consisting of six voting members—two appointed by the president and four designated by congressional leaders—as well as two nonvoting members, the clerk of the House and secretary of the Senate. All six voting members had to be confirmed by both the House and Senate.
- Instituted numerous contribution limitations, including: for individuals, a limit of $1,000 per candidate per primary, runoff, or general election, not to exceed $25,000 to all federal candidates, parties, and committees annually; for political committees, a limit of

$5,000 per candidate per election, with no aggregate limit; for presidential and vice-presidential candidates and their families, a limit of $50,000 to their own campaigns. A limit of $1,000 was established for independent expenditures on behalf of a candidate by outside groups. Cash contributions of more than $100 were prohibited, as were foreign contributions in any amount.

- Set limits on spending by federal candidates and the national parties, including: a total of $10 million per candidate for all presidential primaries, $20 million per candidate in the presidential general election, and $2 million for each major political party's nominating convention and lesser amounts for minor parties' conventions; $100,000 or eight cents per voting-age person in their state, whichever was greater, for Senate primary candidates and $150,000 or twelve cents per voting-age person, whichever was greater, for Senate general election candidates; and $70,000 for House primary candidates and $70,000 for House general election candidates. National party spending on behalf of its candidates was limited to $10,000 per candidate in House general elections; $20,000 or two cents per voting-age person in the state, whichever was greater, for each Senate general election candidate; and two cents for every voting-age person in presidential general elections. (These party expenditures were not counted in candidates' spending totals.) Senate spending limits were applied to House candidates who represented a whole state. The act exempted certain expenditures from the limits and provided that the limits would increase with inflation.

- Extended voluntary public funding for presidential campaigns to include not only general election campaigns but also prenomination campaigns and national nominating conventions. Eligible candidates seeking a presidential nomination would receive public funds matching their privately raised money within prescribed limits. Eligible candidates in a general election would each receive $20 million U.S. Treasury grants (to be adjusted for inflation) to finance their campaigns. Eligible political parties would receive grants of $2 million (to be adjusted for inflation) to conduct their nominating conventions. The amendments stipulated that if the level of money in the tax checkoff fund established by the 1971 Revenue Act was insufficient to finance all three stages of the electoral process, the funds would be disbursed, on a pro-rata basis, for the general election, the conventions, and the primaries, in that order.
- Created a number of disclosure and reporting requirements, including: that each campaign establish one central committee through which all contributions and expenditures on behalf of that candidate would be reported; reporting of names and addresses, as well as occupation and place of business, of those contributing more than $100; filing of full reports of contributions and expenditures with the FEC ten days before and thirty days after each election, and within ten days of the close of each quarter. Presidential candidates were not required, however, to file more than twelve reports in any one year.

The final bill did not contain Senate-passed provisions for partial public financing of congressional campaigns. Senate conferees dropped the fight for some form of public financing for House and Senate races in return for higher spending limits for congressional campaigns and a stronger independent election commission to enforce the law.

Buckley v. Valeo

As soon as the 1974 law took effect, it was challenged in court by a diverse array of plaintiffs, including Sen. James L. Buckley, C-N.Y.; former senator Eugene J. McCarthy, D-Minn.; the New York Civil Liberties Union; and Human Events, a conservative publication. They filed suit on January 2, 1975.

Their basic arguments were that the law's new limits on campaign contributions and expenditures curbed the freedom of contributors and candidates to express themselves in the political marketplace and that the public financing provisions discriminated against minor parties and lesser-known candidates in favor of the major parties and better-known candidates.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on August 14, 1975, upheld all of the law's major provisions, thus setting the stage for Supreme Court action. The Supreme Court handed down its ruling, Buckley v. Valeo, on January 30, 1976, in an unsigned 137-page opinion. In five separate, signed opinions, several justices concurred with and dissented from separate issues in the case.

In its decision, the Court upheld the provisions that:

- Set limits on how much individuals and political committees could contribute to candidates and other political committees.
- Provided for voluntary public financing of presidential primary and general elections.
- Required the disclosure of campaign contributions and expenditures of more than $100.

But the Court overturned other features of the law, most prominently ruling that the mandatory campaign spending limits were unconstitutional violations of the First Amendment guarantee of free expression. For presidential candidates who voluntarily accepted public funding of their campaigns, however, the ceiling on expenditures remained intact. The Court also struck down the method for selecting members of the FEC.

Spending Limits Overturned

The Court stated: "A restriction on the amount of money a person or group can spend on political communication during a campaign necessarily reduces the quantity of expression by restricting the number of issues discussed, the depth of their exploration and the size of the audience reached. This is because virtually every means of communicating ideas in today's mass society requires the expenditure of money."

Only Justice Byron R. White dissented on this point; he would have upheld the limitations. Rejecting the argument that money is speech, White wrote that there are "many expensive campaign activities that are not themselves communicative or remotely related to speech."

Although the Court acknowledged that both contribution and spending limits had First Amendment implications, it distinguished between the two by saying that the act's "expenditure ceilings impose significantly more severe restrictions on protected freedom of political expression and association than do its limitations on financial contributions."

The Court removed all the limits imposed on political spending—by House, Senate, and presidential campaigns and by party nominating conventions—and, by so doing, weakened the effect of the contribution ceilings. To plug a loophole in the contribution limits, the bill also had placed a $1,000 annual limit on how much an individual or group could spend independently to support or oppose a particular candidate. However, the independent expenditure ceiling, the opinion said, was a clear violation of the First Amendment. The Court wrote:

While the...ceiling thus fails to serve any substantial governmental interest in stemming the reality or appearance of corruption in the electoral process, it heavily burdens core First Amendment expression... Advocacy of the election or defeat of candidates for federal office is no less entitled to protection under the First Amendment than the discussion of political policy generally or advocacy of the passage or defeat of legislation.

The Court also struck down the limits on how much of their own money candidates could spend on their campaigns. The law had set a $25,000 limit on House candidates, $35,000 on Senate candidates, and $50,000 on presidential candidates. "The candidate, no less than any other person, has a First Amendment right to engage in the discussion of public issues and vigorously and tirelessly to advocate his own election and the election of other candidates," the opinion said.

The ruling made it possible for wealthy candidates to finance their campaigns and thus to avoid the limits on how much others could give them. The Court wrote that "the use of personal funds reduces the candidate's dependence on outside contributions and thereby counteracts the coercive pressures and attendant risks of abuse to which the act's contribution limitations are directed." (As in the case of spending limits, the Court allowed candidate limits in conjunction with voluntary public finance programs.)

Justice Thurgood Marshall rejected the Court's reasoning in striking down the limit on how much candidates may spend on their campaigns. “It would appear to follow,” he said, “that the candidate with a substantial personal fortune at his disposal is off to a significant ‘head start.’” Moreover, he added, keeping the limitations on contributions but not on spending “put[s] a premium on a candidate’s personal wealth.”

FEC Makeup Faulted

The Court held unanimously that the FEC was unconstitutional, as the method for appointing commissioners violated the Constitution’s separation-of-powers and appointments clauses because some members were named by congressional officials but exercised executive powers. The justices refused to accept the argument that the commission, because it oversaw congressional as well as presidential elections, could have congressionally appointed members. The Court wrote:

We see no reason to believe that the authority of Congress over federal election practices is of such a wholly different nature from the other grants of authority to Congress that it may be employed in such a manner as to offend well established constitutional restrictions stemming from the separation of powers.

According to the decision, the commission could exercise only those powers Congress was allowed to delegate to its own committees—investigating and information gathering. The Court ruled that only if the commission’s members were appointed by the president, as required under the Constitution’s appointments clause, could the FEC carry out the administrative and enforcement responsibilities the law originally gave it.

The last action put Congress on the spot, because the justices stayed their ruling for thirty days, until February 29, 1976, to give the House and Senate time to “reconstitute the commission by law or adopt other valid enforcement mechanisms.” As it developed, Congress took much longer than thirty days to act, and instead of merely reconstituting the commission, it passed a whole new campaign finance law.

1976 FECA Amendments

The Court decision forced Congress to return to campaign finance legislation once again. The 1976 election campaign was already under way, but the Court said that the FEC could not continue to disburse public funds to presidential candidates so long as some commission members were congressional appointees.

President Ford had wanted only a simple reconstitution of the commission, but Congress insisted on going much further. The new law, arrived at after much maneuvering and arguing between Democrats and Republicans, closed old loopholes and opened new ones, depending on one’s point of view.

In its basic provision, the law signed by the president May 11, 1976, reconstituted the FEC as a six-member panel (with no more than three from the same political party, effectively meaning there would be three Democrats and three Republicans) appointed by the president and confirmed by the Senate. Commission members were not allowed to engage in outside business activities. The commission was given exclusive authority to prosecute civil violations of the campaign finance law and was vested with jurisdiction over violations formerly covered only in the criminal code, thus strengthening its enforcement power. But the bill also required an affirmative vote of four members for the commission to issue regulations and advisory opinions and initiate civil actions and investigations. The commission was limited to issuing advisory opinions only for specific fact situations, and Congress was given the power to disapprove proposed regulations.

A major controversy that delayed enactment stemmed from organized labor’s insistence that corporate fund-raising activity through PACs be curtailed. Labor was angered by the FEC’s SunPAC advisory opinion in November 1975 that encouraged the growth of corporate PACs. In the wake of Watergate, many corporations had been skittish about what they were permitted to do. Not until the FEC released its landmark ruling in the case involving the Sun Oil Co.’s political action committee did many businesses feel comfortable in establishing PACs. The FEC decision was in response to Sun Oil’s request to use general funds to create, administer, and solicit voluntary contributions to its political action committee. Besides approving the request, the decision allowed business PACs to solicit its employees as well as stockholders for contributions. Labor PACs had been restricted to soliciting only their members.

Eventually a compromise was reached between the Democrats, who did not hesitate to use their overwhelming numerical strength to make changes that would have severely restricted the ability of business to raise political money, and the Republicans, who lacked the strength to fend off the antibusiness amendments but had the votes to sustain a filibuster and a veto.

Labor won some but not all of its goals. The final law permitted company committees to seek contributions only from stockholders and executive and administrative personnel and their families. It continued to restrict union PACs to soliciting contributions from union members and their families. Twice a year, however, union and corporate PACs were permitted to seek campaign contributions, by mail only, from all employees and stockholders. Such contributions would have to remain anonymous and would be received by an independent third party that would keep records but pass the money on to the PACs.

The final bill contained another provision prompted by the Supreme Court decision. Besides finding the FEC’s makeup unconstitutional, the Court had thrown out the 1974 law's limitations on independent expenditures as a clear violation of the First Amendment. To plug the potential loophole, Congress required political committees and individuals making independent political expenditures of more than $100 to swear that the expenditures were not made in collusion with the candidate.

The 1976 legislation also set some new contribution limits: an individual could give no more than $5,000 a year to a PAC and $20,000 to the national committee of a political party (the 1974 law had set no specific limits on contributions to political committees); a PAC could give no more than $15,000 a year to the national committee of a political party; and party committees could give a combined total of up to $17,500 a year to a Senate candidate.

1979 FECA Amendments

In a rare demonstration of harmony on a campaign finance measure, Congress in late 1979 passed legislation to eliminate much of the red tape created by the FECA and to remove any disincentives to grassroots and political party activity it may have created. Agreement was not difficult because the drafters concentrated on solving FECA's non-controversial problems.

The amendments, signed into law by President Jimmy Carter on January 8, 1980, reduced FECA's paperwork requirements in several ways. First, the act decreased the maximum number of reports a federal candidate would have to file with the FEC during a two-year election cycle from twenty-four to nine. For Senate candidates, the number of reports mandated over the six-year election cycle was reduced from twenty-eight to seventeen. Second, candidates who raised or spent less than $5,000 in their campaigns would not have to file reports at all. In 1978 about seventy House candidates, including five winners, fell below the $5,000 threshold. Previously, all candidates were required to report their finances regardless of the amount. Also, candidates would have to report in less detail. The legislation raised the threshold for itemizing both contributions and expenditures to $200 from $100. The threshold for reporting independent expenditures was also increased, from $100 to $250.

In 1976 political party leaders had complained that the FECA almost completely precluded state and local party organizations from helping with the presidential campaign. Because they had only limited federal funds to spend, both the Democratic and Republican presidential campaigns focused on media advertising, and they cut back spending on items such as buttons and bumper stickers that traditionally were used in promoting grassroots activity.

In response to the complaints, the 1979 law permitted state and local party groups to purchase, without limit, campaign materials for volunteer activities to promote any federal candidate. Those items included buttons, bumper stickers, handbills, brochures, posters, and yard signs. Also, those party organizations were allowed to conduct, without financial limit, certain kinds of voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives on behalf of presidential tickets.

The incidental mention of a presidential candidate on the campaign literature of local candidates was no longer counted as a campaign contribution. Previously, such references had been counted, which created paperwork problems in reporting those costs to the FEC. Local party groups would be required to report their finances only if annual spending for volunteer activities exceeded $5,000 or if costs for nonvolunteer projects were more than $1,000. Before, such groups had to file campaign reports if total spending exceeded $1,000 a year.

Volunteer political activity by individuals was encouraged by raising to $1,000, from $500, the amount of money a person could spend in providing his or her home, food, or personal travel on behalf of a candidate without reporting it to the FEC as a contribution. If the volunteer activity was on behalf of a political party, the person could spend up to $2,000 before the amount was treated as a contribution.

The 1979 act also prohibited members from converting leftover campaign funds to personal use. However, those in Congress at the time of the law's enactment were exempted. Because Senate rules flatly prohibited personal use of such funds by former members as well as incumbents, the bill's exemption was of benefit only to sitting House members. The loophole became a target for reformers and caused resentment among senators and younger House members who could not take advantage of it. In 1989 Congress moved to close it by including a provision in an ethics-and-pay law that forced the grandfathered House members to either leave Congress before the beginning of the 103rd Congress in 1993 or lose their right to take the money. The funds that could be converted were frozen at no more than what they had on hand when the 1989 ethics law was enacted.

Protracted Reform Debates

The reform movement that culminated in the sweeping post-Watergate FECA in 1974 was frustrated in its inability to enact public financing of congressional elections. The 1976 Buckley v. Valeo decision made clear to reformers that only through a voluntary system of public financing could campaign spending limits be imposed. Before the 1970s were out, those looking to reform campaign financing would renew their efforts on behalf of public financing of congressional elections and upon the failure of those efforts shift their focus to curbing the growing influence of PACs. These efforts presaged the protracted stalemate of the 1980s over the combined issues of public financing, campaign spending limits, and PAC restrictions.

Congressional Public Funding Defeated

Following the 1976 election, the spotlight quickly focused on extending public financing to House and Senate races. Prospects for passage seemed far better than they had been in 1974, the last time the proposal had been considered. At that time, leading officials, from the White House on down, had been either opposed or seemingly indifferent to its passage.

But in 1977 Jimmy Carter, a strong advocate of public funding, was in the White House. Key congressional leaders favored the proposal. The Democrats had an overwhelming advantage in the House, far larger than during the 93rd Congress (1973–1975), when the House rejected congressional public financing after it had been approved by the Senate.

Despite the high hopes of public financing supporters, legislation to extend the concept to congressional races was blocked in 1977 by a filibuster in the Senate and opposition in the House Administration Committee. Renewed attempts to push the legislation in 1978 and 1979 also went nowhere.

Focus Shifts to Curbing the Role of PACs

The rapid growth in the 1970s and 1980s of PAC money and influence in the electoral process generated a great deal of controversy. Defenders of PACs insisted they were an outgrowth of a democratic society. “PACs are both natural and inevitable in a free, pluralist democracy,” political scientist Larry J. Sabato wrote. “In fact, the vibrancy and health of a democracy depend in good part on the flourishing of interest groups and associations among its citizenry.”<sup>26</sup>

But critics branded PACs as a source of tainted money because their giving often was tied to specific legislation, to a leadership position, to membership on a certain committee, or to the mere fact of incumbency. Wertheimer voiced Common Cause’s view before the Senate Rules Committee in 1989: “It is increasingly clear that PAC participation represents a threat to the public trust in the integrity of our electoral and congressional decision-making processes.”<sup>27</sup>

One member of Congress who renounced PAC contributions said he thought PACs symbolized why voters had become alienated from politics. “People feel like it’s big money, big business, big labor, the lobbyists who are represented, that little by little the playing field has been tilted,” Romano L. Mazzoli, D-Ky., stated in 1990.<sup>28</sup>

However, a fellow Democrat in the House held the opposite view. In an opinion piece in the Washington Post in 1994, John Lewis, D-Ga., argued that PACs “give working people and people with little means the ability to participate in the political process.” He went on: “Many of these people who contribute through a ‘checkoff,’ or small deduction from their paycheck each week, would effectively be denied participation in the process if it weren’t for their union or company PAC.”<sup>29</sup>

PACs became a dominant issue in campaign finance debates in the 1980s and 1990s. But the question of what to do, if anything, about them was a particularly divisive one between the parties and the chambers. Democrats were more dependent on PAC contributions than were Republicans, and House members relied on them far more than senators. Those who wanted to curb PAC influence put forward proposals ranging from banning them completely to limiting how much PACs could give or candidates could receive from PACs.

In 1979 reformers in Congress began to focus on the growing influence of PACs and succeeded in getting the House to pass the Obey-Railsback amendment (to an FEC authorization bill), which reduced the limit on how much money a PAC could contribute to a House candidate and placed an aggregate limit on the amount a House candidate could accept from all PACs. The bill died in the Senate the following year under the threat of a filibuster. Although the bill applied only to House races, opponents in the Senate feared that its passage could renew interest in public financing or could lead to PAC spending ceiling in Senate races. While several years passed before the issue was debated again, the House vote in 1979 ushered in a more than decade-long focus by reformers on PAC restrictions as a central goal.

In 1986 a measure comparable to the 1979 House bill passed the Senate. It first adopted an amendment offered by the Democrats that would have set caps on what a candidate could take from PACs overall and singly and also would have closed loopholes on PAC giving that generally favored Republicans. The Senate then adopted a Republican counterproposal to prohibit PAC contributions to national party organizations, which Democrats relied on more heavily than the GOP. But the legislation got caught in partisan maneuvering over who should get the credit—or blame—for reforming campaign finance guidelines, and which party would suffer the most under the proposed restrictions. A final vote was never taken.

Independent Expenditures

The Supreme Court in the Buckley decision ruled that the 1974 FECA $1,000 ceiling on independent expenditures was a clear violation of the First Amendment right of free expression. Independent expenditures are defined as communications that expressly advocate the election or defeat of a candidate but are made without consultation or coordination with any candidate or any candidate’s committee or agent.

Although there is no limit on the amount that can be spent, independent expenditures are subject to FECA disclosure requirements and must be paid for with funds that are legally permitted in a federal election campaign. In other words, an independent expenditure could not be financed by union or most corporate money (certain small, ideologically based nonprofit corporations are exempt), nor by a contribution from a foreign national.

Independent expenditures have been controversial for several reasons. Some question whether such expenditures are truly independent. Others criticize the clout it gives a wealthy individual or an organization to influence the outcome of an election. Still others point out that candidates themselves sometimes resent this outside interference even when the communication favors their campaigns.

Bundling

Bundling refers to an intermediary pulling together contributions to a certain candidate from a number of individual donors and passing those checks on in a “bundle” to the candidate. The intermediary earns the gratitude of the candidate without having the money count against its own contribution limits. Bundling can be done by an individual, PAC, or political party committee.

For bundling to be legal, however, the original donors must retain control over designation of the eventual recipient. The entity that bundles the checks must report its role to the FEC, although anyone designated by a campaign to raise funds is exempt from reporting requirements. New requirements were imposed under the 2007 ethics reform law to require identification on FEC disclosure forms of registered lobbyists and their PACs who bundle contributions.

Critics argue that because there are no limits on the overall amount a conduit group may collect and pass on to a candidate, bundling essentially allows the group to circumvent the election law’s contribution limits. But bundlers say they are simply matching donors with like-minded candidates.

The Council for a Livable World, a nuclear arms control lobbying group, first bundled checks in 1962, sending contributions to an obscure Democratic Senate candidate from South Dakota named George McGovern. But it was EMILY’s List, which backs Democratic women candidates who favor abortion rights, that perfected the practice. In addition to its regular PAC contributions, EMILY’s List required its members to contribute a minimum of $100 to at least two candidates endorsed by the group.

EMILY’s List was something of an exception. In most cases, according to political scientist Sorauf, bundlers and the interests they represented were not publicly known. In a discussion of PAC bundling, Sorauf wrote: “Virtually all the important information that PACs must and do disclose to the FEC is lost if organized giving is simply bundled instead.”<sup>30</sup> While bundling never emerged as a major focus of reformers in the 1970s, it has remained an issue even in present times.

COMPREHENSIVE REFORM EFFORTS IN THE 1980s AND 1990s

With Democrats regaining control of the Senate in 1986, its leadership made comprehensive campaign finance reform—featuring public funding and spending limits in congressional elections and curbs on PACs—a legislative priority. In 1987 the Senate debated the most comprehensive bill to come before Congress since 1974, but it ultimately was shelved after a record-setting eight cloture votes failed to cut off a Republican filibuster.

The cornerstone of the Senate Democrats’ bill in the 100th Congress (1987–1988) was campaign spending limits, which backers saw as the key to curbing skyrocketing election costs. But such limits were bitterly opposed by Republicans, who thought a spending cap would institutionalize the Democrats’ majority in Congress. Another key element that many Republicans abhorred was for public financing for Senate candidates who agreed to abide by spending limits. Most Republicans said it represented a government intrusion into what generally had been a private realm. Republicans also criticized the bill’s aggregate limit on what Senate candidates could accept from PACs on the ground that the provision would favor the well-organized, well-funded PACs that could donate early in an election cycle, freezing out other PACs that wanted to donate later.

The protracted debate over the bill was marked by extraordinary partisanship and elaborate parliamentary maneuvering. Majority Leader Robert Byrd attempted to break the GOP filibuster by keeping the Senate in session around the clock. During one of two all-night sessions, Republicans responded in kind, by repeatedly moving for quorum calls and then boycotting the floor. That forced Democrats to keep enough members present to maintain the quorum needed for the Senate to remain in session. Byrd then resorted to a little-known power of the Senate, last used in 1942, to have absent members arrested and brought to the floor. This led to the spectacle of Oregon Republican Bob Packwood being arrested and physically carried onto the Senate floor in the wee hours of February 24, 1988.

A truce was eventually reached, the final unsuccessful cloture vote was taken, and the bill was pulled from the floor. A later attempt to adopt a constitutional amendment to overcome the Buckley v. Valeo decision forbidding mandatory campaign spending limits suffered a similar fate, as it would in later Congresses.

In the 101st Congress (1989–1990), the House and Senate passed separate bills—both generally backed by Democrats and strongly opposed by Republicans—containing voluntary spending limits and public financing or benefits and reducing the influence of PACs. But the two chambers’ proposals differed substantially. The Senate would have dismantled PACs, while the House would have set tighter limits on their contributions. The bills also were wide apart on the issue of soft money. The Senate proposal would have taken a big step toward imposing federal rules on state election activities; the House plan limited itself primarily to abuses that cropped up in the 1988 presidential campaigns. Facing these broad differences late in the session, as well as a threat from President George H.W. Bush to veto any bill with campaign spending limits, conferees on the two bills never met.

Bush in 1989 had proposed what he called a “sweeping system of reform” that sought to eliminate most PACs, enhance the role of political parties, and grind down the electoral advantages enjoyed by incumbents (including one of the major weapons in an incumbent’s arsenal, the frank, by banning “unsolicited mass mailings” from congressional offices). Democrats had assailed the Bush plan as baldly partisan. Even within the GOP, there was no consensus on major items such as curbing the frank and eliminating certain PACs.

With campaign finance overhaul presumed dead for the year, lawmakers attempted to peel off the one part of the effort that every politician could agree on: getting broadcasters to lower advertising rates for candidates. But neither chamber acted on the proposal because the effort encountered opposition not only from broadcasters but also from Common Cause, which said the legislation would provide a major benefit to incumbents without dealing with the fundamental problems in the campaign finance system.

Scandals in the 102nd (1991–1992) Congress heightened pressure on both chambers to enact some type of reform measure. The Senate was rocked by the Keating Five savings and loan investigation of 1990–1991, which Common Cause characterized as “the smoking gun” that proved the corruption of the election finance system. On the House side, scandals at the House Bank and Post Office reignited the campaign finance issue in 1992, as House Democratic leaders grasped for reform measures large and small.

Both chambers passed bills in 1991 to limit spending and subsidize campaigns with public dollars. The bills, however, were vastly different, and finding common ground seemed unlikely. But with the impetus of the ethics scandals, conferees came up with a compromise bill, in part by letting each chamber live by its own rules on public financing. The Senate backed off from its ban on PACs, and the House went along with the Senate’s more restrictive language on soft money. But in the end what they produced was a Democratic bill and, without bipartisan support, it was doomed. President George H.W. Bush—objecting to its spending limits, public funding, and creation of separate systems for House and Senate campaigns—vetoed the bill. The Senate fell nine votes short of overriding Bush’s veto. In the wake of the legislation’s failure in 1992, both Democrats and Republicans aggressively argued that the other side stymied their efforts at reform.

Given the strong backing from Democrats in the previous Congress and incoming President Clinton’s vow to overhaul the system, the 103rd Congress (1993–1995) opened with high expectations for enactment of a new campaign finance law. Both chambers did pass bills in 1993, but again they were radically different. The Senate bill banned PACs, while the House bill set an aggregate cap on PAC contributions to a campaign. Both measures contained spending limits but offered vastly different incentives to encourage candidates to comply. House and Senate Democrats worked out a compromise, but the bill died late in the 1994 session when a GOP-led filibuster blocked the Senate from sending its bill to conference.

Failure to enact the bill in 1994 was a major defeat for Clinton and Democratic congressional leaders. Democrats, however, had set the stage for defeat by waiting until the eleventh hour to come up with a compromise version. Indeed, the long history of the legislation was rich with evidence that many Democrats in both chambers shared GOP objections to establishing a system that would provide congressional candidates with federal subsidies. Other Democrats, particularly in the House, were deeply, if privately, opposed to an overhaul of the system that had protected their seats and majority status for years. In the end, it was the inability of Democrats to iron out their internal differences that delayed the bill so long that it became vulnerable to procedural snags. Some supporters of the legislation blamed Clinton, who had campaigned on the issue but exerted little pressure on Congress to pass reform in 1994.

The Republican takeover in the next Congress (1995–1997) made little difference in campaign finance legislation. Despite promises to overhaul the system, Republicans had no more success than their Democratic predecessors. The most memorable development on campaign finance in 1995 turned out to be the least important: a much-publicized handshake by President Clinton and House Speaker Gingrich on agreement to create a commission to explore changes in the system. Nothing came of it.

With their new majority status in Congress helping to fill GOP election coffers, many Republicans found themselves loath to change the system. Although rank-and-file members managed to force the leadership to allow floor debates on the issue, Congress failed to pass legislation in either chamber. A bipartisan effort to revise campaign finance laws was stopped once again by a filibuster in the Senate. The bill called for voluntary spending limits in return for certain incentives and would have banned PAC and soft money contributions. In the House, a GOP bill that would have set new contribution limits for individuals and PACs was defeated, in part because of an unrelated provision that would have required labor unions to get signed agreements from workers before using their dues for political contributions. A House Democratic alternative was defeated as well.

By the mid-1990s and particularly during the 1996 elections, the explosive growth of soft money and issue advocacy advertising added a new urgency to the campaign finance debate, along with a major campaign finance scandal in that election. Suddenly, Congress's long-standing preoccupation with PACs, spending limits, and public funding gave way to efforts to curtail the types of campaign spending that were wholly unregulated by the FECA. In short, Congress switched its focus from trying to improve the regulatory system to saving it, as soft money and issue advocacy had grown in importance to the point of rendering the FECA's limits and prohibitions almost meaningless.

Major Loopholes

Soft Money

Campaign finance laws adopted at various points in the twentieth century barred corporations and unions from contributing to federal campaigns and set an annual ceiling on an individual's aggregate contributions to federal candidates, PACs, and party committees. The laws, however, did not prevent these entities from giving "soft" money—unlimited and largely unregulated contributions—to political party committees for activities ostensibly unrelated to federal candidates. It was called "soft" to distinguish it from the tightly regulated "hard" dollars (money that was "hard" to raise because of the law's limitations) that could go directly to parties, PACs, and candidates for use in federal campaigns.

Soft money donations skyrocketed in the 1990s, as did the controversy surrounding them. For some, soft money represented a return to the pre-Watergate era when fat cat contributors won special access with six-figure donations. But party officials lauded the contributions, saying they kept party organizations relevant and strong.

Ironically, soft money was an outgrowth of the tough post-Watergate reforms that sought to clamp down on flagrant campaign finance abuses. FECA in 1974 set limits on contributions and augmented public financing of presidential elections. But the new law was so strict that candidates, party committees, and even academics joined in protest following the 1976 election cycle, arguing that the new rules were stifling volunteer and grassroots party activity. For example, bumper stickers, lawn signs, and the like were considered in-kind contributions to the candidates. Also, public financing of presidential campaigns had brought with it restrictions on spending and tight limits on additional fund-raising by parties and campaign committees. The campaigns opted to spend their resources on advertising rather than local party activities. Party leaders complained that the new law had almost completely eliminated state and local party organizations and grassroots volunteer activities from presidential campaigns.

Responding to those complaints, the FEC issued a controversial ruling in 1978 allowing a state party to use money that was not permitted under federal campaign finance law—in this case, money from corporate and union treasuries—to pay for a portion of grassroots and generic party activities, even if they indirectly aided federal candidates. Previously, the FEC had allowed the use of nonfederal money to pay a portion of a party's overhead and administrative costs but had barred the use of such money to pay for any portion of get-out-the-vote or voter registration activities because of their indirect effect on federal races.

FEC Commissioner Thomas E. Harris issued a sharp dissent to the agency's 1978 ruling, arguing that it would allow the use of corporate and union money to pay most of the costs of voter drives because there usually were more state and local elections than federal races in a state. “His point was not lost on party leaders, who quickly began to adapt their financial strategies to take advantage of the new opportunities inherent in the FEC’s decision,” political scientist Anthony Corrado observed. Because the national parties also were involved in state and local election activities, it was assumed that they too could use money not permitted under the FECA for certain expenses as long as they kept this nonfederal money in a separate account.<sup>31</sup>

Then in 1979 Congress approved amendments to the FECA allowing state and local parties to spend as much as they wanted on campaign materials for volunteer activities to promote any federal candidate. Such items included buttons, bumper stickers, handbills, brochures, posters, and yard signs. Also, those party organizations were allowed to conduct, without financial limit, certain kinds of voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives on behalf of presidential tickets.

The 1978 FEC ruling and the 1979 amendments gave rise to the soft money phenomenon. The FEC had sanctioned the use of both federal and nonfederal money for election activities as long as it was kept in separate accounts, and the 1979 law allowed state parties to spend unlimited amounts for activities that would aid their entire slate of candidates, including federal candidates. With traditional funding sources restricted by the FECA contribution limits, there was a strong incentive for parties to find other sources of money so they could take advantage of the new avenues opened to them.

Republicans were faster to seize on soft money’s possibilities in the 1980 presidential campaign, but Democrats quickly caught up and resisted early calls to abolish the practice. The rapid growth of soft money led Common Cause to sue the FEC to force it to tighten its regulations. In a partial victory, a federal judge ordered the agency to amend its rules; one of the effects of the new rules was to make national party soft money reportable. Previously, disclosures of soft money had been largely voluntary; however, at the beginning of 1991, regulations went into effect requiring that the money be reported to the FEC and the reports be made available to the public.

In the 1992 election cycle, the first in which soft money had to be reported, the national party committees reported soft money receipts of $86 million—$49.8 million went to the Republicans and $36.3 million to the Democrats. By the 1996 cycle, the parties were aggressively seeking soft money and managed to raise $262 million—$138.2 million went to the GOP and $123.9 million to the Democrats. Moreover, they had found an important new use for it: television issue advocacy advertising. “To a certain extent, there was only so much money you could spend on get-out-the-vote,” explained Corrado. “But once you started moving to advertising, the demand for soft money rose dramatically.”<sup>32</sup>

The parties’ pursuit of soft money played a key role in the scandal that erupted in the 1996 presidential election. (See “1996 Scandal,” p. 75.) It was the most significant campaign finance scandal since Watergate. Despite the scandal and resulting embarrassment, the parties’ appetite for soft money continued unabated. In fact, soft money, which previously had been largely a phenomenon of presidential politics, became a major factor in congressional politics as well. One study found the growth in party soft money activity, including party issue advocacy, to be “the most important money and politics development in the 1998 congressional elections.”<sup>33</sup>

Democratic Party committees—the national committee and congressional campaign committees—raised $92.8 million in the 1997–1998 election cycle compared with $49.1 million in the last midterm election in 1994, while Republicans raised $131.6 million compared with $52.5 million in 1994. The numbers jumped again in the 1999–2000 election cycle when the Democrats’ national party committees had soft money receipts of $245.2 million and the Republicans, $249.9 million. Because the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 prohibited the national party committees from accepting soft money contributions, the 2001–2002 election cycle was the last during which soft money was raised.

Democratic Party committees raised $246 million, while Republican committees raised $250 million—impressive amounts for a nonpresidential election cycle.

The booming soft money business on Capitol Hill had some reformers wondering why, if soft money was to be used for generic party-building activities and for state and local elections, the congressional campaign committees were raising it. Most of the committees claimed they were taking on broader party functions and giving to state and local candidates. Soft money also became an attractive option for congressional fund-raisers who believed that the two national committees were so focused on presidential contests that they had neglected voter turnout in competitive House and Senate races. However, a big reason for their aggressive pursuit of soft money was the purchase of issue ads.

Issue Advocacy Ads

Issue advocacy advertising is a type of communication that is supposed to promote certain ideas or issues, as opposed to express advocacy ads that call for the election or defeat of particular candidates. As such, issue advocacy constitutes a form of soft money, whereby money may be spent in ways that impact federal elections, but which is not raised and spent in accordance with federal election law. The line between the two types of advertising, however, can be rather thin at times and nearly impossible to discern. In a study of issue ads by the University of Pennsylvania's Annenberg Public Policy Center, the center's director, Kathleen Hall Jamieson, called the distinction between issue advocacy and express advocacy "a fiction."<sup>34</sup>

Issue ads may be broadcast on television or radio, conveyed by telephone, or printed in fliers or mailers. They usually point out a particular candidate's position on a given issue, painting either a dark or glowing picture of the candidate based on that one position, be it abortion or term limits or environmental protection or whatever. Most important, however, the ads stop just short of specifically asking for a vote for or against a candidate.

The Supreme Court in its 1976 Buckley decision ruled that limits on campaign contributions applied only to "communications that in express terms advocate the election or defeat of a clearly identified candidate for federal office." A footnote in the ruling defined express terms to include such phrases as "vote for," "elect," or "support." As a result, many took the position that if issue ads did not include such terms, they were not subject to any reporting requirements or source restrictions.

The use of issue ads by the parties and outside groups grew dramatically in the 1990s, although there were no exact numbers available since soft money expenditures for issue ads did not have to be disclosed. The Annenberg Public Policy Center estimated that between $135 million and $150 million was spent in the 1995–1996 election cycle, rising to between $250 million and $341 million in the 1997–1998 election cycle, and to $509 million in the 1999–2000 cycle. The center estimated that the level declined to $404 million in the 2003–2004 election cycle, the first in which the parties could not use soft money to finance issue advertising. A more common measure of issue advocacy spending in the most recent elections is based on the amount of spending reported to the IRS by 527 groups, the principal practitioners of issue advocacy today (see discussion below). According to the Center for Responsive Politics, 527 groups with a federal focus (excluding state and local parties and candidates) spent $442.5 million in 2004 (close to the Annenberg estimate that year), $207 million in 2006, and, preliminarily, $258.3 million in 2008.<sup>35</sup>

Soft money was used for the first time in a big way to pay for issue ads in the 1996 election. Federal regulations then barred the national parties from using soft money for more than 40 percent of the costs of such ads, while limits on state parties varied depending on the ratio of federal to nonfederal candidates. Interest groups and individuals, however, had no restrictions on how much unregulated money they could spend on the ads.

The potency of issue advocacy was vividly illustrated in the 1996 election cycle, when the largest labor union, the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations (AFL-CIO), spent $35 million on an issue ad campaign—$25 million on paid media and the rest on direct mail and related organizing activities. The ads, which focused on such issues as Medicare, minimum wage, education, and pensions, ran heavily in vulnerable Republican districts. A coalition of business groups, formed to counter labor's effort, spent $5 million on issue ads.

Republicans learned in the 1998 campaign that negative issue ads can sometimes backfire. In the final week of the campaign, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) began running three ads addressing President Clinton's affair with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. Many analysts thought the ads, which had the approval of House Speaker Newt Gingrich, were a mistake and that the GOP should have kept their focus on basic issues that affect voters' everyday lives, such as education and jobs. The ad campaign contributed to the ill will in the House that ultimately caused Gingrich to step down as Speaker.

Opponents of issue ads said they were nothing more than thinly veiled pitches for or against individual candidates and represented a giant loophole in campaign spending laws. They also complained that the public had no way of knowing who paid for the ad. For example, according to the Annenberg Center's study, the top spender on issue ads in the 2000 election cycle was an organization called Citizens for Better Medicare, which spent an estimated $65 million. Most people were not aware of the fact that the group was funded primarily by the pharmaceutical industry.

But supporters argued that issue ads educated the public and helped create a better-informed electorate. They insisted that any limits on issue advocacy would impede their constitutional right to free speech.

Section 527 Groups

In 2000, as Congress was immersed in the debate that would lead to the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, a new controversy erupted over so-called Section 527 groups. These organizations—named after Section 527 of the tax code—are political groups formed to influence elections. Section 527 was written in 1975 after the Watergate scandal to set tax rules for political groups. Originally, they were expected to report their fund-raising and spending to the FEC, just as do all other political committees (whether candidates, PACs, or parties). But as long as the groups did not contribute money or expressly advocate the election or defeat of a specific candidate, they were not required to report anything or otherwise comply with the regulations of the FECA. They could run ads attacking or praising a candidate; they could distribute voter guides condemning the political philosophy of candidates; and they could engage in other political activities that fell under the broad title of “issue advocacy.” Individuals, corporations, unions, even foreign governments, could donate unlimited amounts of money to them, none of which had to be disclosed. They were ideal vehicles—even sanctioned by federal tax laws—for the then-burgeoning issue advocacy activities in elections.

Because there were no public registration laws for such groups, their numbers and influence were incalculable. They ranged ideologically from the far left to the far right, and several were affiliated with prominent special interest groups, such as the Christian Coalition, the League of Conservation Voters, and the Sierra Club. Some were closely affiliated with GOP congressional leaders. Others were independent.

Special attention was focused on this type of group when two backers of presidential candidate George W. Bush of Texas formed a 527 group called Republicans for Clean Air, which ran about $2.5 million worth of television ads before the March 2000 primaries attacking Bush’s challenger, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., for his environmental record.

1996 Scandal

During the 1996 presidential election campaign, public attention was riveted on the flaws of the campaign finance system by allegations that foreign money—particularly Chinese—had made it into the campaign in violation of federal law; in addition, it appeared that the parties’ pursuit and use of soft money may have crossed the line into illegal activity.

Much of the focus was on the Democrats. As the scandal unfolded, it was revealed that the Democratic National Committee (DNC) had accepted nearly $3 million in illegal or suspect contributions, money the DNC said it would return. The fund-raising tactics of President Clinton and Vice President Albert “Al” Gore Jr. were also central to the scandal. The news media provided accounts of the Clintons entertaining large donors at private White House coffees and inviting some contributors for overnight stays in the Lincoln bedroom or to go along on government foreign trade missions, and of Gore making fund-raising calls from his office and attending a controversial fund-raiser at a Buddhist temple in California.

The Republican-led Congress launched investigations in both chambers, which seemed to do little more than embarrass the Democrats for their fund-raising excesses. Senate Governmental Affairs Committee investigators in 1997 came up with no proof of allegations that the Chinese government had conspired to influence U.S. elections through large campaign contributions or that the White House had knowingly accepted illegal foreign contributions or that the Clinton administration ever changed policy in exchange for campaign contributions. Along the way, however, Democrats managed to reveal that a Republican National Committee (RNC) think tank, the National Policy Forum, had also accepted foreign money that may have been passed on to the RNC. A parallel campaign finance investigation was conducted by the House Government Reform and Oversight Committee.

Various requests were made for the appointment of an independent counsel to look into alleged Democratic fund-raising abuses. High-ranking officials, such as FBI Director Louis J. Freeh and the head of the Justice Department’s Campaign Financing Task Force, Charles G. LaBella, urged Attorney General Janet Reno to do so. Reno concluded, however, that the allegations did not meet the standard for such an appointment.

Reno declined to get into the area of soft money because it did not fall under the provisions of the FECA. The attorney general looked at fund-raising phone calls made by Clinton from the White House and Gore from his office but determined that they were to solicit soft money and therefore did not violate the ban on soliciting contributions (as defined in federal election law, that is, hard money) on federal property. Moreover, according to Reno, Clinton’s calls were from the White House residence, which was not covered by the solicitation ban.

The attorney general also examined the question of whether the Clinton-Gore campaign committees had been illegally involved in the political issue ad campaign financed by the DNC. A preliminary investigation by FEC auditors had concluded that both the DNC and the RNC had coordinated millions of dollars worth of issue ads with their respective presidential candidates' campaign committees, making the ads an in-kind contribution in violation of federal spending limits for presidential candidates who accept public funding. But Reno found no criminal intent to violate the law by Clinton or Gore, based on the fact that they had been advised by counsel that the advertising campaign complied with the law. (The FEC subsequently rejected the auditors' recommendations that the campaigns of Clinton and Republican candidate Robert J. "Bob" Dole be required to repay millions in public funding.)

Another request for an outside investigation of Gore came in the midst of his 2000 presidential race. Robert Conrad, who had taken over as head of the Campaign Financing Task Force, urged Reno to appoint a special counsel to investigate whether Gore had told the truth when questioned by the task force about the White House coffees and the luncheon at the Buddhist temple. During the interview, Gore insisted that he had not known the event at the Buddhist temple was a fund-raiser. A key figure at that event was later convicted of campaign finance law violations growing out of a scheme to tap the temple, among other sources, for money to illegally reimburse "straw" donors listed as contributors on reports filed with the FEC. Reno concluded that the transcript of the Gore interview did not reflect false statements or perjury but rather misunderstandings over what was being asked.

While rejecting calls for independent counsels, Reno emphasized that the Justice Department's task force was conducting an ongoing investigation into allegations of wrongdoing in the 1996 election cycle. As of early 2001, the task force had brought charges against two corporations and twenty-six people, most of whom were Democratic contributors or fund-raisers. The various charges included making illegal foreign or corporate contributions and channeling donations through conduit or "straw" contributors who were later reimbursed. The two corporations and twenty-one individuals had either pled guilty or been convicted, one person had been acquitted, and four others were fugitives. One plea bargain agreement included a record $8.6 million in fines.

NEW LAWS IN THE 2000s

In the wake of the 1996 elections, advocates of campaign finance reform began the most intensive effort since the 1970s to restrict the flow of money in federal elections, only to see their proposed overhaul fail in the 105th Congress (1997–1999). They had hoped revelations of campaign abuses in the 1996 election and the emergence of major loopholes in the law would outrage the public sufficiently to put pressure on Congress to move legislation, but Republican leaders focused instead on investigations into Democratic fund-raising activities. The House passed a sweeping measure after its backers surmounted attempts by the GOP leadership to block its consideration on the House floor. The leaders relented in the face of a growing number of signatures on a discharge petition to bring the bill to the floor without committee action, a procedural move that would have cost the leadership control of the floor and allowed backers to debate a variety of campaign finance bills on their own terms. A Senate bill succumbed once again to a filibuster.

Interestingly, the focus of the campaign finance debate had greatly changed this time around. PAC contributions, spending limits, and public funding were no longer the dominant themes. In fact, the House-passed bill included no provisions in those areas. On the Senate side, sponsors of campaign finance legislation dropped those provisions in an attempt to broaden GOP support for their bill. The House and Senate bills focused instead on soft money and issue advocacy advertising, reflecting the dramatic growth of both in the 1990s and the enormous controversy surrounding them. The bills would have banned national parties from receiving or spending soft money and would have prohibited state and local parties from using soft money for federal election activity. They also would have redefined express advocacy so that more of what was then classified as issue advocacy advertising would be regulated.

In the 106th Congress (1999–2001), the House passed a bill that was substantively the same as the legislation it had approved in 1998. Senate sponsors put aside—at least for the time being—their proposal to more closely regulate issue ads and opted instead for a narrow bill that focused on banning soft money. They hoped this move would neutralize GOP opponents' argument that the bill was a violation of free speech rights, at least enough to pick up the votes to overcome a filibuster. But the new strategy, as with previous ones, failed. In an August 2000 television interview, Senator McCain, one of the reform effort's leaders, vowed to tie up the Senate the next year until campaign finance reform was passed. "We will have blood all over the floor of the Senate until we accede to the demands now, not the wishes, the demands of the American people to be represented in Washington again," McCain insisted.<sup>36</sup>

527 Disclosure Required

Success, however, was partially realized during the 106th Congress when Congress agreed in 2000 to close one campaign finance loophole. Months after he had dropped out of a presidential campaign built on a call for an overhaul of campaign finance laws, McCain led a successful effort to win passage of legislation to require full disclosure of contributors and spending by 527 groups. McCain had been targeted during the primary campaign by one such group. While Congress was already considering the broader legislation that was to become the McCain-Feingold act, it turned its attention to 527 disclosure, without addressing the more fundamental question of issue advocacy regulation. Instead, Congress dealt with 527 groups by amending the tax code, which established such groups, rather than the election code.

The new law, passed overwhelmingly by both chambers, required any Section 527 group that raised at least $25,000 annually to report to the IRS each donor of $200 or more and any spending of more than $500. The IRS and the groups were required to make the reports public. The law excluded groups already filing reports with the FEC, as political committees that were fully regulated by the FECA.

Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA)

During the 107th Congress, the Senate passed the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, sponsored by John McCain, R-Ariz., and Russell D. Feingold, D-Wis., and the House passed a similar bill sponsored by Christopher Shays, R-Conn., and Martin Meehan, D-Mass. President George W. Bush signed the final bill into law on March 27, 2002. The new law, often called McCain-Feingold, became effective on November 6, 2002—immediately following the 2002 elections.

The battle for reform, which began in a sense after the 1979 FECA Amendments and changed its focus several times, was finally energized to success, thanks to Democratic gains in the Senate in the 2000 election, the conversion of conservative Republican Sen. Thad Cochran of Mississippi to their cause, and McCain's heightened political clout in the wake of his 2000 election run for president. Cochran's support was touted as providing the sixtieth vote needed to shut down the perennial filibuster against campaign finance-related legislation.

The campaign reform act's central goals were to ban national parties from raising soft money and state and local parties from spending it in connection with federal elections and to prevent other organized groups from running issue ads that refer to specific federal candidates just before an election. The new law also increased many hard money contribution limits and indexed them for future inflation, to make hard money a more attractive option to participants in elections vis-à-vis soft money. Limits on contributions by individuals were doubled, from $1,000 to $2,000 per candidate, per election. Higher limits also were placed on individual contributions to national, state, and local party committees. The aggregate limit on all contributions by individuals was raised from $25,000 per year to $95,000 per two year election cycle, with sublimits of $57,500 to all party committees and PACs and $37,500 to all candidates.

The new law still permitted federal politicians to give campaign contributions to each other and to other candidates. Federal officeholders could give a candidate up to $2,000 per election out of their personal campaign accounts, and up to $5,000 per election out of their leadership PACs. These were separate PACs formed by members of Congress or other political leaders independent of their campaign committees and were often associated with presidential hopefuls, congressional leaders, or would-be leaders.

The reform act prohibited members of Congress, federal officials, and federal candidates from raising soft money for their parties. Officeholders and candidates could, however, raise money for outside advocacy groups—including 527 organizations—but restricted their solicitations only to individuals if the group was involved in federal elections and limited donations resulting from such solicitations to

THE BIPARTISAN CAMPAIGN REFORM ACT OF 2002 (MCCAIN-FEINGOLD)

The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (BCRA), also known as McCain-Feingold (after its primary Senate sponsors), was the first major overhaul of federal campaign finance laws since 1974—more than ninety pages long—aimed principally at banning “soft money” by political parties and regulating election-time issue advertising on radio and television by corporations, unions, and other interest groups. Here are the major provisions of the law:

- Soft money: national party committees. National parties cannot accept or spend soft money—unregulated contributions from corporations, labor unions, and wealthy individuals—ostensibly intended for “party-building” activities, such as voter registration, but often used to at least indirectly benefit federal candidates’ campaigns.
- Soft money: state and local parties. Nonnational political parties cannot spend soft money on “federal election activities,” as defined in McCain-Feingold. State and local parties may spend soft money on voter registration and mobilization under certain conditions.
- Tax-exempt organizations. National, state, and local parties may neither solicit money from nor contribute to any nonprofit that spends money on federal elections or to any so-called 527 organization that is not also registered with the Federal Election Commission (FEC) as a political committee.
- Hard money contribution limits. Effective January 1, 2003, individual contribution limits for candidates for federal office doubled to $2,000 per election, indexed to grow with inflation; aggregate contribution limits for individuals raised to $95,000 per two-year election cycle (with sublimits of $37,500 to candidates and $57,500 to parties and political action committees (PACs), also indexed for inflation. Limits on individual contributions to state and local parties raised to $10,000 per year and to national parties to $25,000 per year (indexed for inflation). Contribution limits for PACs unchanged.
- Electioneering communications. Created new term in federal election law for broadcast, cable, or satellite communications that name candidates for federal office or show their likeness and are targeted at candidates’ states or districts within sixty days of a general election or thirty days of a primary. Required disclosure of such communications to FEC but prohibited labor unions and corporations from directly funding “electioneering communications.”
- Independent and coordinated expenditures. Required FEC to issue new rules regulating coordination between candidates or parties and outside groups. The regulation cannot require formal evidence of coordination to treat spending by outside groups as a regulated “contribution” instead of an unregulated “independent expenditure.”

$20,000 per donor. The law also required that state, local, and district party committees fund federal election activities, as newly defined, only with hard money. An exception—known as the “Levin Amendment”—was made to allow state and local parties to fund purely grassroots efforts, like voter registration and get-out-the-vote, with soft money (with contributions limited to $10,000 per party organization), as long as state law permitted it. Federal officeholders and national parties, however, could not raise “Levin Amendment” funds, and all receipts and disbursements of these funds had to be disclosed.

The law addressed issue advocacy by defining a new term in federal election law: “electioneering communication,” which included broadcast, cable, or satellite advertisements that clearly refer to a candidate within sixty days of a general election or thirty days of a primary. National, state, and local parties could spend only hard money on electioneering communications. Federal and state candidates were permitted to raise and spend only hard money for advertising that attacks or promotes a federal candidate.<sup>37</sup>

McCain-Feingold prohibited corporations and unions from using treasury money to make targeted electioneering communications, but allowed their activities to continue to be financed through a PAC.<sup>38</sup> Because PACs raise and spend money in accordance with federal regulations, their expenditures were considered hard money. Individuals and unincorporated groups could also make electioneering communications, but they had to disclose the identity of those funding the ad, as well as the names of large donors.

In addition, McCain-Feingold established new guidelines regulating coordinated and independent expenditures. As enacted, McCain-Feingold required parties to essentially choose between making coordinated expenditures for a candidate (subject to limits) or independent expenditures on behalf of them (subject to no limits). The Supreme Court overturned this provision in December 2003.<sup>39</sup>

McCain-Feingold Challenged in Court

Shortly after the McCain-Feingold act became law, Sen. Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., and several groups filed suit challenging the law’s constitutionality on First Amendment grounds (McConnell v. FEC). On May 2, 2003, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia struck down the law’s prohibition on soft money but retained the ban for electioneering communications that clearly identify a federal candidate. The court also approved the act’s provisions that prohibit federal officials and candidates from raising soft money. The district court issued a stay to its ruling on May 19, 2003, which kept the law in effect as enacted, pending review by the Supreme Court.<sup>40</sup>

State, district, and local party committee <sup>2</sup>	$5,000 per election combined limit	$5,000 per year	Unlimited transfers to other party committees
National party committee <sup>3</sup>	$5,000 per election	$5,000 per year	Unlimited transfers to other party committees		$42,600* to Senate candidate per campaign <sup>6</sup>
PAC <sup>1</sup> (multicandidate) <sup>7</sup>	$5,000 per election	$5,000 per year	$5,000 per year combined limit	$15,000 per year
PAC <sup>1</sup> (not multicandidate) <sup>7</sup>	$2,400* per election	$5,000 per year	$10,000 per year combined limit	$30,400* per year

NOTES: *These limits are indexed for inflation.

1. PACs include both separate segregated funds (sponsored by a corporation, union, or other organization) and nonconnected PACs (those unaffiliated with a sponsoring organization).
2. A state party committee shares its limits with local and district party committees in that state unless a local or district committee's independence can be demonstrated.
3. A party's national committee, Senate campaign committee, and House campaign committee are each considered national party committees, each with separate limits except for "special limit" on contributions to Senate candidates.
4. Each of the following is considered a separate election with a separate limit: primary election, caucus, or convention with authority to nominate; general election; runoff election; and special election.
5. No more than $45,600 of this amount may be contributed to states and local parties and PACs.
6. This limit is shared by the national committee and the Senate campaign committee.
7. A multicandidate committee is a political committee that has been registered for at least six months, has received contributions from more than fifty contributors and, with the exception of a state party committee, has made contributions to at least five federal candidates. Most of what are commonly referred to as PACs do attain multicandidate committee status (thus eligible for higher limits on contributions to candidates).

On September 8, 2003, the Supreme Court heard oral arguments in McConnell v. FEC. On December 10, 2003, in its most far-reaching campaign finance ruling since Buckley v. Valeo in 1976, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the act's key provisions. In a 5–4 decision that surprised many observers, the Court validated the law's restrictions on the raising and spending of soft money and on electioneering communications. The only provisions the Court invalidated were the requirement that parties choose between making "independent expenditures" or "coordinated expenditures" on behalf of candidates, and its prohibition on persons aged seventeen and under making campaign contributions.<sup>41</sup>

Since the McConnell ruling in 2003, the Supreme Court has twice revisited specific provisions of McCain-Feingold. On June 25, 2007, the Court ruled in Federal Election Commission v. Wisconsin Right to Life, Inc. that the act's prohibition on corporate and union funding of electioneering communications was unconstitutional as it applied to ads the Wisconsin group had sought to run. The ruling did not overturn

McCain-Feingold's prohibition on union and corporate funding of electioneering communications outright, but it did limit the law's application. The Court recognized that Wisconsin group's ad could be reasonably be interpreted as something other than an appeal to vote for or against a candidate and hence could not be seen as the functional equivalent of express advocacy. Henceforth, in the view of one legal analysis, "only ads that are susceptible of no reasonable interpretation other than an exhortation to vote for or against a candidate can be regulated."<sup>42</sup>

In 2008 the Supreme Court overturned the constitutionality of McCain-Feingold's so-called millionaire's amendment, which had allowed individual contribution limits and party-coordinated expenditure limits to be raised to assist candidates opposed by wealthy congressional candidates who exceeded specified levels of personal spending on their campaigns. On June 26, 2008, the Court ruled in Davis v. Federal Election Commission that the provision placed undue burdens on the free speech of candidates without being sufficiently justified by a compelling governmental interest in lessening corruption.<sup>43</sup> While the provision had been included in McCain-Feingold to help level the playing field, it proved to be a complicated policy to execute.

CANDIDATES' FUND-RAISING AND SPENDING

By 2009 three elections had been held under the new campaign finance reform law. Each election had candidates and election participants adapt to both changes in the law and changes in how money is raised and spent. The Internet dramatically showed how candidates can raise great amounts of money with far less overhead cost than ever before, as was illustrated in the primary campaign of Democrat Howard Dean seeking the presidency in 2004 and particularly in the successful campaign of Illinois senator Barack Obama for the White House in 2008. Modern elections are complex financial affairs, and the McCain-Feingold act introduced new complications. Fund-raisers, accountants, lawyers, and a variety of consultants play crucial roles in today's campaigns. Decisions on how to raise money and how to marshal a campaign's resources can be key to electoral success.

Money and services pour in from a vast array of sources—not all of them controlled by the candidate—including individuals, PACs, party committees, candidates themselves and their families, and independent organizations running their own campaigns to influence the outcome. For those running for president, public funding has been an important element since 1976, although its importance has declined in recent elections as major candidates have opted not to participate. Money flows out for rent, computers, salaries, polls, consulting fees, printing, postage, and radio, television, and newspaper advertising.

Much of the money that at one time moved in the shadows of campaigns is now a matter of public record, thanks to the stringent disclosure provisions of the FECA. All candidates for federal office, once they cross a certain threshold, periodically must submit to the FEC itemized accounts of contributions and expenditures in excess of $200 and debts and obligations owed to or by the candidate or committee. These detailed reports, which are made public by the FEC, provide a window on the modern political campaign.

Fund-Raising by Presidential Candidates

FEC figures for the 2004 presidential election indicated that a field of twelve candidates reported receipts in the prenomination campaign totaling nearly $674 million. This was nearly twice the $343 million raised by the eighteen candidates who sought the Republican or Democratic nomination in 2000, which was in turn $100 million more than seventeen candidates raised in the 1996 primaries. Preliminary figures

TABLE 3-2 Campaign Spending by Candidates for Federal Office: 1976–2008 (in millions of dollars)

The cost of running for federal office has risen inexorably in the more than three decades since Congress enacted the legislation in 1974 that is the basis of the campaign spending laws in effect in 2008. This table shows expenditures under direct control of candidates' campaigns in primary and general elections, including runoff elections. The amounts do not reflect additional spending by parties and outside groups, either within or outside of federal election regulatory system; those numbers are extraordinarily difficult to capture accurately, which invariably leads to reliance on estimates for total campaign costs. As such, these amounts represent the strictest measure of election costs over time but do not reflect the full range of election-related spending in contemporary elections.

for 2008 showed a doubling in fund-raising over 2004, with an estimated $1.6 billion raised by primary candidates.<sup>44</sup>

Individual donors constituted the single most important source of money for 2004 primary candidates ($611.4 million), followed by public funding payouts from the U.S. Treasury ($28 million). Other sources included contributions by PACs ($3.5 million) and transfers from prior campaigns ($6.8 million). For the first time in 2004, both major party nominees declined matching funds during the primaries (in 2000 George W. Bush had become the first nominee to have declined primary matching funds). Democrat Howard Dean, considered the early Democratic frontrunner in 2004 also declined primary matching funds. President George W. Bush raised $269.6 million in the 2004 prenomination campaign—almost three times more than he raised for the Republican 2000 primaries. John F. Kerry raised $234.6 million, a new record for a Democratic nominee.<sup>45</sup>

For the 2004 general election campaign, the two major party candidates each received $74.6 million in public funding. In return, they agreed to limit themselves for the most part to that amount and not accept outside money. In 2008 only the Republican nominee, John McCain, accepted public funds in the general election, amounting to $84.1 million. Barack Obama became the first president elected since the onset of public funding to have declined public funds in both the primary and general elections.

There are several exceptions to the no-outside-money rule for candidates who participate in public financing. Publicly funded candidates may accept private contributions to a special account maintained exclusively to pay for expenses related to complying with federal campaign finance law. This is known as a general election legal and accounting compliance (GELAC) fund. Bush and Kerry raised an additional $21 million in GELAC funds during the 2004 general election.<sup>46</sup> In addition, publicly funded candidates may spend up to $50,000 of their own money. Also, political parties are permitted to spend a specific amount of money on behalf of their candidates, in the form of coordinated expenditures.

There are invariably, of course, millions of additional dollars being spent to influence the outcome of presidential primaries and elections. Financial activity of 2004 presidential candidates and national conventions topped $1 billion, an increase of 56 percent over spending in 2000. Labor unions, corporations, and other organizations spent big money on things such as issue ads and get-out-the-vote efforts. Individuals, political parties, and other groups spent $192.4 million independently advocating for or against candidates. In 2000 these efforts totaled $14.7 million and in 1996, $1.4 million. Much of the independent spending in 2004 was undertaken by the national party organizations. The DNC reported expenditures of $120 million, and the RNC spent $18.2 million. The RNC reported spending $45.8 million on generic media ads, and the DNC spent $24 million on similar ads. In addition, the parties spent a total of $32.1 million on coordinated expenditures during the general election, as the FECA permitted each party to spend up to $16.25 million in this manner.<sup>47</sup>

Public Funding

Presidential elections have been financed in part by public funds since 1976, with the inauguration of a voluntary system of matching funds for primary election candidates and full funding for presidential nominees who agree to spending limits. It was hoped that the program would reduce the influence of wealthy donors, relieve candidates of some fund-raising burdens, and level the playing field plan so qualified candidates would not be shut out by the spiraling costs of campaigns.

Background. Concern over the financing of elections was not a modern phenomenon. Wealthy donors had begun playing a role in politics long before the Civil War. Industrialism only expanded their influence. Entrepreneurs who donated money to Ulysses S. Grant in the 1868 election included Jay Cooke, Cornelius Vanderbilt, A.T. Stewart, Henry Hilton, and John Astor. “Never before was a candidate placed under such great obligation to men of wealth as was Grant,” wrote one historian.<sup>48</sup>

Concern over the influence of big business and big donors grew in the wake of revelations by “muckraking” journalists and agitation by Progressive Party reformers. Corporations, banks, railroads, and other businesses had become major sources of political money, with many corporations reportedly making donations to the national parties of $50,000 or more.<sup>49</sup>

The role of campaign professionals also triggered alarm among reformers. Marc Hanna, an Ohio mining magnate and a key strategist for William McKinley in the elections of 1896 and 1900, raised money for the Republican Party through a systematic assessment of banks and corporations in amounts that were said to represent their share in the nation’s prosperity. He used the money to make McKinley financially solvent, to influence possible delegates, and to pay for the kind of mass propaganda campaign that would change the face of national politics forever. As if to validate the notoriety that surrounded him, Hanna was said to have commented: “There are only two important things in politics. The first is money, and I can’t remember the second.”<sup>50</sup>

McKinley’s successor, Theodore Roosevelt, accepted large gifts in his 1904 campaign, arguing that “the wrong lies not in receiving the contribution” but in exercising improper pressure or making promises to get it.<sup>51</sup>

Not all agreed. Legislation to use public funds to finance presidential elections was first introduced in 1904 by Rep. William Bourke Cockran, a Democrat from New York. Cockran believed that “it might be possible for the government of the United States to do away with any excuse for soliciting large subscriptions of money” by using public funds to finance elections. In his December 1907 annual message, Roosevelt joined those calling for the “very radical measure” of public funding of party organizations. But no action was taken.

Congress did approve legislation in 1907 to ban bank and corporate gifts to federal candidates and in the ensuing decades placed other restrictions and requirements on the campaign finance system. (See “Corporate Contribution Ban,” p. 57.) But it would be more than a half century before public funding was enacted, and approval did not come easily.

Program Established. Beginning in the mid-1950s, presidential public funding bills were introduced regularly in Congress. Support grew and in 1966 Congress approved a plan to set up a fund to provide money to presidential general election campaigns through payments to their political parties. The program was to be financed by allowing taxpayers to check a box on their income tax forms if they wished to designate $1 of the tax payment ($2 for a joint return) to go to the fund. However, the following year—before the program ever went into effect—Congress suspended it, pending the adoption of guidelines for distributing the money. Congress never adopted the guidelines.

After a bitter partisan struggle, Congress in 1971 again enacted public funding legislation. The Revenue Act of 1971 created the Presidential Election Campaign Fund for federal financing of presidential general election campaigns through direct payments to qualifying presidential candidates who agreed to limit their spending to the amount of the federal subsidy. The fund was to be financed by a voluntary $1 tax checkoff ($2 if a joint return) on federal tax returns.

Democrats, whose party was deeply in debt and traditionally received less campaign financing than the Republican Party, sponsored and defended the public funding proposal. They argued that such a plan would remove politics from the influence of large contributors. Republicans decried the move as a brazen political act and, with the help of a veto threat from President Richard Nixon, succeeded in winning approval for postponing implementation of the fund until after the 1972 presidential election.

Comprehensive campaign finance legislation enacted in 1974 extended public funding to presidential primaries and nominating conventions.

The constitutionality of the 1974 statute was quickly challenged in the courts by a diverse group of plaintiffs who claimed, among other things, that its contribution and spending limits curbed freedom of expression. In the landmark 1976 Buckley v. Valeo decision, the Supreme Court found key parts of the statute to be unconstitutional, including most of its expenditure limits. However, the Court upheld public financing and its spending limits because, unlike the others, these restrictions were voluntary—candidates were free to reject public funding and the limits that came with it. (See Buckley v. Valeo, p. 66.)

The presidential election funding system set up by the 1971 and 1974 acts has remained basically the same, with only a few changes over the years. Congress in 1993 tripled the tax checkoff to $3 ($6 for a joint return).

How It Works. To be eligible to receive public funds, presidential candidates and party convention committees must meet certain requirements.<sup>52</sup> Once the FEC determines that these have been met, it certifies the amount of money the U.S. Treasury should pay out of the Presidential Election Campaign Fund.

There are three main components of the program:

- Primary matching funds. Partial payments are made to eligible presidential primary candidates through a matching program. The federal government will match up to $250 of the total contribution by an individual to a candidate. (Individuals may contribute up to $2,400 to a candidate (based on 2009 FEC revisions), but only the first $250 can be matched.) Party and PAC contributions are not eligible for matching.

To participate in the matching program, a candidate first must raise more than $100,000, of which more than $5,000 must be raised in each of twenty states. Because only $250 of each contribution counts toward this threshold, there would have to be more than twenty individual donors in each of those states. A candidate must agree to a total national spending limit of $10 million plus a cost-of-living adjustment (COLA), as well as state-by-state limits ($200,000 plus COLA, or sixteen cents times the state's voting age population, whichever is greater). A candidate also must agree to limit personal spending on the campaign to $50,000. (Some expenses are exempt from the spending limits.)

Primary candidates can lose their eligibility for matching funds if they fail to receive 10 percent of the vote in two consecutive primaries. However, they may regain that eligibility once they exceed 20 percent in a later primary. Candidates who are no longer actively campaigning may continue to request matching funds to wind down their campaigns and pay off campaign debts.

In the 2004 presidential race, candidates who accepted public funding were allowed to spend $45 million on their prenomination efforts. This figure was up slightly from the $41 million publicly funded candidates were allowed to spend in 2000. Because Republican nominee Bush and Democrats Kerry and Dean declined public funds in the 2004 primaries, matching funds certified by the FEC dropped off considerably between the 2000 and 2004 election cycles. In 2000 the FEC certified $62 million in matching funds to ten primary candidates, while in 2004 it certified only $28 million to eight presidential primary candidates. In 2008, with several prominent candidates opting out of public funding (including Hillary Clinton, Obama, and McCain), only $21.7 million in matching funds was paid out to eight candidates.

- Nominating conventions. Major political parties are entitled to receive $4 million, plus COLA, for their national presidential nominating conventions. (The subsidy base originally was $2 million, but it was raised to $3 million in 1979 and to $4 million in 1984.) A qualified minor party may receive funding based on its nominee's share of the popular vote in the previous presidential election.

The two major political parties each received $14.9 million for their 2004 presidential nominating conventions and $16.8 million for their 2008 conventions. Party convention committees in theory could not spend more than the amount to which their parties were entitled. However, the FEC has permitted additional spending from a variety of sources. Host state and city governments and local groups such as businesses and labor unions have been permitted to provide certain supplemental services. For example, a host city could provide additional public transportation to and from the convention site, or a business could sell or rent equipment to the convention committee at a discount. Contributions could also be accepted for a special account used to pay legal and accounting expenses incurred in complying with the campaign finance law. In addition, local officials and businesspeople could establish “host committees” ostensibly to promote their city and its commerce during the convention. Although these committees had to report their receipts and expenditures to the FEC, there were no restrictions on who could contribute to these committees or how much they could give. Host committees for the 2004 Republican national convention raised $85.7 million, while Democratic host committees reported raising $56.8 million; preliminary data showed 2008 Republican convention committees raised $57 million and Democratic committees raised $61 million.<sup>53</sup>

- General election funding. Major party nominees who are eligible for public funding in the general election receive a grant of $20 million, plus COLA. In the 2004 race this amounted to $74.6 million each and in 2008 to $81.4 million.

To receive public funds, the nominees must agree to limit their spending to that amount and may not accept private contributions to their campaign. Certain legal and accounting expenses related to complying with the campaign finance law are exempt from these requirements. Also, candidates may contribute up to $50,000 of their own money without having it count against the expenditure limit.

Minor party candidates and new party candidates may be eligible for partial funding in the general election. A minor party candidate is the nominee of a party whose candidate received between 5 and 25 percent of the total popular vote in the last presidential election. The amount the minor party candidate receives is based on the party’s performance in that preceding election. A new party candidate—the nominee of neither a major nor a minor party—may become eligible for public funds after the Election Day if he or she receives at least 5 percent of the popular vote. Minor and new party candidates who accept public funds are subject to the same expenditure limit and other requirements as major party candidates, although because they do not receive as much as the major party candidates, they may supplement their partial public funds with private contributions.

Participation. Nearly $1.5 billion in public funding had been given out through the 2008 presidential election. From 1976 through 2008, a total of $1.3 billion in public funding for primary and general elections was distributed: $363.9 million to one hundred primary candidates, and $919.7 million to seventeen major party nominees and three independent or third-party candidates. In addition, $187.4 million in public funding was given out for the nominating conventions of the two major parties and one minor party.<sup>54</sup>

From the start of the program through 2000, the norm was for presidential candidates to accept public funding. Even candidates who may have philosophically opposed public financing were persuaded to participate because of the easier access to funds and, in a larger sense, to the widespread acceptance of the public funding system in the political community and the media. The rare exceptions included Republicans John Connally in 1980 and Steve Forbes in 1996 and 2000. Independent candidate H. Ross Perot did not take public funding for his 1992 general election campaign, but he accepted it when he ran again in 1996 as the Reform Party nominee. The “norm” began to change in 2000 when George W. Bush became the first candidate to win a major party nomination after forgoing primary matching funds. With a wide fund-raising network in place, Bush’s campaign did not wish to be constrained by the system’s spending limits, and it proved to be a smart calculation. Again in 2004, Bush refused public funding in the primaries and was joined in that decision by Democrats Kerry and Dean, ironically both long-time public finance supporters. In 2004 Kerry became the first Democrat to win the party nomination after declining primary matching funds. In 2008 the system’s decline in appeal to candidates had reached the point where neither of the two leading contenders for the Democratic nomination—Clinton and Obama—accepted public funds, while the emerging Republican nominee McCain opted out of the system after first signaling his intention to participate. To cap it off, Obama became the first nominee of either party to refuse public funding in the general election, after demonstrating unprecedented ability to raise private funds throughout the election year. His success in November underscored the dire state of the presidential public finance system, as 2008 became the first year since 1976 in which public funds played a distinctly minor role in the financing of the election.

Judging by the number of taxpayers who mark “yes” to the tax checkoff, the general public has not been too fond of the program either, even though the contribution adds nothing to their tax obligation. From a high of 28.7 percent of taxpayers participating in the program in the 1980 tax year, the participation rate has been in general decline ever since, reaching a low of only 0.1 percent in the 2005 tax year.<sup>55</sup>

Pros and Cons. People have long had strong opinions on public funding. Supporters have viewed it as the ultimate answer to perceived corrosive effects of money in politics, bolstering public confidence and constituting a quintessentially democratic, egalitarian system. On the other hand, opponents have seen it as a waste of tax money, which artificially skews the results and forces taxpayers to fund candidates whom they may vigorously oppose.”

An FEC report cited three problems the public funding program was supposed to correct:

- “The disproportionate influence (or the appearance of influence) of wealthy contributors;
- “The demands of fund-raising that prevented some candidates from adequately presenting their views to the public; and
- “The increasing cost of Presidential campaigns that effectively disqualified candidates who did not have access to large sums of money.”<sup>56</sup>

An examination of public funding’s affect on these three problems produces a mixed score sheet. In an attempt to put an end to the dominant role of wealthy donors—the so-called fat cats—the public funding program for primary campaigns was designed specifically to encourage candidates to seek out numerous small contributions from individual donors. In the general election campaign, if a candidate accepted public funding, no outside contributions were permitted.

Before the 2004 elections, campaigns could partially rely on unregulated contributions to circumvent these seemingly stringent rules. Through the use of soft money donations to national party committees, big donors continued to be major players in presidential politics. By the 2000 presidential election campaign, it had become commonplace for corporations, labor unions, and wealthy individuals to make donations of $100,000 or more to party soft money accounts. According to FEC figures, soft money donations to national party committees amounted to $495.1 million in the 1999–2000 election cycle, up from $262.1 million in 1996 and $86.1 million in 1992.

Whether candidates had been relieved of the burdens of fund-raising was debatable. While major party candidates no longer had to spend time raising money for their general election campaigns, they instead began to devote time and energy to raising funds for their parties’ soft money accounts. In the wake of McCain-Feingold and the end to party-raised soft money, opportunities continued to exist for soft money to influence the system in the form of issue advocacy and other spending by outside groups. As for primary races, critics had long expressed concern that candidates had to work harder to find numerous small individual donors to meet the requirements of the matching program. However, given the stunning successes of candidates like Dean and Obama in raising small donations via the Internet, that assessment too may be changing.

The program’s plan to level the playing field through a combination of public funding and expenditure limits has had mixed results. Supporters have argued that public funding has helped candidates compete, pointing to the fact that in the elections from 1976 to 1996, challengers, who historically had been underfunded, defeated three incumbent presidents.<sup>57</sup> Yet, outside money, in the form of soft money and independent expenditures, could still skew the results of publicly funded campaigns. Of course, since the program was voluntary there was no assurance that all candidates would be playing by the same rules. Republican candidates in the race for their party’s 2000 nomination found themselves competing against front-runner George W. Bush who declined public funding. Elizabeth Dole dropped out of the race in October 1999—months before the first primary—after concluding she would never be financially competitive with Bush. “The bottom line is money,” Dole said as she announced her withdrawal. At the time, she reportedly had $861,000 in cash on hand, while Bush had $37.7 million.<sup>58</sup>

In the 2008 election, the public financing system was rendered almost meaningless due to the nonparticipation of the three leading candidates (Clinton, Obama, and, in the primaries, McCain), while long-standing assumptions about money in politics were challenged by new forms of fund-raising. Supporters of public financing were left with a sense of urgency about enacting legislation to bolster the system through higher spending limits and greater levels of public funds, lest the system die of disuse.

Individual Contributions

Political campaigns for the White House and Congress have traditionally been financed largely by the contributions of individual donors. The biggest difference today is that many more contributors are now involved in the process, especially as candidates have learned to take advantage of fund-raising on the Internet. The pre-Watergate contributors of unlimited amounts of money to federal candidates were largely replaced by smaller donors, who either gave directly to a candidate or contributed through a political party committee or PAC. The big donors, of course, did not disappear. After coming up against statutory limits on direct contributions to federal campaigns, they found other outlets, such as soft money contributions to the parties.

Under the new limits established by the McCain-Feingold act, an individual could give a primary candidate up to $2,000 (before future adjustments for inflation) during the entire primary season, no matter how many presidential primaries the candidate entered. An individual could give another $2,000 to a candidate during the general election campaign, if the candidate was permitted to accept private funds.

As noted above, contributions by individuals are especially important during the presidential primary season because these are the only donations eligible for federal matching. The idea behind matching only $250 of an individual donation and requiring candidates to meet a $100,000 threshold was to make them demonstrate broad-based support.

Twelve presidential campaigns in 2004 reported that 90 percent of their total prenomination receipts had come from individual contributions directly to their campaigns—$611.4 million out of a nearly $674 million total. Individual donors were also the dominant source of campaign money for most of the primary candidates who did not receive public funding. In 2004 Republican Bush, for example, reported receipts of $259 million coming from individual donors, while Democrat Kerry reported $215 million and Dean reported $51 million.

Preliminary data for 2008 show that of the $1.8 billion raised by presidential candidates during that election cycle, 77 percent, or nearly $1.4 billion, came from individuals giving directly to candidates.<sup>59</sup>

Political Parties

As would be expected, political party committees maintain, at least officially, a neutral stance during the presidential primary season as members fight it out for the party's nomination. Little more than $28,000 in party contributions was reported in the 2004 primary campaign, illustrating how negligible party contributions are at that point of the election cycle. Of this amount, $23,476 came from Republican state and local committees and $4,892 came from Democratic state and local committees.

Conventions. However, the parties have a highly visible role in the general election campaign. They hold national conventions where their presidential and vice-presidential candidates are formally nominated. The parties work hard to impress the American people with their presidential ticket and national platform and to invigorate party regulars to go out and campaign for a victory in November.

But there is other work to be done. The political parties also use the conventions to entertain campaign contributors—the more the donors have given, the more lavish and exclusive the occasion. The guests are warmly rewarded for their past generosity, and then asked for more. As former GOP chair Frank J. Fahrenkopf Jr., put it: “You’ve got most of your die-hard supporters in one place... It’s a very, very critical source of money for both parties.”<sup>60</sup>

But the political parties have to compete with lobbyists and other interests who are doing their elaborate entertaining to curry favor with powerful politicians. “Nominating conventions are less and less about nominating, and more and more about networking and partying,” said Jim Owen, a spokesperson for the Edison Electric Institute, a trade association that joined with other energy-related trade associations to sponsor tributes to powerful members of Congress at both the Republican and Democratic 2000 conventions.<sup>61</sup> Together, the two parties received a total of $29.8 million in public funds for their nominating conventions. Republican and Democratic host committees raised a total of $142.5 million to support convention activities.

In 2007 Congress enacted a new ethics law that sought to address the perception that lobbyists used convention-time fund-raising for politicians to gain undue influence. A provision of the Honest Government and Open Leadership Act prohibited members of Congress from attending such events if paid for by lobbyists.

Coordinated Expenditures. During the general election campaign, national party committees are permitted to make “coordinated expenditures” to support their nominee. The parties make the actual expenditures for goods and services rather than giving the money to the candidate’s campaign, but they may consult with the campaign on how the money should be spent. This money is used for everything from consultants and media costs to lodging and car rentals.

The total amount that parties can spend is determined by a formula: 2 cents multiplied by the national voting-age population and adjusted for the cost of living. In the 2004 campaign, this amounted to $16.3 million for each party and in 2008 to $19.1 million each. This money does not count against a publicly funded candidate’s spending limit, but the parties must report expenditures to the FEC. In 2008 the two parties spent $25.3 million in coordinated expenditures. The parties spent $32.1 million in 2004, $27.2 million in 2000, and $18.7 million in 1996.

A legal challenge to any type of restriction on what political parties could spend to help specific candidates (presidential or congressional) was halted by the Supreme Court in June 2001. The Court by a narrow 5–4 vote in Federal Election Commission v. Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee (known as “Colorado II”) upheld strict limits on what political parties could spend in coordination with candidates.

Independent Expenditures. A new avenue for parties was opened in 1996 when the Supreme Court, in its 1996 ruling in Colorado Republican Federal Campaign Committee v. Federal Election Commission, held that state and national parties were free to make unlimited expenditures in a congressional campaign as long as the party and the candidate were not working together. The Court thus rejected the prevailing assumption that a party was uniquely connected to its candidates—especially given the coordinated expenditures it made on behalf of its candidates—and could not act independently of them.

But the parties showed little interest in taking advantage of the ruling in the 1996 presidential campaign—the only party independent expenditures for or against presidential candidates were made by state and local committees, and they amounted to less than $18,000. The national party committees reported no independent expenditures for or against presidential candidates in the 2000 race, and state and local committees reported spending less than $21,000.

By 2004, however, the parties showed a strong interest in using independent expenditures to advocate the election or defeat of presidential candidates. The DNC reported spending $120 million, while the RNC spent $18.2 million. The Republicans also reported spending $45.8 million on generic media ads, while the DNC spending on similar ads totaled $24 million. Today, parties may make both coordinated and independent expenditures on behalf of their candidates, requiring that they set up separate operations for each.

Soft Money. The marked increase in party independent spending in 2004 may be attributed in part to the McCain-Feingold act's ban on soft money. For much of the previous decade, parties had focused primarily on raising soft money. The passage of McCain-Feingold in 2002 brought an end to this system and in so doing required the parties to adjust their fund-raising efforts.

Before 2002, soft money had an enormous effect on presidential campaigns. Although this money could not by law be used for federal candidates, when it was channeled into such grassroots activities as voter registration, education, and turnout, or bought generic party advertising, party candidates at all levels benefited. The money also could be used to pay a portion of the overhead expenses of party committees, thus freeing up federal money for other uses. Moreover, soft money became an increasingly significant source for funding issue advocacy advertising—those ads that promoted the party's positions but did not “expressly advocate” the election or defeat of candidates.

In 1996 the parties raised a combined total of $262 million in soft money. Four years later, the parties raised a combined total of $495 million in soft money. Approximately $300 million of this came from 800 donors, each of whom contributed a minimum of $120,000. Soft money represented 42 percent of total party receipts in 2000, up from just 5 percent in 1984.<sup>62</sup>

Candidate's Money

Those candidates who accept public funding must also accept a $50,000 limit on how much of their own money they can contribute to the campaign. But for those who do not take public funds the sky's the limit, as H. Ross Perot and Malcolm S. “Steve” Forbes demonstrated in recent elections.

Perot, who made his fortune in the computer industry, spent more than $63 million of it in pursuit of the presidency in 1992. In the end, he won nearly 19 percent of the popular vote, the third best showing for a third-party candidate in U.S. history. If he had raised the required amount of money from individuals and spent only $50,000 of his own money, Perot would have been eligible for public funding retroactively. Obviously, he did not. However, when he ran again in 1996—this time as the Reform Party candidate—he received more than $29 million in public funds.<sup>63</sup>

Publishing magnate Forbes unsuccessfully sought the Republican nomination in 1996 and again in 2000. In 1996 Forbes loaned his campaign nearly $38 million. During the 2000 prenomination campaign, he forgave most of that debt and gave his 2000 race nearly $39 million.

Political Action Committees

Most PACs are permitted to contribute $5,000 per candidate per election, with no overall limit, and to give $15,000 per year to a national party committee. But PACs spend little of their money on presidential candidates, preferring instead to focus on congressional races whose outcome could have direct impact on their legislative interests on Capitol Hill. Indeed, PACs are “mostly invisible” in presidential primary politics, according to academics Wesley Joe and Clyde Wilcox. The two cited a study of the 1996 campaign that found that “no presidential candidate raised as much as 4 percent of their total receipts from PACs.”<sup>64</sup>

FEC figures showed that PACs contributed just $2.5 million to presidential candidates in the 2000 race. They reported another $5.9 million in independent expenditures for or against presidential candidates. In 2004 neither the Bush nor the Kerry campaigns received more than 1 percent of their contributions from PACs, but both benefited from PAC spending, particularly in the final weeks of the general election campaign. Between Labor Day and election day, PACs spent more than $25 million. Although this spending paled in comparison to spending by 527 groups, PACs were able to use “express advocacy” language that asked the public to support or oppose candidates—a powerful advantage that the 527s did not enjoy. Preliminary figures for 2008 show that less than 1 percent of presidential candidates' funds came from PACs ($5.7 million out of $1.8 billion).<sup>65</sup>

In addition to creating PACs, companies, trade associations, and labor unions are allowed to promote specific candidates in mailings and phone calls that reach only their employees or members, but not the general public. FEC regulations permit unlimited spending on such communication efforts. In 2004 membership organizations reported $12.3 million in communications to their members. PACs supporting Kerry outspent those backing Bush by more than four-to-one, with most of the spending going toward television and radio ads, hats, T-shirts, mass mailings, yard signs, and phone calls.<sup>66</sup>

Spending by Presidential Candidates

In the 2004 prenomination campaign, twelve contenders reported spending a total of more than $661 million. This was much greater than 2000, when eighteen candidates spent a combined total of only $326 million. The two major party nominees—Bush and Kerry—rejected federal matching funds in the primary campaign and its $45 million spending limit. Bush (who also rejected limits in 2000) reported expenditures of $268.9 million, while Kerry reported $224.8 million.

In the 2004 general election, both Bush and Kerry accepted public funding and agreed to abide by the $74.6 million spending limit. Each party could spend an additional $16.3 million in conjunction with its presidential ticket. Together, the two parties reported coordinated expenditures of $32.5 million.

But these numbers represent only a portion of what was actually spent in the 2004 battle for the White House once everything was tallied up. Many millions more poured into the campaign in the form of issue advocacy, generic advertising, and independent expenditures.

The FEC estimated that the financial activity of 2004 presidential candidates and national conventions totaled more than $1 billion. This amount represented a 56 percent increase over what was spent during the 2000 presidential campaign. In addition to spending by the candidates and convention committees, individuals, parties, and other groups reported $192.4 million in independent expenditures. In 2000 independent expenditures totaled $14.7 million, and in 1996, $1.4 million.

In 2008 preliminary data showed that the candidates alone spent nearly $1.8 billion in the primary and general elections, shattering all previous records. This does not reflect the enormous amounts spent by outside groups.<sup>67</sup>

Planes, Polls, and Pizza

In their study of the 1996 prenomination campaign, Joe and Wilcox noted the various challenges candidates face in seeking their party's presidential nomination. Contenders must make important decisions on issues, strategy, and tactics, but—"above all"—they must raise enough money to get their message across:

Money does not buy victory, but without it a candidate cannot get on the plane and fly to the next stop, cannot answer his or her opponents charges with a television advertisement, cannot commission a poll, or even pay for pizza to feed campaign workers.<sup>68</sup>

The authors pointed out that the money chase had become particularly important in recent campaigns because of the increasingly compressed nomination period. Beyond paying for planes and pizza, there was a certain image that came with successful fund-raising. According to Joe and Wilcox, journalists devoted much air time and newspaper space to candidates' fund-raising prowess in the 1996 campaign. "Indeed, articles as early as October 1995 began to discount candidates who had done less well than expected in the fund-raising race—nearly five months before the first caucus or primary was held."<sup>69</sup>

Some factors are beyond a candidate's control. For instance, President Clinton was virtually unopposed for the Democratic nomination in 1996, but his challenger, Republican Robert J. "Bob" Dole, had to battle a number of primary opponents for his party's nomination. Clinton had the luxury of spending his primary money to advance his general election campaign, while Dole had to focus on the next round of primaries. At the same time, Clinton's campaign was bolstered by DNC issue ads paid for with the enormous amounts of soft money that the White House had begun raising in 1995. It was only after Dole secured the GOP nomination that the RNC began running its issue ads to benefit its candidate—and just in time, too, since Dole was nearly out of money.

In 2004 Democrat Kerry was in a position similar to that of Dole in 1996. He was facing an incumbent president who was unopposed for the Republican nomination, and he had to battle a number of strong challengers for his party's nomination. President Bush had the luxury of advancing his general election campaign during the primaries, while Kerry was forced to spend millions just to secure the Democratic nomination.

Candidates can also be put at serious disadvantage when an opponent decides to spend millions of a personal fortune in pursuit of a presidential nomination—as Forbes did in 1996 and 2000. Similarly, a candidate who declines public funding for the primaries (Bush in 2000; Bush, Kerry, and Dean in 2004; and Obama, Clinton, and McCain in 2008) may have some distinct advantages over opponents who accept public funding and the fund-raising requirements and spending limits that go with it. Indeed, the decision to not take public funds reflects a confidence by the candidate that he or she can raise vast sums of money without undue difficulty.

Media Expenditures

Presidential candidates must get out their message as quickly, as widely, and as efficiently as possible. Today there is only one sure way of doing that: through television advertising. As a result, media expenditures have come to dominate the budgets of modern presidential campaigns.

Between March 3 and October 28, 2004, Bush, Kerry, and the outside groups supporting them spent approximately $575 million on television ads. More than half of this amount was spent in the five battleground states of Florida, Iowa, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin. Kerry and the groups supporting him spent $70.2 million in Florida, and Bush and his supporters spent $46 million. In Iowa, the Kerry forces spent $11.2 million, and the Bush camp spent $8.4 million. Kerry and his allies spent $68 million in Ohio, while Bush and his spent $36 million. In Pennsylvania, Kerry and his supporters spent $46.2 million, and Bush and his backers spent $29.4 million. The pro-Kerry forces spent just under $20 million in Wisconsin and the pro-Bush forces spent $13 million.<sup>70</sup>

Reaching a nationwide audience necessitates a big media budget. In 1996 Clinton and Dole each spent more than 60 percent of their general election budgets on electronic advertising, most of it on television, according to an analysis by the Campaign Study Group (CSG) for the Washington Post.<sup>71</sup> Clinton spent $46.1 million, nearly 63 percent of his total expenditures, and Dole, $46.9 million, or about 61 percent.

In a discussion of the CSG study, campaign finance expert Corrado pointed out that Clinton and Dole had spent significantly less on media in their primary campaigns: $13.1 million (about 32 percent) by Clinton and $7.2 million (about 18 percent) by Dole. Their media budgets increased substantially in the general election campaign because they no longer had fund-raising expenses to worry about and party soft money (which was still legal) was paying for voter mobilization programs.<sup>72</sup>

With so much more money available in the general election campaign, the Clinton and Dole campaigns “pursued the most sophisticated advertising strategies yet seen in a national election,” according to Corrado. “New technologies allowed the candidates to target markets and messages more precisely than ever before, and dramatically expanded the speed with which they could respond to an opponent’s message or change their media buys.”<sup>73</sup> A campaign could have a response ad on the air within a day or two, sometimes even the same day.

Moreover, campaigns could monitor ads in many more media markets than just the national ones, which allowed them to tailor their response ad to a particular local audience and save money on the less expensive local media buys. “As the experience of 1996 indicates, the future may be found in highly localized media buying, digital transmissions, day-by-day media strategies, and the Internet,” Corrado concluded.<sup>74</sup> The 2004 elections confirmed Corrado’s predictions: Bush and Kerry spent the majority of their media budgets targeting the most competitive states with messages tailored to appeal to local voters.

Preliminary data from 2008 showed that among total expenditures by all presidential candidates in the primary and general elections, $637.6 million was spent on media advertising, constituting 35.5 percent of total expenditures. Obama’s campaign spent 47.9 percent ($364 million) of its $730 million in total expenditures on media.<sup>75</sup>

Fund-Raising by Congressional Candidates

In the highly competitive 2005–2006 election cycle, which saw both the House and Senate shift power to the Democrats, congressional candidates raised a total of $1.5 billion. These figures represent a 27 percent increase in receipts over those raised in the 2003–2004 election cycle. Senate candidates raised a total of $634 million, with incumbents attracting nearly $351 million, challengers raising about $183 million, and open-seat candidates raising nearly $100 million. House candidates took in a total of nearly $872 million. The incumbents’ share was $539 million, while challengers raised $178 million and open-seat candidates $155 million.<sup>76</sup>

The great bulk of this money came from two principal sources: individual contributors and PACs. Lesser amounts came from the candidates themselves, usually in the form of loans, and from the political parties.

Individual Contributions

In 2006 individuals were limited to contributions of $2,100 per candidate per election (a primary election, general election, and special election are considered separate elections with separate limits), $26,700 a year to a national party committee, and $5,000 a year to a PAC, with an overall limit of $101,400 per two-year election cycle. Direct contributions by individuals to House and Senate campaigns in the 2005–2006 election cycle amounted to nearly $865 million, about 60 percent of their total receipts. When broken down by chamber, individual contributions accounted for nearly 69 percent ($383.5 million) of Senate candidates’ receipts and about 55 percent ($481.5 million) of House candidates’ receipts.

Individual donors’ reasons for giving are varied, as political scientist Paul Herrnson pointed out in a study of House races. They may give simply because they want to see a change in Congress. They may want access to influential incumbent members, or they may like hobnobbing with political elites. They may want to support those with whom they share a common ethnic, racial, or religious bond.<sup>77</sup>

Although rarely used by individuals in congressional elections, an “independent expenditure” is another avenue for affecting elections. PACs and political parties have used independent expenditures more than individual donors have, but a $1.1 million expenditure in 1984 by businessperson Michael Goland urging the defeat of Sen. Charles Percy, R-Ill.—reportedly because of his Middle East stance—highlighted the potential of such spending when Percy lost. Independent expenditures must be reported to the FEC when they exceed $250 per year.

Political Action Committees

PACs have been around for some time. The Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO) founded the first modern PAC in 1943 when labor unions were barred from contributing directly. But their significance increased dramatically in the 1970s and 1980s. The number of registered PACs was 608 at the end of 1974, when the FEC first began its PAC count. It grew steadily in the 1970s and 1980s and has hovered in the 4,000 range since the mid-1980s. In 2008 the number stood at 4,292. Registration, however, does not necessarily imply that the PAC actually made contributions during an election cycle.

Direct Contributions. The more telling statistics on PAC growth are those on PAC giving. In the 1979–1980 election cycle, PACs contributed $55 million to congressional candidates; in the 1989–1990 election cycle, they reported contributions of nearly $150 million. By 1999–2000 the total had reached more than $245 million, constituting almost 32 percent of House candidates' receipts but less than 12 percent of contributions to Senate candidates. During the 2005–2006 election cycle, PAC contributions to congressional candidates totaled $369.5 million, up 19 percent from the 2003–2004 cycle. Senate candidates attracted $71.1 million from PACs, while House candidates collected $298.4 million.

Why the explosive growth in PAC numbers and dollars? The answer can be found in part in the reform legislation of the 1970s. In 1971 Congress sanctioned the use of regular corporate and union funds to pay the overhead costs of PACs. Legislation in 1974 placed more stringent limits on individual contributions than on those of PACs. Most PACs, in fact, could give five times more than an individual contributor to a candidate—$5,000 versus $1,000. That same year Congress also lifted restrictions on the formation of PACs by government contractors.

PACs also tended to fill a void left by weakened political parties in the 1970s. "As citizen loyalties to political parties waned, as the party organizations weakened, and as the parties lost control of campaigns to the media and candidates, interest groups became the political organization of choice for many Americans concerned about specific (and even narrow) interests and issues," explained political scientist Frank J. Sorauf.<sup>78</sup>

Additional impetus for growth came in 1975 when the FEC ruled that the Sun Oil Co. could establish a PAC and solicit contributions to SunPAC from stockholders and employees; the ruling eliminated the last barrier that had prevented corporations from forming PACs. FEC figures show that the number of corporate PACs jumped from 139 at the time of the SunPAC ruling in November 1975 to 433 by the end of 1976. PACs also reaped benefits from the Supreme Court's 1976 decision striking down restrictions on independent spending.

Reaction to the rapid growth of PAC numbers and influence varied dramatically. Some saw it as a manifestation of democracy at work in a pluralist society, while others perceived it as a threat by special interests to the integrity of the electoral system and governmental process.

But certain facts about PACs have been beyond dispute. For one thing, PACs have been overwhelmingly oriented toward incumbents. FEC figures showed that 80 percent of the money given by PACs to congressional candidates in the 2005–2006 election cycle went to incumbents, while only 10 percent went to challengers and 9 percent to open-seat candidates.

While some critics contend that PACs are out to buy votes with their contributions, many observers believe that their aim is to buy access to members in positions to help—or hinder—their cause. An example of this could be seen in the jump in contributions business PACs made to Democratic incumbents in the House during the 1980s. This increase was attributed to the persuasive powers of California Rep. Tony Coelho, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in the early 1980s, who was said to have convinced traditionally conservative PACs of the logic of having access to a sitting member of the House instead of wasting money on a challenger who was likely to lose.

Thus, pragmatism won out over ideology, as corporate PAC contributions to Democrats edged up to more than 50 percent. But with the Republican takeover of Congress in the mid-1990s, corporate PACs were able to return to old loyalties. "Their ideological brethren had taken control of Congress. At the same time, the newly powerful House Republicans launched an aggressive campaign to cajole the PACs into making up for their past indiscretions by cutting off the Democrats and giving as much money as possible to Republicans," wrote Larry Makinson of the Center for Responsive Politics, a nonpartisan research organization.<sup>79</sup>

In the 2005–2006 election cycle, corporate PACs gave roughly twice as much to the Republicans as to the Democrats in both chambers—about $90 million to the GOP and about $45 million to the Democrats. Labor PACs, however, showed none of the corporate PACs' pragmatism. They were in the Democratic camp when the Democrats controlled Congress and they were in the Democratic camp when the GOP was in control. Of the $55.8 million labor PACs gave to congressional candidates in that same period, about $49 million went to Democrats.

Independent Expenditures. In addition to direct contributions to candidates, individuals, parties, and PACs also can make independent expenditures. One often-cited example of the potency of carefully targeted independent expenditures occurred in 1980 when the National Conservative Political Action Committee (NCPAC) spent more than $1 million against six liberal Senate incumbents, four of whom were defeated. But independent spending did not become a major PAC tactic because, as Sorauf pointed out, these expenditures can earn more enmity than gratitude from candidates and do not produce the close political relationship with candidates that PACs are seeking.<sup>80</sup>

In the 2005–2006 election cycle, parties and PACs spent an additional $261.5 million advocating the election or defeat of congressional candidates, without coordinating with the campaigns. Party committees accounted for $223.7 million (86 percent) of these independent expenditures. Independent expenditures in 2004 congressional races totaled less than half the 2006 amount, $129.7 million, of which $116.1 million were made by parties. Before passage of McCain-Feingold, parties were permitted to use a mix of hard and soft money for generic activities, some of which included advertising that referred to federal candidates without advocating their election or defeat. Under McCain-Feingold, national parties are prohibited from raising or spending soft money for federal election activity.<sup>81</sup>

Leadership PACs. Although PACs are usually associated with interest groups outside Congress, a small but influential group of PACs called “leadership PACs”—also known as “personal PACs,” “member PACs,” or “politicians’ PACs”—exists within Congress. These are separate PACs formed by members of Congress or other political leaders independent of their campaign committees. These PACs are often created by presidential hopefuls, congressional leaders, or would-be leaders. “In almost all cases—and this is central to their role as brokers—sponsoring individuals are raising and giving money at least in part to support their own political careers, positions, or goals,” Sorauf wrote.<sup>82</sup>

Leadership PACs offer several other advantages, according to former FEC commissioner Trevor Potter. A PAC can accept $5,000 from individual donors, and because these PACs are considered to be separate from a candidate’s campaign committee, the candidate can accept contributions from the same source twice—once for the campaign committee and once for the leadership PAC. These PACs also are increasingly being used as a source of funding for a member’s travel or other political expenses.<sup>83</sup> In the 2007–2008 election cycle, leadership PACs made $37 million in contributions to federal candidates, down slightly from the $42 million given in the 2006 elections.<sup>84</sup>

In addition to giving $5,000 per election out of their leadership PACs, Congress members can give candidates a maximum of $2,400 per election (as of 2009) out of their campaign accounts.

Assistance from Political Parties

Political parties traditionally have provided direct assistance to candidates in two ways: through contributions and through payments to vendors in a candidate’s behalf. The latter, known as “coordinated expenditures,” fund any number of campaign services such as polling, research, direct mailings, advertising, or buying TV time.

Party committees also persuade others to contribute. Convincing PACs, individuals, and incumbent House and Senate members to support a party’s most competitive challengers and open-seat candidates has been one of the major tasks of the congressional campaign committees.<sup>85</sup> These congressional, or Hill, committees are the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, National Republican Senatorial Committee, Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Parties have found other ways to aid candidates, creating a great deal of controversy along the way. This type of assistance has over time ranged from get-out-the vote drives to so-called issue ads that stop just short of asking for a vote to independent expenditures in support of a party’s candidates.

Direct Contributions, Coordinated Expenditures. McCain-Feingold included several provisions to allow parties to raise money more easily and to spend more to assist their candidates. The limit on what the national and senatorial party committees could give to a senate candidate was raised from a combined total of $17,500, not indexed for inflation, to $35,000, adjusted for inflation ($42,600 in the 2010 election cycle). The limit on individual contributions to state parties was raised from $5,000 to $10,000 per year and to national parties from $20,000 to $25,000 per year ($30,400 in the 2010 election cycle).

Under the FECA, party committees may spend up to two cents for every person of voting age in coordinated expenditures for Senate candidates and at-large House candidates (in the 2008 elections, this ranged from $84,100 to $2.3 million); in House races in multidistrict states, the law’s limit of $10,000 plus cost-of-living adjustment amounted to $42,100 in the 2008 elections. Because these limits apply to a national or a state party, one can cede its authority to the other, in effect doubling these limits. Coordinated funds may only be used in general elections.

The Republican Party has historically proven itself to be the more successful fund-raiser of the two parties. GOP fund-raising prowess certainly could be expected when it was the majority party in Congress, but Herrnson found that some of their advantage was more permanent, including a superior direct-mail fund-raising list and a wealthier constituency.<sup>86</sup> The 2008 election, however, saw a change in the relative status of the two parties.

In the 2003–2004 election cycle, national, state, and local Republican Party committees reported federal (hard dollar) receipts of $892.9 million and expenditures of $875.7 million; the Democratic committees that year raised $730.9 million and spent $710.4 million. In the highly competitive midterm elections of 2006, the GOP party committees raised $792.8 million and spent $723.6 million; the Democrats raised $599.7 million and spent $606.2 million. In the 2008 elections, a strong Democratic trend resulted in the Democratic committees overtaking the GOP, raising $959.8 million to the Republicans’ $920.3 million and spending $954.3 million to the GOP’s $791.9 million.<sup>87</sup> FEC data for 2006 showed the Democratic Party committees contributed $4.1 million directly to congressional candidates and made coordinated expenditures of $20.7 million. Republicans that year contributed about $1.9 million to congressional candidates and spent $14.2 million on coordinated expenditures.<sup>88</sup>

While direct contributions and expenditures by the parties constitute a comparatively small percentage of the overall receipts of candidates, parties help candidates in other ways.

Independent Expenditures. After the Supreme Court ruled in 1996 that political parties could make independent expenditures on behalf of their candidates, the Republican Party jumped right in, making $10 million in independent expenditures in the 1996 election campaign. Democrats spent $1.5 million. GOP independent expenditures dropped off significantly in the 1998 midterm election campaign—less than $264,000 was reported; Democrats again spent $1.5 million. In the 2000 congressional elections, Republicans reported spending $1.6 million and Democrats, $2.3 million. By 2004 independent spending mushroomed to $88 million by Republicans and $176.5 million by Democrats. Much of this spending, however, was on behalf of presidential candidates Kerry and Bush: The DNC reported making independent expenditures of $79.4 million on the presidential race while the RNC spent $5 million. Independent spending in 2006 totaled $108.1 million by the Democrats and $115.6 million by the Republicans.

Other Assistance. Political parties like to act as conduits, passing contributions through their committees to candidates. Thanks to sophisticated computers and mass mailings, a party can target those who might be interested in a race and encourage them to contribute. Through a practice called “earmarking,” a contributor can direct money to a candidate or committee through an intermediary, such as the party. The money counts against the donor’s contribution limit for the recipient candidate. If the party directs or controls who the recipient will be, it will count against the party limit as well. The party must report to the FEC any earmarked contributions it receives and forwards.

Candidate’s Money

Another source of money for congressional campaigns is the candidate’s personal bank account. Candidates can reach as deeply into their pockets as they want because there are no limits on how much they may contribute or loan to their campaigns. Deep personal pockets are not only welcomed by the parties but are sometimes even expected. Political scientists David Magleby and Candice Nelson wrote in 1990 that the political parties may expect challengers and open-seat candidates to give or loan their campaigns $25,000 or more in House races and even more for Senate campaigns.<sup>89</sup>

Candidates usually opt to loan the money to their campaigns in the hope that, if they win, they may be able to get some of it back from fund-raising after the election. The McCain-Feingold law sought to curb this practice by placing a cap of $250,000 on the amount of candidates’ loans to their campaigns that may be paid back from amounts contributed after the election.

In 1974 Congress attempted to set limits on how much House and Senate candidates could contribute to their own campaigns, but before the limits could take effect they were ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in the 1976 Buckley decision. The Court ruled that “the candidate, no less than any other person, has a First Amendment right to engage in the discussion of public issues and vigorously and tirelessly to advocate his own election.”

In keeping with the law’s intent to clean up campaign finance activities, the justices also wrote that “the use of personal funds reduces the candidate’s dependence on outside contributions and thereby counteracts the coercive pressure and attendant risks of abuse to which the act’s contribution limitations are directed.”

Most political observers agreed that the Court had given wealthy contenders a tremendous advantage. Simply having access to money and a willingness to pour a lot of it into a campaign does not guarantee victory in November—or even in a primary. But wealthy candidates can afford expensive, professional consultants and plan their strategy with greater assurance than candidates without a personal fortune.

Money enables the wealthy, but unknown, candidate to make the first splash in a crowded field of relatively obscure contenders for an open seat in Congress. While dozens of potential candidates may jockey for position, the one who can begin a campaign with an early television blitz is likely to start several lengths ahead.

Television stations require campaigns to pay their bills before any material is aired. For this reason, candidates who have the ability to loan or contribute a sizable sum can purchase expensive television advertising whenever they want. Those who are less well-off financially are forced to wait until the money comes in before beginning their media buy. It is not surprising that leaders of congressional party campaign committees have in recent years sought to recruit wealthy candidates to run for office, particularly in high-cost states where having an abundance of personal resources can be invaluable.

As the campaign progresses, especially after the primary, the advantage of personal wealth diminishes. Candidates without a personal fortune then have greater access to other sources of money, particularly from party coffers; the field is smaller, making it easier for voters to draw clear distinctions between the candidates; and more free publicity is available as the general election draws nearer. There are many cases where a rich candidate was able to clear out the primary field but then lost in the general election.

While candidates’ ability to bankroll a large portion of their campaigns has many advantages, it also has several potential disadvantages. The most obvious and frequently encountered is that it opens self-financed candidates to charges that they are trying to “buy” the election. Sometimes the opposition levels the charge; often the media raise it.

Another disadvantage is that outside money is harder to raise from potential contributors who may assume the rich candidates do not need their money. In some cases that may be true. But from a political standpoint, a healthy list of contributors can give a campaign more credibility by indicating that the candidate, besides having a fat war chest, has a broad base of support.

FEC figures for the 2003–2004 election cycle showed that congressional candidates loaned themselves $39.4 million, which was 4 percent of all receipts. The record for use of personal money belongs to Democrat Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey, a Wall Street businessperson who loaned his successful 2000 Senate campaign $60.2 million. Corzine's generosity to his campaign easily surpassed the previous record set by Michael Huffington, a first-term Republican House member from California who spent $28.3 million of his money—$16.3 million in contributions and $12 million in loans—in his 1994 Senate campaign, but lost by 2 percent to Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein. More recently, in 2004, Illinois Democrat Blair Hull spent $28.7 million of his personal wealth in an unsuccessful primary bid for the party's Senate nomination (he lost to Barack Obama). In 2006 three Senate candidates spent more than $10 million of their personal wealth in unsuccessful election bids: Ned Lamont D-Conn., Pete Ricketts, R-Neb, and Jim Pederson, D-Ariz. Thus, while money may be a critical asset in making one competitive, it does not, in and of itself, guarantee success in the end.

In an effort to prevent self-financed candidates from “buying” elections, McCain-Feingold included the so-called millionaire's amendment, which raised the limits on contributions from individuals and parties to candidates who faced a self-financed opponent who exceeded specified amounts of spending. While this provision was in effect in the 2004 and 2006 elections, it was declared unconstitutional by a 2008 Supreme Court ruling in the case of Davis v. Federal Election Commission.

Spending by Congressional Candidates

Congressional candidates spent about $1.4 billion in the 2005–2006 election cycle. This figure represented spending increases of about 14 percent for Senate races and about 32 percent for House races since 2004.

How money is spent varies from one campaign to another. The needs of a House candidate are different from those of a Senate candidate. The needs of a challenger are different from those of an incumbent. A Senate candidate in a large state runs a different campaign than a candidate in a small state. Representatives of urban, suburban, and rural congressional districts run vastly different campaigns. Costs skyrocket in hotly contested races and are negligible in races with little or no opposition.

But some generalizations may be made. Campaigns have to pay for staff and rent. They hire consultants, media experts, and polling firms. They send out computerized mailings. They buy postage, buttons, bumper stickers, billboards, newspaper ads, radio spots, and television time—lots of television time.

Television Costs

Television advertising plays a significant role in campaigns. For many candidates, being on or off the air can determine the outcome of the election. “The hard fact of life for a candidate is that if you are not on TV, you are not truly in the race,” former senator Ernest F. Hollings, D-S.C., told a congressional committee in 1990.<sup>90</sup>

It is also costly. “You simply transfer money from contributors to television stations,” summed up former senator Bill Bradley, D-N.J., in 1991.<sup>91</sup>

The Congressional Research Service (CRS) in a 1997 report on proposals to give candidates free or reduced-rate television time found electronic media advertising to be the single largest category of aggregate Senate and House campaign expenditures. (This category included radio and TV airtime, production costs, and consultant fees.) Studies of the 1990, 1992, and 1994 elections cited by CRS found these costs consumed about 27 percent of campaign budgets in House races and about 40–45 percent in Senate races. The percentages went up for more competitive races and in Senate races in larger states, as well as for challengers and open seat contenders.<sup>92</sup>

Although television has been an important tool in House campaigns, it has not been consistently so. For example, Sara Fritz and Dwight Morris in a Los Angeles

Times study found that in the 1990 campaign more than a quarter of House incumbents reported spending no money on broadcast advertising.<sup>93</sup> In urban centers such as Los Angeles, New York, and Chicago, it was not seen as cost effective. An assistant to Rep. Howard L. Berman, D-Calif., who represented the San Fernando Valley suburbs of Los Angeles, explained:

You spend thousands for one thirty-second spot on one TV station, in a city where cable is rampant and there are a zillion channels. There are sixteen to seventeen congressional districts in L.A., so the vast majority of those who see it are not your constituents and can't vote for you anyway.<sup>94</sup>

In rural areas and in the Southwest, however, costs can be dramatically lower. Herrnson noted that in 1998 a thirty-second prime-time ad would have cost $35,000 in a New York City congressional district but only $1,200 in Texas's 11th District.<sup>95</sup>

Other Costs

Congressional candidates face a variety of other costs in their pursuit of a seat in the House or Senate. As with media costs, there are many variables. Incumbents, challengers, and open-seat candidates will allocate funds differently, depending on the competitiveness of the race, the size of their constituency, and, of course, their resources.

In a study of the 1992 races, Dwight Morris and Murielle E. Gamache found that House incumbents on average spent about 25 percent of their money on overhead, which included everything from rent, office furniture, telephones, and computers to salaries, taxes, travel, and food. About 15 percent was spent on fund-raising (events, direct mail, and telemarketing); 4 percent on polling; 27 percent on electronic and other advertising; 20 percent on other campaign activity (voter contact mail, actual campaigning, and food, gifts, and other expenses for staff and volunteers); 5 percent on donations (to other candidates, political parties, and civic organizations); and 4 percent on miscellaneous gifts and expenses. Senate incumbents reported about 25 percent on overhead, 21 percent on fund-raising, 3 percent on polling, 41 percent on advertising, 8 percent on other campaign activities, 1 percent on donations, and 2 percent on miscellaneous items.<sup>96</sup>

Record Spending

The average cost of winning a Senate seat nearly tripled during the twenty-year period of 1986 to 2006, from $3.1 million to $8.8 million. Controlled for inflation during this period, this amounted to a 57 percent increase. Average spending by winning House candidates during this twenty-year period nearly quadrupled, from $359,577 to $1.3 million. Controlled for inflation, this constituted a 91 percent rise.<sup>97</sup>

The most expensive House race through 2006 was the 2000 race in California's 29th District. Incumbent Republican Rep. James E. Rogan spent nearly $6.9 million, while his Democratic opponent Adam Schiff spent nearly $4.4 million. Rogan was among just a handful of incumbents who lost their seats. This record was nearly matched in 2006 in Florida's 13th District, where an open seat left vacant by Katherine Harris's run for the Senate saw Republican Vernon Buchanan spend $8.1 million and Democrat Christine Jennings spend $3.2 million. Before 2000, the most costly House contest had been waged in 1998 between Newt Gingrich, the Republican Speaker of the House, and his Democratic challenger, Gary Pelphrey, who spent a combined $7.6 million. Of that total, Pelphrey spent $11,232 and Gingrich spent the rest.<sup>98</sup> But apparently much of Gingrich's money was not spent to defeat Pelphrey. A study by the Center for Responsive Politics of the first fifteen months of the election cycle found that Gingrich had spent $3.7 million by that point, even though he did not yet have a registered opponent, and that the "bulk of Gingrich's expenditures supported a direct-mail fund-raising operation, a costly technique used primarily to develop a wider base, especially useful for candidates contemplating a presidential run."<sup>99</sup> Moreover, Gingrich used a sizable portion of his campaign funds to assist other candidates and committees. For example, his reports to the FEC indicated a "transfer of excess funds" in the amount of $500,000 to the National Republican Campaign Committee in October 1998 and of $100,000 to his personal PAC in November 1998.

Expensive Senate races have become more and more common in today's elections. The record in combined candidate spending for a Senate seat is held by the New York contest in 2000 between Democrat Hillary Clinton and Republican Rick Lazio, who together spent $70.5 million in that race; a close runner-up was the New Jersey race that year between Democrat Jon Corzine and Republican Bob Franks, who spent a combined total of $69.9 million. Other major spending races in recent years includes the $43.1 million spent by Democrat Al Franken and Republican Norm Coleman in Minnesota in 2008, the $46.5 million spent by Democrat Hillary Clinton and Republican John Spencer in New York in 2006, the $46 million spent by Democrat Bob Casey and Republican Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania in 2006, and the $36 million spent by Democrat Tom Daschle and Republican John Thune in South Dakota in 2004.

Incumbent Advantage

Finally, it should be noted that incumbency offers some distinct advantages, as members of Congress routinely demonstrate. Voters typically return congressional incumbents to Washington en masse. Of the House incumbents who sought reelection in 2004, 98.2 percent won. The last time the reelection rate in the House dipped below 90 percent was in 1992

CAMPAIGN FINANCE HISTORY IN A NUTSHELL

1868. In a bill making naval appropriations, Congress prohibits “any officer or employee of the government” from soliciting money for political purposes from “any workingman in any navy yard” and barred firing a worker “for political opinion.”

1883. Following assassination in 1881 of President James A. Garfield by a disappointed office seeker, Congress passes the Civil Service Reform Act, better known as the Pendleton Act, protecting “public service” workers from “any obligation to contribute to any political fund.” The act made it a crime for a federal employee to solicit campaign funds from another employee.

1907. Congress passes the Tillman Act, the first federal campaign finance law, making it unlawful for a corporation or a national bank to make “a money contribution in connection with any election” of candidates for federal office.

1910. In the first effort at disclosure, the Publicity Act of 1910 is approved by Congress, requiring every political committee “which shall in two or more states” attempt to influence general elections to file with the House clerk the name and address of every contributor of $100 or more, every recipient of $10 or more, and the total amounts received and disbursed by the committee. Similar reports are required of individuals.

1911. Filing requirements are extended to cover prenomination efforts and to committees seeking to influence Senate elections. Also requires candidates for both chambers to file financial reports. Spending limits are imposed on candidates: Senate, up to $10,000; House, up to $5,000, or lesser amounts for both as provided by state law.

1925. Congress passes the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, establishing the basic campaign finance law in effect until the 1970s. Spending ceilings are set at $10,000 for a Senate candidate and $2,500 for a House candidate (or a lower limit under state law) or an amount equal to three cents for each vote cast in the last preceding election for the office sought, but not more than $25,000 for the Senate and $5,000 for the House. The law continues earlier disclosure prohibitions but drops coverage of primary elections (based on 1921 Supreme Court ruling overturning such regulation). Outlaws offering money in return for a vote. Corrupt Practices Act proves to be riddled with loopholes and provides no enforcement mechanism. No congressional candidate is ever prosecuted under the law.

1939. The Hatch Act is passed, barring federal employees from active participation in national politics.

1940. Congress amends the Hatch Act to place a $3 million annual ceiling on receipts and expenditures for any political committee operating in at least two states. The law places a $5,000 annual limit on contributions to candidates or national committees in connection with a federal election. Federal contractors, whether individuals or companies, are barred from contributing to any political committee or candidate. Primary elections are brought under the law.

1943. The War Labor Disputes Act (Smith-Connally Act), temporarily extends the 1907 prohibition on political contributions by national banks and corporations to include labor unions, a prohibition that is made permanent by the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 (Taft-Hartley Act).

1966. Congress approves a tax checkoff allowing an individual paying federal income tax to direct that one dollar of the annual tax due be paid into a Presidential Election Campaign Fund, which would disburse receipts proportionately among political parties whose presidential candidates had received five million or more votes in the preceding presidential election. The legislation is effectively voided in 1967 when Congress fails to adopt guidelines for distribution of funds.

1971. Congress passes two landmark bills: the Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA), which for the first time sets a ceiling on the amount federal candidates can spend on media advertising and requires full periodic disclosure of campaign contributions and expenditures; and the Revenue Act, which includes a tax check-off section to allow taxpayers to contribute to a general fund to finance the campaigns of eligible presidential candidates. FECA also expands reporting of receipts and expenditures and closes loopholes in earlier laws. Most previous spending and contribution limits are repealed, reflecting the legislation’s emphasis on disclosure.

1974. Responding to campaign abuses from 1972 elections, Congress overhauls the 1971 FECA law in the most comprehensive campaign finance bill ever passed, before or since (as of 2009). The legislation:

- Establishes the Federal Election Commission (FEC).
- Institutes new contribution limits and prohibits cash contributions of $100 or more and foreign contributions of any kind.
- Sets limits on spending by federal candidates and on coordinated spending by the national parties.
- Extends voluntary public financing for presidential campaigns, then in effect for general elections, to prenomination campaigns and national nominating conventions.
- Establishes new and tougher reporting requirements for candidates.

and the time before that was in 1974. Even in 2006, a major “change” election, the reelection rate for House incumbents only fell to 94 percent. On the Senate side the reelection rates have also been high, albeit much more erratic, in part because of the relatively small number of races involved. In the 2004 election, the reelection rate for incumbents was 96 percent, a jump from the 86 percent level 2002; in 2006 it dropped to 79 percent, the lowest level since 2000.

This advantage of congressional incumbents at the polls has produced much study and speculation. According to Roger H. Davidson and Walter J. Oleszek, political scientists have launched “a veritable cottage industry” to answer the question of why incumbents are so formidable.<sup>100</sup>

Several reasons can be cited. Incumbents have name recognition. They have a public record to run on, which can be especially helpful if they can demonstrate they have voted to protect the interests of their constituents and have brought home federal grants and projects. Incumbents are highly visible because of easy and regular access to the media.

1976. The Supreme Court, in Buckley v. Valeo, a challenge to the 1974 legislation, upholds contribution limits, voluntary public financing of presidential campaigns, and disclosure requirements, but the Court overturns key limits on spending—whether by candidates' campaigns, from candidates' personal wealth, or by independent groups—as a violation of the First Amendment's guarantee of free expression. The justices also declare the FEC to be unconstitutional as then constituted, as it exercised executive branch functions but was appointed in part by Congress.

1976. Responding to the Supreme Court's decision, Congress revises FECA once again. The most important change is to reconstitute the Federal Election Commission to meet Court objections about the agency's makeup and authority. The legislation also sets new contribution limits and compromises in a business-labor dispute over rules for political action committees (PACs).

1977. A Senate filibuster blocks efforts to extend public financing to congressional campaigns.

1979. In a bipartisan effort seldom seen in campaign financing legislation, Congress eliminates much red tape created by FECA and removes some disincentives to grassroots and political party activity. State and local parties are allowed to spend as much as they want on campaign materials for volunteer activities to promote any federal candidate, including such items as buttons, bumper stickers, handbills, brochures, posters, and yard signs, and to conduct, without financial limit, certain kinds of voter registration and get-out-the-vote drives on behalf of presidential tickets. These provisions, along with a controversial 1978 FEC advisory opinion, helped open the door to significant levels of so-called "soft money" spending by political parties. The legislation also prohibits members of Congress from converting leftover campaign funds to personal use, but exempts those in office when the legislation becomes law. (In 1989 Congress closes this "grandfather clause" for existing members.)

1980s. Protracted campaign finance debate focuses on the role of PACs and on whether to extend the system of public financing and spending limits that exists in presidential elections to congressional elections, as well. Congress remains deadlocked, with no consensus on these issues among the parties, the political elites, and the public.

1990s. Issue advocacy ads become a major issue as parties and outside groups begin extensive use of "soft money" for communications that ostensibly promote certain ideas or issues, as opposed to calling for the election or defeat of particular candidates. Critics argue that the distinction is all but invisible and that these ads amount to support of or opposition to a candidate even if they do not use "express advocacy" language for or against a person. Combined with soft money spending by parties, these methods threaten to make FECA's regulatory system increasingly irrelevant.

2000. Congress acts to require disclosure to the Internal Revenue Service of contributions to and spending by organizations known as Section 527 groups, after a section in the Internal Revenue Code. Section 527 groups become part of the debate over issue advocacy, as they are uniquely suited to engage in it. So long as they do not contribute money or expressly advocate election or defeat of a candidate, 527s are not required to report spending or adhere to other FECA requirements. Critics say these groups can spend unlimited sums attacking or praising a candidate and engage in other activities under the rubric of issue advocacy.

2002. Congress passes the most sweeping campaign finance law in decades, titled the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act (BCRA), but better known as the McCain-Feingold bill after the primary Senate sponsors, John McCain of Arizona and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin. The legislation, signed by President George W. Bush on March 27, 2002, is designed to ban national parties and federal candidates and officials from raising soft money and state and local parties from spending it in connection with federal elections, and to require disclosure of issue ads that refer to specific federal candidates just before an election and ban their funding by unions and corporations. (See box, The Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (McCain-Feingold), p. 78.)

2003. The Supreme Court, in McConnell v. FEC, upholds the constitutionality of the central provisions of the 2002 legislation. In 2007 the Court qualifies and constricts the prohibition on issue advocacy ads, and in 2008 overturns provisions intended to help candidates facing wealthy opponents who can finance campaigns from their own assets, sections of the law popularly known as the "millionaire's amendment."

2008. Public financing of elections plays a distinctly minor role for the first time since the program began in 1976. Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama declines public funds for both his primary and general election campaign and becomes the first president elected to reject this money since public financing began. His opponent John McCain accepts public funds for the general election. Obama's ability to raise vast sums of private money through small donations collected on the Internet bolsters the view of many commentators that the struggling public financing system may have been dealt a fatal blow, unless the system is revamped by further congressional action.

A real plus for incumbents is that they continue to receive their salary throughout the campaign. Many challengers are not so lucky. Candidates are not permitted to pay themselves a salary from their campaign account. The prospect of campaigning full-time without a salary for a year or more probably has deterred many a potential candidate from running.

Moreover, incumbents enjoy a number of perquisites, the most important being large staffs on Capitol Hill and in state or district offices ready to respond to the needs and inquiries of constituents. Thanks to the franking privilege, most letters and newsletters to constituents can be mailed free of charge, although there are restrictions aimed at curbing blatant use of the privilege for political purposes or just before an election. Members also benefit from allowances for phone calls and for travel back to their home district or state.

Incumbents also enjoy a distinct advantage in raising money for their reelection campaigns. Preliminary FEC figures showed that House incumbents had a fund-raising advantage over challengers of four to one in 2007–2008. On average, House incumbents raised $1,356,139 for their campaigns while their challengers raised $336,152. The advantage of incumbents in the Senate was also remarkable. On average, Senate incumbents raised $8,804,559 in 2007–2008 while their challengers raised $1,155,407.<sup>101</sup>

Typically, both individual donors and PACs favor incumbents over challengers. In the 2004 campaigns, about 60 percent of all individual contributions went to incumbents and only 17 percent to challengers. The rest went to open-seat races. The percentage was much higher for PAC contributions—about 79 percent went to incumbents.

Over the years the implications of the tilt toward incumbents have preoccupied members, reformers, and observers of Congress alike. Some warned of a trend toward a “permanent Congress” with little turnover, and they deplored PACs “buying” access to members of Congress. But others dismissed the notion and framed these contributions in a more positive light—contributors wanted to go with a winner, and most incumbents were seen as sure bets.

Fears of incumbents’ advantage were allayed in the 1990s when an anti-incumbent sentiment, redistricting, and the 1995 GOP takeover of both houses of Congress for the first time in forty years ushered in a new generation of lawmakers. Indeed, the turnover was so great that by the start of 2001 almost two-thirds of the House—65 percent—had first been elected in 1992 or later. On the Senate side, forty-five senators had been in that chamber for six years or less, a figure not matched since 1981.

Ongoing Debate

Several years have passed and several elections have occurred since Congress enacted McCain-Feingold in 2002. While that law did more to change the way campaigns for federal office are financed than any legislation since the 1970s, it was by no means the final answer to the thorny problems involved in regulating money in politics. Although McCain-Feingold was largely upheld in the Supreme Court’s initial review in 2003, its scope has been narrowed by subsequent court rulings on electioneering communications and the “millionaire’s amendment.” McCain-Feingold ended the system that had allowed the parties to collect hundreds of millions of dollars in unregulated, soft money, but serious questions remained over the ability of government to regulate the activities of outside groups.

After McCain-Feingold’s enactment, reformers turned their focus to the perceived loophole that allows 527 groups to raise and spend soft money in the same way that the parties did before the reform act was enacted. The sponsors of the McCain-Feingold act claimed that the law’s primary goal was to stop federal officeholders from soliciting corporate and union soft money and that it was never intended to reduce the total amount of money spent in elections.<sup>102</sup> Critics, however, claimed that the change brought about was virtually meaningless because 527 groups are essentially operating as “shadow parties” that have injected many millions of unregulated dollars into federal elections.

McCain-Feingold’s sponsors in 2004 proposed new legislation barring 527 groups from raising and spending unlimited amounts of money on federal campaigns, by requiring them to register with the FEC if their primary purpose is to influence federal campaigns.<sup>103</sup> They have also turned to the courts for help in establishing that 527s are already barred from participating in federal elections by the FECA. They maintain that the FEC has not enforced that law and should either be replaced by a tougher agency or ordered by a judge to better regulate 527 activity. For their part, many 527 groups are passionate about participating in electoral politics and vow to become fixtures in both federal and local elections.<sup>104</sup> This debate continues.

In the wake of the 2008 election, those seeking to further regulate money in politics face new challenges. First, the presidential public financing system lies in tatters, having proven to be irrelevant in an election in which the three most prominent contenders opted out of the system in the primaries and the ultimate winner opted out in the general election as well. Reformers have proposed a major piece of legislation to reinvigorate the public funding system by substantially raising spending limits to reflect the true costs of today’s campaigns and inject far more public funds to induce candidate participation. Yet it was not clear in early 2009 that the current public finance system had enough supporters left to succeed in the effort to save it.

Second, the extraordinary success of Obama in raising an unprecedented amount of money from a record number of contributors, in large part through the Internet and without a trace of scandal, may have undercut a basic contention of reformers, that is, that large amounts of money are inherently corrosive of the electoral process. Many observers pointed to his campaign as epitomizing the values cherished in a democracy, wherein the people retain ultimate authority in choosing their leaders and no one’s voice is heard above all others. While many cautioned that Obama may constitute an anomaly and that his success cannot be easily replicated, questions remain regarding fundamental questions of the need to regulate money in elections. The one thing that was clear is that the heated debate over the financing of elections is likely to continue, as it has throughout the history of American politics.<sup>105</sup>

Politics and Issues, 1945–2008

WHAT AN EXTRAORDINARY six decades it was. For much of the period the United States and the Soviet Union were locked in a cold war. Then suddenly the war was over, the Soviet Union collapsed, and the Berlin Wall came tumbling down. Economic boom times mingled with recessions, including the worldwide financial crisis that by the end of 2008 was the most serious since the Great Depression of the 1930s. In 2009, as a new administration took office, the U.S. government was pouring billions of dollars into American business—particularly the financial sector—to ward off a new depression. In the process the government was becoming a lender of last resort to banks, insurance companies, the housing industry, and even auto manufacturers. Congress early in the new year was debating a federal stimulus plan that was expected to reach nearly a trillion dollars. Until a Republican revolution in the 1990s proved otherwise, Democrats for much of the time appeared to be the permanent majority in Congress, even while Republicans increasingly dominated in the race for the presidency.

Civil rights battles tore at the conscience of the nation, and barriers to equal rights and opportunity gave way. A vast legislative program called the Great Society built on Depression era New Deal programs and the federal social safety net held tight—until the federal government ended its sixty-one-year-old promise of welfare and turned it over to the states. Technology advances ushered in the age of television, space exploration, computers, and astounding medical advances. Human beings walked on the moon and everyday people ventured onto the Internet's information highway and social networking.

The nation was battered by a divisive war in Southeast Asia. It mourned the loss of a young president and other leaders cut down by assassins' bullets. It weathered scandals that led to the resignation of one president and the impeachment of another. It survived a presidential election that showed the country almost evenly divided politically and in the end was decided by the Supreme Court.

As a new century dawned, the worst terrorist attacks ever on American soil forever altered the United States and the world. People and nations around the globe debated the appropriate responses to such violence as American troops marched to war in the Middle East nations of Afghanistan and Iraq, with an initial support of voters that eventually turn to strong disapproval. A seemingly embattled president was elected to a second term in the face of adversity, accomplishing what his father had not little more than a decade before. Then, perhaps as remarkable as any earlier event, the nation in 2008 elected an African American, Barack Obama, president.

Changes seemed to come at breathtaking speed. It was, indeed, an extraordinary period in American history.

Politics of Consensus

When the leaders of the World War II generation stepped aside for a new generation in the closing decade of the twentieth century, they turned over a different country from the one they inherited a half century earlier. A country once seemingly bound together by a politics of national consensus, particularly in foreign policy, was torn by an increasingly wide ideological chasm in social, economic, and political ideas that spawned a politics of division.

The United States had emerged from World War II in general agreement over its domestic and foreign policy goals. Much of the American public accepted the New Deal's expansion of the role of government into a quasi-welfare state, which they expected to provide a safety net. Coming out of World War II with vivid memories of the Great Depression of the 1930s, most Americans wanted a government that would protect them from social and economic misfortune. Even the Republican administration of war hero Dwight D. Eisenhower in the 1950s and most of the dominant liberal wing of the GOP largely accepted the basic welfare state tenets inherited from the New Deal.

On the international front, there was consensus as well. The American public understood that the United States was now a global power and could not retreat into the isolationism that characterized the 1930s and earlier decades. As the first atomic power and leader of the community of free nations, the United States found itself at the forefront of the struggle to contain world communism. It constructed a complex series of global alliances, was the architect of the economic revival of postwar Europe, and entered the Korean War to maintain its position in Asia. In the context of the cold war struggle between democratic nations, led by the United States, and the Communist bloc, led by the Soviet Union, the overall direction of U.S. policies went unquestioned for several decades.

While this consensus was real, and in foreign policy all but unavoidable in light of the cold war, it camouflaged a festering unhappiness and discontent among a significant number of conservative Republicans, and some sympathetic Democrats, who never fully bought into the GOP liberal wing's embrace of New Deal heritage. This previously latent force emerged dramatically in 1964 in a challenge by conservative GOP presidential candidate Barry Goldwater. The U.S. voters overwhelmingly rejected the challenge at the time but that election turned out to be the harbinger of a fundamental shift in the political fortunes—and the ideological underpinnings—of the major political parties and country's political direction. Strains in the bipartisan consensus were not far off, as the country headed into a turbulent forty-year period.

Toll on National Unity

After his landslide victory over Goldwater in 1964, President Lyndon B. Johnson moved to greatly expand the nation's social safety net through a comprehensive domestic program, known as the Great Society, to fight poverty, ignorance, disease, and other social problems. In time, some of the more controversial programs were ended and rising crime rates and urban riots in the 1960s made many people less sympathetic to the needs of the poor. However, the core of the Great Society in areas such as health care, education, and civil rights endured.

But the national consensus on U.S. policy abroad started to fall apart, even in the face of a continued agreement about the cold war struggle between the two superpowers. The root of the disintegrating consensus was in the Southeast Asian country of Vietnam, where a civil war between the communist North and the noncommunist South broke out in the aftermath of the end of colonialism following World War II. Politically in the United States, the war was projected on the superpower struggle and South Vietnam was seen as a possible “domino” that could fall to Communist expansion. Consequently, the United States was drawn into the conflict—first with economic help and military aid and later with troops—that turned the war into one of the most painful and divisive experiences in U.S. history. Despite the deployment of hundreds of thousands of troops and the use of modern air power from the mid-1960s into the early 1970s, the U.S. military could not break the will of the Communist forces to continue fighting, with the North eventually taking over the South after the U.S. forces withdrew. Disagreement over the morality and necessity of the war divided the American people and led to angry social protest and debate. For the first time since the end of World War II, serious questions were raised about the U.S. role as a global policeman. The Vietnam War had produced the first real cracks in the foreign policy consensus.

The assassinations in the 1960s of President John F. Kennedy, civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr., and New York senator Robert F. Kennedy, the president's brother, added to the nation's turmoil. Then, in the early 1970s, came Watergate, perhaps the greatest political scandal in U.S. history. Revelations of White House involvement in a burglary and other political sabotage, as well as cover-up efforts, severely damaged the American public's confidence in government and led to the conviction of many top government officials and the resignation of President Richard Nixon under the threat of imminent impeachment. It was the first resignation of a president in U.S. history.

Vietnam and Watergate together exacted a heavy toll on national unity and the authority of government. To these were added huge economic dislocations during the 1970s resulting from rampant double-digit inflation, an economic recession and an oil embargo—imposed by Arab oil-producing nations displeased with the West's pro-Israeli stance—that sent prices even higher and created seemingly endless lines at the gas station. The long cascade of bad news from the 1960s onward was capped in the late 1970s when Iranian revolutionaries seized the American embassy in Tehran and held fifty-two Americans hostage for 444 days, making the United States look foolish and impotent.

Big Government Out of Style

By the 1980s, many Americans were becoming increasingly disenchanted with “big government.” Ronald Reagan—who in 1964 gave a notable televised campaign speech for Barry Goldwater that established his credentials as an articulate spokesperson for the conservative wing of the party—successfully campaigned for the White House with a message that included a promise to get the federal government “off the backs of the people.” Reagan's view that government was not the solution to the problem, but rather the problem itself, seemed to strike a sympathetic chord with many Americans.

It was a sentiment that would expand through the 1980s and have significant ramifications in the 1990s. In his successful bid for the White House in 1992, Democrat Bill Clinton stressed the need to reinvent government to make it more efficient. Public weariness with big government—and the high taxes it took to run it—was seen as a decisive factor in the GOP takeover of both chambers of Congress for the first time in forty years. The Democrats, long seen as the creator and protector of popular domestic programs, lost control of Congress in the 1994 elections.

The GOP majority worked with the Democratic White House to implement another of Clinton's campaign promises to "end welfare as we know it." Their effort brought an end to the federal welfare guarantee that dated back six decades to the New Deal and instead shifted responsibility to the states.

Foreign Policy Quandary

Historic changes were sweeping the international arena as well. The demise of Soviet communism produced the most profound changes in the global landscape in half a century. A series of tumultuous events in 1991 culminated in the breakup of the Soviet Union, sweeping away the superpower rivalry that had shaped U.S. foreign policy since the end of World War II.

The new era brought the promise of reduced tensions and dramatic cuts in national security expenditures. Yet it soon became clear that the post-cold war era would be no less prone to violence and instability than its predecessor. No longer facing the clearly defined military threat the Soviet Union had posed, the United States found itself increasingly involved in operations run by the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) as regional conflicts proliferated.

But there was no consensus on the direction of U.S. foreign policy because there was no agreement on the national interests of the United States in the post-cold war world.

Partisan Divide

The 1990s and early 2000s proved to be one of the most partisan periods in American history. The underpinnings of this partisanship had been developing for many years, rooted both in the politics of the era and changing public attitudes. An important factor was the exceptionally long Democratic dominance in Congress and the corresponding Republican frustrations at perceived mistreatment. Another was the emerging conservative hold on the Republican Party that more starkly than in previous decades contrasted the new GOP to the still largely liberal Democratic Party that favored activist government. A third was the increasing disappearance of the middle in both parties as Republican moderates, often identified with eastern New England Republicanism, left office in retirement or defeat and conservative southern Democrats switched parties, retired, or were defeated in the increasingly Republican South. This left both parties more solidly in the control of their wings farthest from the center and eager to do battle with the other. The public's distaste for this conflict combined with its increasing distrust in government—identified by many observers as starting with Vietnam and Watergate—and the expansion of divisive social issues such as abortion, religious influence in politics, and parental authority also contributed.

In Congress, the mantra of "to get along, go along" that had prevailed for decades gave way to a new adversarial approach, largely developed by back-bench Republicans who concluded they would never get more than dismissive attention from Democrats without a direct frontal attack. This was the battle plan developed by Rep. Newt Gingrich of Georgia and like-minded colleagues. The tone was set over a period of years but was brought center stage in 1989 when Democrat Jim Wright of Texas became the first House Speaker in history to be forced by scandal to resign in the middle of his term. The move against Wright was led by Gingrich, who would go on to spearhead the GOP takeover of the House in 1995 and become Speaker. Clinton's 1992 defeat of an incumbent Republican president, George H. W. Bush, added to the tension between the parties.

Intense party-line voting and heightened incivility at a time of divided government and narrow majorities in Congress proved to be a perfect recipe for gridlock in the 1990s. Just how far things had deteriorated was illustrated by budget battles that resulted in partial shutdowns of the federal government. The animosity was palpable, as each side waited for the other to blink.

The political divide in Washington got appreciably wider when the House GOP launched an investigation that led to the impeachment of President Clinton on charges of perjury and obstruction of justice for his attempts to cover up an affair with a White House intern. The articles of impeachment were adopted on party-line votes. The Senate fulfilled its constitutional duty to try the case—against the better judgment of many members—but did not come close to convicting and removing Clinton from office. The tone of the Senate trial was much less rancorous and partisan than that of the House proceedings and Clinton was acquitted with the support of every Senate Democrat and some Republicans.

The political dynamics of the president's impeachment—only the second in U.S. history—were complex. The impeachment was a testament to the power of the social conservatives who dominated the House Republican Caucus and leadership, as well as its electoral base. It was an illustration of the bitter partisan split that had all but paralyzed the House, as well as a sign of deep cultural division over standards of personal behavior for public officials. It also showed—and may have added to—the erosion of the political middle ground that had hamstrung moderates from both parties. Public disapproval of the impeachment inquiry was thought to have contributed to GOP losses in the 1998 elections. House Speaker Gingrich resigned in the election aftermath.

The bitter partisanship in Washington and divisions among the American people continued in the 2000 elections. The closely fought races narrowed the GOP margin in the House and split the Senate right down the middle,

50–50. The presidential race hung in the balance for five weeks, while Democrat Albert “Al” Gore Jr., who had won the national popular vote, battled Republican George W. Bush for the electoral votes of Florida, which would put one of them over the top in the electoral college. Bush had a slim lead, but the Gore camp was certain that would disappear with vote recounts. A decision by a sharply divided Supreme Court ended the Democratic push for more recounts and secured the White House for Bush. Some political observers thought the 2000 elections, with no presidential incumbent, would answer questions about the direction voters wanted the nation to take. But a new politics of national consensus did not appear imminent in the wake of the evenly divided electorate, the debacle in Florida that left the true winner in the voting uncertain, and charges that a politicized Supreme Court had essentially given the White House to the Republicans.

Although Bush professed to be “a uniter, not a divider,” partisanship and legislative gridlock remained entrenched throughout his first term. Democrats and Republicans only came together on a handful of major issues, such as education and campaign finance reform. One event, however, seemed to bring all Americans together—the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. Republicans and Democrats alike united behind the president as he launched a war against Afghanistan, the training ground for the terrorists. When Bush took U.S. soldiers into Iraq in 2003, this national unity, however, began to crumble. Some felt the new military direction was unwise. The major question before the electorate in 2004 was who was best able to win the war in Iraq and lead the country in this new era when terrorists could hit so devastatingly close to home. Although Democrats nominated a Vietnam War hero, John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, voters by a slim majority returned Bush to the White House, perhaps with the belief that it was best not to change presidents while at war. At the start of 2005, as U.S. casualties continued to mount in Iraq, and to a lesser extent in Afghanistan, the prosecution of the war in Iraq was turning into yet another issue that divided Americans.

The national judgment on the war, and more broadly on the Bush administration, came in 2006 when Democrats won back control of both the House and the Senate, although the latter by just a single vote. Bush refused to back down on Iraq and in fact sent more troops in a “surge” to contain expanding violence, particularly between sects within the population. The surge was roundly condemned but in time appeared to quell the worst of the violence and lay the groundwork for other tactics that brought a measure of stability by 2009, although the future remained uncertain.

It was against this background that a young and junior senator from Illinois, Barack Obama, announced in early 2007—against all odds—that he was going to run for president. As an African American, and in the shadow of much better known candidates, he was accorded little chance. But with a masterful nationwide campaign, and an army of enthusiastic volunteers, Obama won first the nomination and then, by a 53–46 percent majority, the presidency itself.

As if to prove the ancient warning about being careful what one asks for, Obama came into office in 2009 amidst the worst economic crisis the nation, and the world, had faced in more than half a century. The United States officially went into recession in December 2007. By the following fall a long-inflating housing bubble had burst, thousands of homeowners—many unqualified to be owners but placed there by lax lending standards—were in foreclosure, the banking industry and liquidity were seizing up, famous Wall Street firms were either into bankruptcy or being sold off, unemployment was rising monthly, dozens of businesses were in bankruptcy or liquidation, and even the venerable American automobile industry was on the lip of bankruptcy.

Obama's predecessor, George W. Bush, and federal economic officials in the Treasury, Federal Reserve, and other departments, had already begun throughout 2008 to put the government's strength as a lender of last resort into action. By the end of the year the flow of federal money had turned into a torrent of hundreds of billions of dollars to aid crucial segments of the economy, especially the financial sector. Obama, with an expanded Democratic majority in Congress, took up the effort in 2009 with plans to enact vastly larger stimulus and rescue programs.

Following is a narrative chronology of the political and legislative events of the years from the end of World War II until 2009, putting in perspective the national and state elections that took place during that period.

POST–WORLD WAR II YEARS

By the end of World War II the American people had come to two fundamental decisions that would have a deep influence on the political life of the nation in the postwar years from 1945 through the mid-1960s. In domestic affairs, Americans in general had concluded that the social and economic reforms of the New Deal years ought to be preserved and that government had a legitimate role in protecting the individual against economic disaster. On the international front, isolationism clearly was rejected in favor of acceptance of a role of active leadership for the United States in world affairs.

These two decisions paved the way for a politics of national consensus in the postwar years. The ideological conflicts of the 1930s were softened, and it was possible for the two major political parties to argue more about means and less about basic national aims.

The main issue usually was which party could best provide for the needs of the people in a steadily expanding economy and at the same time provide firm, reliable leadership for the United States and the free world in a protracted cold war with the Communist bloc. Implicit in both parties' appeals were two basic elements: an acceptance of government's role in the social welfare field and close industry-government ties at home, coupled with a desire to avoid nuclear confrontation with the Soviet Union abroad. When, in 1964, one of the two major national parties sought to deny this postwar consensus in both its domestic and foreign aspects, it encountered the most sweeping electoral repudiation in a quarter-century.

By and large the Democratic Party was more successful than the Republican in presenting itself as the party better able to carry out the national consensus in the postwar years. Three Democrats were elected to the presidency—Harry S. Truman, John F. Kennedy, and Lyndon B. Johnson—while only one Republican, Dwight D. Eisenhower, was successful, and then largely because of his status as a hero of World War II. Of the ten Congresses elected in the postwar period, eight had Democratic and only two had Republican majorities. Except for brief periods in 1947–1948 and 1951–1954, the Democrats held a majority of the state governorships. Democrats maintained regular majorities in most state legislatures. Even the eight-year incumbency of a Republican president failed to strengthen the Republican Party appreciably.

The frequent Democratic victories, however, did not reflect the depth of loyalty to the Democratic Party that had existed in the 1930s, when the fresh recollection of the Great Depression maintained an unwavering Democratic mandate. In fact, the political movements of the postwar period demonstrated a rapidly changing and ambiguous electoral mandate: Republicans scored major victories in 1946 and 1952, but the Democrats achieved significant and far-reaching success in 1948, 1958, and 1964.

Even in the years of party sweeps, voters showed an increasing tendency to vote for the candidate rather than the party. The trend toward split tickets was especially evident in 1956, when Eisenhower was reelected by a landslide but the Democrats held Congress, and in 1964, when numerous Republican candidates eked out narrow victories despite the massive national vote for Johnson. Part of the trend toward split tickets could be attributed to an increasingly well-educated electorate. But it also seemed to reflect a willingness among the voters to support superior candidates of either party—candidates who represented, in large part, the domestic and foreign policy consensus of the postwar era.

In the early 1960s a new awareness emerged on the issue of civil rights. Civil rights for African Americans had divided northern and southern Democrats in Congress for decades and had even caused a rump southern Dixiecrat Party in the 1948 presidential election. But pressures for equal rights for blacks continued to increase and reached a climax with a series of nationwide demonstrations in 1963. Many white Americans, with church and union groups at the fore, joined the fight for legislative action for equal rights. The result was the comprehensive, bipartisan sponsored Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Throughout the postwar period Congress was slower to reflect the national consensus on major issues than was the president or the judicial branch of the government. As a rule it was the executive branch that proposed major new programs in fields such as education, welfare, and domestic aid—programs that Congress accepted slowly if at all. The Supreme Court, with its 1954 decision outlawing segregation in the public schools, sparked the movement toward bringing blacks into the mainstream of American life. Other decisions of the Court on constitutional rights, ranging from legislative apportionment to the rights of witnesses and the accused, far outstripped anything Congress was willing to consider.

When Congress did assume a more central role—helping, for instance, to formulate and develop foreign aid programs from the mid-1940s on, pushing aggressively for broader domestic programs while Eisenhower was in the White House, or remolding and expanding the scope of the 1964 Civil Rights Act—its actions stood out as exceptions to the pattern of executive or judicial initiative.

Congress's conservatism and its reticence in initiating programs were based in large part on the committee seniority system and restrictive legislative rules. Committee chairs often were southern Democrats or midwestern Republicans, representing the most rigidly held districts and states. The congressional representatives least able to build up seniority, and thus the least likely to head committees, were those from the politically volatile suburbs and city fringe areas where the major new population movements—and many major problems—of the postwar era occurred.

During this period the House, intended by the Framers of the Constitution to be the chamber closest to the people, actually was the more conservative body, blocking a substantial amount of legislation approved by the Senate. The Senate, especially after the liberal Democratic sweep of 1958, became markedly liberal in its orientation. A principal explanation for the Senate's position was that metropolitan centers, with their pressing demands, had sprung up in virtually every state, prompting senators to be responsive to their needs.

The postwar era might be remembered as one in which both American parties became truly national. Democrats extended their power and influence into midwestern and northern New England territory that had been unwaveringly Republican in the past. Republicans made significant new breakthroughs in the growing industrial South and in their best years won the votes of millions of Americans who had never voted Republican before.

The 1964 election, at the end of the era, left the Democratic Party in control of most of the power centers, from the presidency to the state legislatures. But many Republicans, noting the somber outcome of an election in which their party had moved far to the right and by implication had repudiated the national stance on most matters, began to work to return the party to a central course. The 1964 election, by underlining the strength of the American consensus on vital issues of domestic economy, civil rights, and foreign policy, had demonstrated anew the broad opportunities for a party willing to offer solutions to national needs.

1945–1947: The Seventy-Ninth Congress

The death of a president who had led his country through twelve years of economic and military crisis, the end of the greatest war in history, and the inauguration of the atomic age all took place in the two-year interval between Franklin D. Roosevelt's election to a fourth term in 1944 and the 1946 midterm congressional elections.

The president died April 12, 1945, of a cerebral hemorrhage. Two weeks later, on April 25, delegates from Allied powers gathered in San Francisco to write the United Nations charter. (The Senate ratified the charter July 28, a contrast to the unwillingness of the same body in 1919 to join the League of Nations.) On April 28 Italian partisans captured and butchered dictator Benito Mussolini. Adolph Hitler was reported to have committed suicide April 29 in his ruined Berlin chancery while Soviet troops poured into the city. Germany surrendered unconditionally on May 7.

In the Pacific, American airplanes administered the coup de grace to the tottering Japanese empire by dropping the first atomic bomb on Hiroshima August 6, 1945; another was used on Nagasaki August 9. World War II ended with the unconditional surrender of Japan on August 14.

In 1944, running on the theme that the nation should not "change horses in the middle of the stream," President Roosevelt had won an unprecedented fourth term with a national vote plurality of 3,594,993 (of 47,976,670 cast) and a total of 432 (of 531) electoral votes. Reversing Democratic losses in the 1942 midterm elections, Congress went heavily Democratic. After the 1944 election, fifty-seven Democrats and thirty-eight Republicans were in the Senate, and the House was balanced 243–190 in favor of the Democrats. Less than three months later Roosevelt was dead.

Roosevelt's successor, Harry S. Truman, took office April 12. He faced a perplexing task as he sought to hold together the coalition of big-city machines, organized labor, conservative southern Democrats, farmers, minority groups, ethnic and religious blocs, and intellectual liberals, which FDR had brought together for his successive electoral victories.

Pent-up political tensions erupted with the end of World War II. The country was hit by a wave of strikes that climaxed in a May 1946 nationwide rail strike, which President Truman tried to break with a proposal to draft strikers into the army, thus incurring deep resentment in the ranks of organized labor. On the right wing, southern Democrats continued to abandon the administration on almost every item of domestic legislation as they had since 1938. Conservative forces in Congress pressed for a relaxation of wartime price controls far more rapidly than Truman thought advisable.

Despite its failure to reach agreement on such basic issues as labor-management relations, a national housing program, federal aid to schools, and national health insurance, the Seventy-ninth Congress produced some notable legislation, including the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, which transferred control over all aspects of atomic energy development from the War Department to a civilian Atomic Energy Commission.

The Employment Act of 1946, considerably weaker than the “Full Employment” bill first proposed—which bordered on a government guarantee of jobs for all—nevertheless broke new ground in fixing responsibility for national economic policies. The Hospital Survey and Construction Act of 1946 authorized a program of matching federal grants to state and local health bodies for hospital construction. The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 cut the number of standing committees in the House and the Senate, provided for preparation of an annual legislative budget to complement the president’s budget, and raised the salaries of senators and representatives from $10,000 to $12,500, plus a $2,500 tax-free expense account. Included in the law, as a separate title, was the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, requiring lobbyists to register and report their lobbying expenses.

Congress also authorized a fifty-year loan of $3.75 billion to Great Britain, intended to assist the British in removing trade and currency exchange restrictions hampering postwar programs for economic reconstruction and trade liberalization.

1946 Midterm Elections

The 1946 congressional election campaign was marked by two events disadvantageous to the administration. First, President Truman on September 20, 1946, dismissed Secretary of Commerce Henry A. Wallace, former vice president (1941–1945) and only original New Dealer still remaining in the cabinet and a spokesperson of labor and progressive groups. The dismissal followed a speech Wallace gave—which Wallace had read to Truman in advance—criticizing the allegedly anti-Soviet tone of the foreign policy of Secretary of State James F. Byrnes. The incident encouraged Republicans to pin the “red” label on all candidates for whom Wallace subsequently spoke during the campaign.

A second bad break for the administration came in a seven-week national meat shortage just before the election. Truman was forced to issue an order, October 14, ending all meat price controls. His action drew sharp criticism from organized labor and a charge by the Republican national chairman, Rep. B. Carroll Reece of Tennessee, that he was taking action “after the horse has gone to the butcher shop.” The mood of the country was clearly in favor of an early end to all remaining wartime controls. The pent-up frustrations of wartime were directly appealed to in the Republican slogans: “Had enough?” and “It’s time for a change.” Reece promised that a Republican Congress would restore “orderly, capable, and honest government in Washington and replace controls, confusion, corruption, and communism.”

Symptomatic of the tone of the times—pictured by contemporary observers as a desire to return to “normalcy”—were two election-morning newspaper headlines. One read, “Gay Crowd Hails Return of National Horse Show.” A second read, “Crackers, Sugar Back in Stores.”

The Democratic congressional campaign was lackadaisical. Democratic national chairman Robert E. Hannegan warned the country that a GOP victory would be a “surrender to the will of a few who want only large profits for themselves.” Truman failed to hit the campaign trail, and he scarcely offered any comment on the important races and issues.

The Democrats appeared to depend in large measure on frequent radio broadcasts of the late president Roosevelt’s campaign addresses recorded in earlier years. The most publicized activity for Democratic candidates was carried out by the political action committee of the labor group Congress of Industrial Organizations (CIO), headed by the controversial Sidney Hillman.

Results of the 1946 Elections

The 1946 campaign proved to be the most successful for the Republicans since the 1920s—and the best year they would have for many years to come. Across the nation Republicans swept Senate, House, and gubernatorial contests. The Republicans increased their Senate membership from thirty-eight to fifty-one seats, while the Democrats slipped from fifty-seven to forty-five seats.

Among the new Republican senators were John W. Bricker of Ohio, Irving M. Ives of New York, William E. Jenner of Indiana, William F. Knowland of California (who had been appointed to the Senate in 1945), George W. Malone of Nevada, Arthur V. Watkins of Utah, and John J. Williams of Delaware. The Progressive candidate, Robert La Follette Jr. of Wisconsin, lost to Republican Joseph R. McCarthy. With the exception of Ives, all represented their party’s most conservative wing.

The House Republican delegation rose from 190 seats to 246 seats, while the Democratic delegation dropped from 243 to 188; this was the lowest figure since the 1928 elections. The ratio among the nation’s governorships changed from 26–22 in favor of the Democrats to 25–23 in favor of the Republicans.

Important Republican gubernatorial victories included the reelection of Thomas E. Dewey of New York and Earl Warren of California and the elections of Robert F. Bradford of Massachusetts, Alfred E. Driscoll of

New Jersey, James H. Duff of Pennsylvania, Thomas J. Herbert of Ohio, Kim Sigler of Michigan, and L.W. Youngdahl of Minnesota. The only Democrats to win in generally two-party states were William L. Knous of Colorado, William P. Lane Jr. of Maryland, and Lester C. Hunt of Wyoming.

1947–1949: The Eightieth Congress

In 1947 and 1948 the nation proceeded to shake off most of the remaining wartime economic controls and to enjoy an economic boom marred somewhat by substantial inflation and the beginnings of the first postwar recession in late 1948. Americans began to realize that the postwar period would be one of continuing international tensions rather than a return to “normalcy.”

The foreign scene was darkened by increasing Soviet intransigence at the United Nations; by the civil war in Greece and Communist pressures on Turkey, which led to the announcement of the Truman Doctrine in 1947; by the ouster of noncommunists from the Hungarian government in May 1947; by the Communist coup d'état in Czechoslovakia in February 1948; and by the beginning of the Soviet blockade of Berlin in April 1948. Faced with the responsibility of formulating new solutions for the new problems of the postwar era, the Republican-controlled Eightieth Congress wrote some basic laws that governed domestic and foreign policy for many years to come.

On May 15, 1947, Congress approved the Greek-Turkish aid program requested by President Truman (the Truman Doctrine). The concept of massive economic aid to European countries to assist them in their postwar recovery, suggested by Secretary of State George C. Marshall, received final congressional approval in passage of the European Recovery Program (Marshall Plan) April 2, 1948. International tensions paved the way for congressional approval of a peacetime draft law June 19, 1948.

The legislation that placed the most strain on bipartisan foreign policy was extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Congress in 1948 turned down presidential requests for a three-year extension, granting only a single year's extension in a limited form.

During its first session, the Eightieth Congress approved legislation for unifying the armed forces under a single Department of Defense with separate army, navy, and air force departments under the secretary of defense, and for forming the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

In domestic affairs, the Democratic president and Republican Congress generally were at loggerheads. Presidential recommendations to extend New Deal social welfare concepts were largely ignored by Congress. The most significant single piece of domestic legislation approved by the Congress was the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Relations Act, passed over President Truman's veto June 23, 1947. The bill outlawed the closed shop, jurisdictional strikes, and secondary boycotts, and was bitterly opposed by organized labor. Its chief provisions were to remain on the statute books throughout the postwar period.

The Eightieth Congress completed two significant actions concerning the office of president: it passed a bill, approved by Truman on July 18, 1947, making the Speaker of the House and the president pro tempore of the Senate the next two in line of succession to the presidency after the vice president, ahead of the secretary of state and other cabinet members. In a slap at President Roosevelt's four terms, it sent to the states a constitutional amendment limiting the tenure of future presidents to two terms. The Twenty-second Amendment became law in February 1951. National attention in summer 1948 shifted to communism as Elizabeth Bentley and Whittaker Chambers, self-confessed former Communist Party members, appeared before the House Un-American Activities Committee and charged that numerous high administration officials during the 1930s and war years had been members of communist spy rings. Chambers's August 3 testimony that former State Department aide Alger Hiss had been a communist spy became the most celebrated case of all. It was highly dramatized on nationwide television on August 25, when Hiss and Chambers confronted each other at a hearing of the committee.

The 1948 Campaigns

Truman's underdog victory in the 1948 presidential election set the pattern of rapid and startling reversals in domestic political trends during the postwar years. His victory was accompanied by a Democratic congressional and gubernatorial sweep that reversed, in overwhelming measure, the Republican triumph of 1946.

The year 1947 had appeared to be a favorable one for Truman. The Marshall Plan, his “get-tough-with-Russia” policy, his advocacy of government action to curb rising prices, and his willingness to deal firmly with labor leader John L. Lewis had all increased the president's popularity in sharp contrast to its nadir at the time of the 1946 elections. In the November 1947 elections the Democrats were especially successful, electing a governor in Kentucky and winning other important races.

By late spring 1948, however, Truman's popularity had plummeted to such depths that leaders of his party cast about for another nominee to head the Democratic ticket. Several developments contributed to the sharp dip in presidential popularity. Reacting in part to Henry A. Wallace's December 1947 announcement that he was forming a third party, Truman included in his 1948 State of the Union address requests for new social welfare legislation plus a call for a straight $40 tax cut for every individual in the nation. Even some liberal Democrats accused the president of having made a “political harangue” in the most partisan spirit.

In his 1948 whistle-stop campaign Harry S. Truman traveled more than 31,700 miles across the country and delivered 356 speeches to win a surprising victory.

In February the president's advocacy of a far-sweeping civil rights program, based on recommendations of his civil rights commission, created a predictably bitter reaction in the southern wing of his party. The stage was set for the States' Rights ticket, putting four parties in the upcoming presidential campaign. Truman's reelection in the face of open revolts on the left wing (Wallaceites) and the right wing (Dixiecrats) seemed almost impossible.

Fearing defeat for the party in the November elections, an unusual coalition of Democrats began to press in late spring for General Dwight D. Eisenhower's nomination by the Democratic National Convention. The coalition included states' rights advocates from the South, big-city bosses from the North, and party liberals. In statements on June 5 and 9, however, Eisenhower made clear his refusal to consider seeking or accepting the nomination. Neither Eisenhower's political philosophy nor his party were known; it was not until 1952 that he identified himself as a Republican.

A brief effort to draft Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas also collapsed. No obstacle remained to Truman's renomination when the Democrats assembled gloomily in Philadelphia July 12 for their thirtieth national convention.

Truman was nominated on the first ballot on July 15, receiving 947½ votes to 263 for Sen. Richard Russell of Georgia. Senate Democratic leader Alben W. Barkley of Kentucky, who had roused the delegates with a fiery keynote speech July 12, was later nominated for vice president.

Truman's acceptance speech created a sensation. Lashing into the Republicans as "the party of special interests," he called for repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, criticized Congress for its failure to control prices or pass a housing bill, and said that the tax reduction measure approved was a "Republican rich-man's tax bill." He then announced it was his duty to call Congress back into session on July 26 to act on anti-inflation measures, housing, aid to education, a national health program, civil rights, an increase in the hourly minimum wage from 40 cents to 75 cents, extension of Social Security, public power and cheaper electricity projects, and a new "adequate" displaced-persons bill.

The closing day of the Democratic convention was marked by a walkout of delegations from Mississippi and Alabama, when the convention, at the instigation of Minneapolis mayor Hubert H. Humphrey and other party liberals, adopted a tough substitute civil rights plank. Following an impassioned speech by Humphrey in behalf of the stronger plank, the convention approved it by a 651½ to 582½ vote, substituting it for a noncontroversial plank recommended by the Resolutions (Platform) Committee.

Rebellious southerners from thirteen states convened in Birmingham, Alabama, on July 17 as the States' Rights Party and nominated Gov. J. Strom Thurmond, D-S.C., for president and Gov. Fielding L. Wright, D-Miss., for vice president. They urged southern Democratic parties to substitute Thurmond and Wright for Truman and Barkley as the Democratic candidates on the ballot. The convention adopted a platform terming the national Democratic civil rights plank "this infamous and iniquitous program" that would mean a "police state in a totalitarian, centralized, bureaucratic government." The platform stated, "We stand for the segregation of the races and the integrity of each race."

Another group met in Philadelphia in July. Calling itself the Progressive Party, it nominated Henry A. Wallace for president and Sen. Glen H. Taylor, D-Idaho, for vice president. Party leaders denied that the party was communist-dominated, though most observers considered it heavily influenced by the extreme left. In his acceptance speech, Wallace blamed Truman for the Berlin crisis. He said there had been a "great betrayal" following President Roosevelt's death in which the administration inaugurated its "get tough" policy, thus "slamming the door" on peace talks with the Soviet Union. The Progressive platform called for a program of U.S. disarmament, a conciliatory policy toward the Soviet Union, an end to segregation, nationalization of key industries, repeal of Taft-Hartley, high farm price supports, and the Townsend plan, giving a $100 monthly pension to everyone at the age of sixty.

Scenting victory, Republicans engaged in a lively contest for their party's presidential nomination. The three chief candidates were New York governor Thomas E. Dewey, former Minnesota governor Harold E. Stassen, and Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio. Taft enjoyed the support of most of the more conservative party regulars.

As the primaries developed during the spring, it first appeared that Stassen might be on his way to the nomination. After losing to Dewey in New Hampshire, he won an overwhelming victory in Wisconsin over Dewey and native son Gen. Douglas MacArthur, who had been considered the strong favorite. Stassen won nineteen delegates to eight for MacArthur and none for Dewey. In the Nebraska primary Stassen again won against Dewey, Taft, and several other candidates whose names were placed on the ballot.

Observers began to predict Stassen's nomination, but he then made what later appeared to be a serious error. He entered the May 4 Ohio primary, bluntly antagonizing the Taft wing of the party. (He won only nine of the twenty-three contested delegate spots, the rest going to Taft.) In Oregon, where Stassen had been an early favorite, he lost to Dewey in the May 21 primary (117,554 votes to 107,946), after a radio debate between the two men in which Stassen endorsed and Dewey opposed outlawing the Communist Party. Observers believe the debate and primary returns effectively finished Stassen's chances.

When the Twenty-fourth Republican National Convention opened in Philadelphia June 21, the Dewey victory already seemed probable. Taft was handicapped because many conservatives considered his stands for federal aid to education and housing too liberal, while many party professionals feared his coauthorship of the Taft-Hartley Act might harm the party among union voters. California governor Earl Warren and Michigan senator Arthur Vandenberg both had hopes that a convention deadlock might turn the delegates toward them, but neither ambition was justified. Dewey began with the solid bloc of New York delegates and enjoyed substantial support in delegations from every part of the country.

In first ballot voting June 24, with 547 needed to win, Dewey received 434 votes to 224 for Taft and 157 for Stassen. Favorite-son candidates shared the rest. On the second ballot Dewey's total rose to 515 against 274 for Taft and 149 for Stassen. Following this, the other candidates quickly fell behind Dewey. His nomination on the third roll call was merely a formality.

During the following night Dewey conferred with influential party leaders and decided on Governor Warren as his running mate. The party adopted a platform backing a "bipartisan" foreign policy; foreign aid to anticommunist countries; "full" recognition of Israel; housing, anti-inflation, and civil rights legislation; and promised a fight against communists inside and outside government.

The Truman and Dewey campaigns became historic examples. The Truman effort showed how a determined candidate can win by going to the people, even with the odds against him; the Dewey performance was an example of how a supposedly sure candidate can lose by waging a lackluster campaign of overconfidence.

Truman undertook a 31,700-mile "barnstorming" whistle-stop tour by train, appearing before an estimated six million persons. At each opportunity the president would deliver one of his "give-'em-hell" attacks on the Republicans. The "do-nothing Republican Eightieth Congress" was Truman's chief target: "When I called them back into session, what did they do? Nothing. Nothing. That Congress never did anything the whole time it was in session." If the Republicans win, "they'll tear you apart." The Republicans are "predatory animals who don't care if you people are thrown into a depression.... They like runaway prices."

Toward the end of the campaign Truman began a special appeal to minority racial and religious groups, calling for strong civil rights legislation and condemning Republican leaders for passing the Displaced Persons Act, which he said discriminated against Catholics and Jews.

Dewey's campaign was characterized by his aloofness and cool manner, his skirting of issues and his diffuse, repetitious calls for "national unity." Dewey called the Eightieth Congress "one of the best," but he failed to come to the defense of its individual programs even when they were under direct attack from Truman. Assured by the pollsters, campaign strategists, advertising consultants, and reporters that he had the election well in hand, Dewey refrained from direct or forceful answers to any of the Truman attacks. Even more than Dewey, vice-presidential candidate Warren disdained to enter the partisan fray.

The Dewey program was particularly vague on farm legislation, which was a new field to him as a New York governor. "There are some people who would like to inject politics into the necessities of food raising in our country. I don't believe in that," Dewey said. He expressed a general support for price supports, not indicating whether they should be at parity or close to it or on a flexible or rigid scale. Meanwhile, farm prices were taking a nosedive that was concerning farmers across the Midwest. Also, storage capacity in grain elevators was short, adding to rural dissatisfaction.

Both the Progressive and Dixiecrat movements, meanwhile, were faltering. Wallace became increasingly identified with the communists and few "liberal" leaders joined his cause. His campaign crowds dwindled to a fraction of their size earlier in the year.

The Dixiecrat ticket failed to make substantial headway as most southern governors and senators—including some who had been most vociferous in denouncing Truman's civil rights proposals—chose the route of party regularity and backed the president. Only four southern Democratic parties—those in Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina—followed through on the plea of the Birmingham convention to put Thurmond and Wright on the ballot as the regular Democratic nominees. They went on the ballot as States' Rights Party candidates in ten other states: Arkansas,

ACTIONS OF THE “DO-NOTHING” EIGHTIETH CONGRESS

The Eightieth Congress (1947–1949), characterized by a hard-campaigning President Harry Truman as the “do-nothing Republican Eightieth Congress,” actually passed a great deal of legislation, some of which Truman wanted, some over his serious objections. A partial list of Eightieth Congress actions:

- Truman doctrine of aid to Greece and Turkey.
- Marshall Plan for aid to Europe.
- Peace treaties approved with Italy, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Romania.
- Inter-American Treaty of Mutual Assistance approved.
- Vandenberg Resolution favoring collective and regional mutual assistance pacts.
- Unification of armed forces under Department of Defense; creation of Central Intelligence Agency.
- $65 million building loan for UN headquarters.
- Peacetime draft law.
- Passage of Taft-Hartley Act, over veto.
- Presidential succession change.
- Constitutional amendment to limit presidential tenure to two terms.
- Hope-Aiken flexible price support bill.
- Newsboys excluded from Social Security system, over veto.
- A tax-reduction bill, over veto.
- Liberalized housing credit terms.
- Extended rent control.

California, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, North Carolina, North Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

With the first election eve returns from the northeastern states, Truman took a lead that he never lost despite the closeness of the election. As the night wore on, state after state considered “safe Republican” moved into the Truman column. Dewey carried Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Indiana, Maryland, Michigan, and New York (the last three evidently because of usual Democratic voters defecting to Wallace). But the president carried Massachusetts, won the border states, took all but four southern states (Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina) that were in the Dixiecrat column and carried the farm belt. Finally California fell in his column. When Ohio conclusively went for Truman at 11 o’clock Wednesday morning, November 3, Dewey conceded.

The election returns seemed to indicate that the Democratic New Deal philosophy was so generally accepted by the electorate that the president’s warnings of a return to “Republican” depression days remained a telling point. On a less philosophical level many observers felt the Truman “Mr. Average” approach, compared to Dewey’s “Olympian airs,” drew a large sympathy vote from the average people in the street for the conceded “underdog.”

Results of the 1948 Elections

With the Truman victory the Democrats took control of Congress with commanding majorities in both the Senate and the House. The Democrats picked up nine Senate seats to make the new balance 54–42 in their favor. Among the new Democratic senators were Lyndon B. Johnson (Texas), Paul H. Douglas (Illinois), Hubert H. Humphrey (Minnesota), Estes Kefauver (Tennessee), Robert S. Kerr (Oklahoma), and Clinton P. Anderson (New Mexico). Republican Margaret Chase Smith was elected senator from Maine. In the House, Democrats made a net gain of seventy-five seats; the new total was 263 Democrats and 171 Republicans.

The Democrats also ran strong in gubernatorial contests, winning twenty of the thirty-two seats up for election and reversing the Republican trend of the immediate past years. The new totals were thirty Democratic and eighteen Republican governorships. Among the new Democratic governors were Chester Bowles (Connecticut), Adlai E. Stevenson (Illinois), and G. Mennen Williams (Michigan).

1949–1951: The Eighty-First Congress

The international situation in the years 1949 and 1950 was marked by stabilization and cooling of tensions in Europe, in sharp contrast to renewed Communist conquest and the threat of nuclear war in Asia. In April 1949 the North Atlantic Treaty was signed by the United States, Canada, and ten European nations, agreeing that “an armed attack against any one or more of them in Europe and North America shall be considered an attack against all.” A direct reaction to Communist power moves, which included the 1948 takeover of Czechoslovakia, the treaty of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) laid down a policy of containment of Soviet expansionist ambitions that helped to preserve a territorial status quo on the European continent for years to come. On September 30, 1949, the Soviets lifted a blockade of Berlin, which had been in effect since April 1, 1948.

In Asia, however, the Western position was disintegrating rapidly. On January 22, 1949, the Chinese Communists took Beijing. On April 23 they crossed the Yangtze and captured Nanjing. On August 6 Secretary of State Dean Acheson blamed Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek's "reactionary" clique for the Communist victory and gave notice that no further aid would be given Chiang's government. On December 7, 1949, the Nationalist Chinese government fled to Formosa, later known as Taiwan.

The takeover of mainland China by a hostile Communist power did not shake the Western world, however, as much as the surprise attack of Communist North Korean troops on South Korea on June 25, 1950. The UN Security Council immediately ordered a cease-fire. Two days later President Truman ordered U.S. forces under Gen. Douglas MacArthur to repel the North Koreans. This became a UN "peace action" but was largely an American venture. U.S. involvement in Korea led to a near-wartime mobilization of the U.S. economy. It also led to President Truman's dispute with General MacArthur over the proposed bombing of Manchuria, which in turn led to Truman's dismissal of MacArthur in April 1951. As the war dragged on for two years with heavy U.S. casualties, it became a source of great frustration for the American people.

In other important developments, the Soviet Union in September 1949 exploded its first atomic bomb, ending the U.S. atomic monopoly; India was proclaimed independent in January 1950; Alger Hiss was found guilty of perjury on January 21, 1950; and Truman, in January 1950, authorized the Atomic Energy Commission to produce the hydrogen bomb.

In his inaugural address January 20, 1949, President Truman included a "Point IV" proposal of American foreign policy for "a bold new program for making the benefits of our scientific advances and industrial progress available for the improvement and growth of underdeveloped areas." Over the succeeding years, foreign aid assistance for capital investment to build up the economies of fledgling nations of Africa, Asia, and Latin America became a cornerstone of U.S. foreign policy.

When the heavily Democratic Eighty-first Congress assembled in Washington January 3, 1949, liberals had high hopes that it would enact a new body of social welfare legislation such as that proposed by Truman in the 1948 campaign. The first signs for the Truman program seemed bright as the House on January 3 adopted a new rule to break the power of its Rules Committee to bottle up legislation indefinitely. The "twenty-one-day rule" provided that, if the Rules Committee failed to act on a bill after twenty-one legislative days, the chair of the legislative committee that originally approved it could ask the House to vote on whether to consider the measure or not, with a majority vote required to bring the bill to the floor. The rule was dropped by the House when the Eighty-second Congress organized in 1951.

On January 5 Truman appeared before Congress to urge a sweeping new Fair Deal program of social reform. But Congress in general proved to be a disappointment to the liberal camp on domestic issues. Approval was given to a long-range housing bill providing for expanded federal programs in slum clearance, public housing, and farm improvement programs, which Truman signed into law July 15, 1949, "with deep satisfaction." The administration also scored an important victory in passage of the Social Security Expansion Act of 1950 and a limited victory in a 1949 minimum wage increase. But otherwise the Fair Deal program hit formidable obstacles.

Other legislation, such as that to continue the Marshall Plan, military assistance to friendly foreign nations, and a two-year extension of the Trade Agreements Act cleared Congress with some bipartisan support. The Senate on July 21, 1949, approved the North Atlantic Treaty by a two-thirds margin. In domestic affairs important steps toward streamlining the executive branch of the government were made in the Government Reorganization Act of 1949.

An explosive new issue, meanwhile, had developed on the domestic scene. In a February 11, 1950, speech in Wheeling, West Virginia, Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy, R-Wis., charged that there were fifty-seven communists working in the State Department, a charge promptly denied by the department. Until his formal censure by the Senate in 1954, McCarthy and his freewheeling accusations of communist sympathies among high- and low-placed government officials absorbed much of the public attention. The phenomenon of McCarthyism had a major effect on the psychological climate of the early 1950s.

The 1950 Midterm Elections

The liberal Democratic trend apparent in Truman's surprise 1948 victory was sharply reversed in the 1950 elections as Republicans exploited the issues of inflation, Korea, communism, and corruption, to make strong comebacks in congressional and gubernatorial elections.

Truman, delivering his only major speech of the campaign November 4, 1950, sought to bolster the Democratic effort with charges similar to those he leveled against the Republicans in 1948: that they were captives of "special interests," that they would undo the country's progress toward peace and prosperity if they gained control of the national government. Truman said the Republicans were "isolationists" and that "any farmer who votes for the Republican Party ought to have his head examined."

The Republican campaign assumed a far more aggressive tone than it had in 1948. Sen. Robert A. Taft, R-Ohio, said the administration was responsible for high prices, high taxes, the loss of China to the Communists, and the Korean conflict. (Republicans pointed frequently to a January 12, 1950, speech by Secretary of State Dean Acheson before the National Press Club in which Acheson described the U.S. defensive line in the East Asian in such a way as to exclude Korea.)

Typical of other Republican attacks was a November 4 reply to Truman by Harold Stassen, charging that the “blinded, blundering, bewildering” East Asian policy of the “spy-riddled” Truman administration was directly to blame for American casualties in Korea.

McCarthy’s charges of communism in high places in the government played an important part in the campaign. Whether or not the voters believed all of McCarthy’s charges, many seemed to accept the thesis that there was something drastically wrong with U.S. foreign policy and that Acheson was a likely villain.

In Maryland, the prominent veteran Democratic senator Millard E. Tydings was defeated by John Marshall Butler, an obscure Republican, after a campaign in which Tydings was accused of having “whitewashed” the State Department as head of a Senate committee investigating McCarthy’s charges of communism in the department. Butler was later accused of countenancing distribution of a campaign leaflet with a doctored photograph showing Tydings with U.S. Communist leader Earl Browder.

In California, Republican representative Richard M. Nixon ran for the Senate against Rep. Helen Gahagan Douglas, a prominent liberal Democrat. Nixon’s charges that Douglas voted frequently with New York representative Vito Marcantonio, a member of the American Labor Party, whose voting record was often depicted as procommunist, established the image of Nixon as a ruthless campaigner, an image that would harm him in future races.

Another Senate contest with communism as the chief issue took place in North Carolina, where Willis Smith defeated incumbent Frank P. Graham in a June 24 Democratic primary runoff. Smith charged that Graham was badly tainted with socialism because of his alleged “associations with communism.”

Among major issues stressed by the Republicans was Truman’s program for compulsory health insurance for all, termed “socialized medicine” by doctors who fought it both in the primaries and in the general elections. The issue was thought to have contributed to the defeat of several Democratic senators, including Claude Pepper of Florida and Graham of North Carolina in primaries and Elbert D. Thomas of Utah and Glen H. Taylor of Idaho in the general election. But in each one of these cases and in the California Senate race, the “soft-on-communism” issue, at its peak in 1950, played a more important role.

Results of the 1950 Elections

The two most closely watched Senate battles were in Ohio, where Republican senator Robert Taft was the target of an all-out attempt by organized labor to defeat him because of his coauthorship of the Taft-Hartley Act, and in Illinois, where Senate majority leader Scott W. Lucas was challenged by former Republican representative Everett McKinley Dirksen, who campaigned as a conservative near-isolationist. The election returns showed Taft the winner in Ohio by a gigantic 431,184 vote margin (57.5 percent), while Dirksen upset Lucas with 294,354 votes to spare (53.9 percent). Both Taft and Dirksen would later serve as their party’s Senate leader.

Assessment of the election returns showed that, while the Democrats retained nominal control of Congress (the Senate by two votes, the House by thirty-five), Truman’s Fair Deal influence on Congress had been virtually nullified. Outside the conservative southern states, the Democrats elected only 126 House members to 196 for the Republicans.

On the Senate side, the Republicans won eighteen and the Democrats nine of the nonsouthern contests. In addition to Dirksen and Nixon, new senators included George A. Smathers, D-Fla.; A.S. Mike Monroney, D-Okla.; and James H. Duff, R-Pa., who was one of the prime movers for the nomination of Eisenhower in 1952.

1951–1953: The Eighty-Second Congress

The Korean conflict continued to dominate American life in 1951 and 1952 and led directly to the defeat of the Democrats in the 1952 elections. On April 11, 1951, President Truman removed General Douglas MacArthur from his command of UN and U.S. forces in the East Asia. MacArthur had wanted to pursue Chinese Communist forces across the Yalu River to their sanctuary in Manchuria to destroy the air depots and lines of supply being used to sustain their war effort in Korea. On March 25 MacArthur had threatened Communist China with air and naval attack. These steps, running contrary to the Truman administration policy under Secretary of State Dean Acheson, led to MacArthur’s removal. Negotiations for a truce along the Thirty-Eighth Parallel began July 10, 1951, but the fighting continued for another two years.

In other international developments, the Japanese peace treaty was signed in San Francisco on September 8, 1951. War between Germany and the United States was formally ended October 19. On May 26, 1952, a peace contract between Germany and the Western allies was signed. In November 1952 the United States exploded the first hydrogen bomb.

A major domestic controversy developed in 1952 when Truman on April 8 ordered seizure of the nation’s steel mills to avert a strike by 600,000 CIO steel workers. On June 2, however, the Supreme Court ruled the seizure illegal. The workers struck from June 3 to July 25.

The Eighty-second Congress accomplished little outside the realm of foreign and military affairs. None of the Fair Deal proposals expounded by the president and the Democratic leadership in 1948 and 1950—national health insurance, aid to education, and increased public health benefits—was enacted into law.

In 1951 the nation's interest was captured by the televised crime hearings of a Senate subcommittee chaired by Sen. Estes Kefauver, D-Tenn. The hearings exposed nationwide criminal organizations that reaped huge illegal profits, influencing local politicians and buying protection.

The 1952 Campaigns

President Truman ended any speculation about his third-term ambitions by announcing March 29 that he would not be a candidate for reelection. The field of possible Democratic nominees included Senator Kefauver; Gov. Adlai E. Stevenson, D-Ill.; W. Averell Harriman of New York; Vice President Alben W. Barkley of Kentucky; Sen. Robert S. Kerr, D-Okla.; and Sen. Richard B. Russell, D-Ga. Stevenson was Truman's personal choice for the nomination and was offered presidential support as early as January. Truman was willing to back Barkley after Stevenson's repeated disavowals of interest in the nomination; however, influential labor leaders vetoed Barkley's nomination, forcing him to withdraw on the eve of the convention.

Stevenson consistently professed his disinterest in the nomination and only submitted to a draft movement in his behalf while the 1952 Democratic convention, which convened in Chicago July 21, was in progress. The support for Stevenson, already strong, began to snowball with the July 24 announcement of Thomas J. Gavin, President Truman's alternate as a delegate from Missouri, that he would vote for Stevenson on Truman's instructions. Stevenson ran second to Kefauver in both the first and second ballots.

Only on the third ballot, not completed until 12:25 a.m. on July 26, did Stevenson move close to nomination as Harriman withdrew in his favor. A unanimous nomination by acclamation was then moved and carried. Following a conference with President Truman, Stevenson chose Sen. John J. Sparkman, D-Ala., a backer of the national Democratic Party on most issues except civil rights, as his running mate. The convention then confirmed his choice by acclamation.

The contest for the Republican presidential nomination, despite other entries in the field, was fought out between the supporters of two relatively clearly defined groups within the party: Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio represented the conservative midwestern and southern wing of the party, and Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower became the candidate of the "internationalist" wing of the party centered on the East and West coasts. Other announcements of candidacy were made by California governor Earl Warren and by Harold E. Stassen.

Eisenhower in early 1952 was on duty in Paris as commanding general of the new North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The major political question as 1952 began was whether he would permit his name to be put forth for the Republican nomination. Previously he had always rejected talk of his running for president, and he had declined to make his political affiliations known. The mystery ended on January 7 when Sen. Henry Cabot Lodge Jr., R-Mass., announced that he was entering Eisenhower's name in the March 11 New Hampshire primary after having received assurances from the general that he was a Republican. In a January 8 statement from Paris, Eisenhower confirmed his Republican loyalties and said he would run for president if he received a "clear-cut call to political duty." Eisenhower said, however, that he would not actively seek the nomination. Despite his refusal to campaign, Eisenhower ran strongly in most of the primaries where his name was entered.

When the Twenty-fifth Republican National Convention opened in Chicago on July 7, the delegate issue was the hottest—and one of the first—items of business. In a preliminary test the convention voted 658–548 against allowing delegates with disputed seats to vote on other delegate contests until their own credentials were accepted. This resolution, which had been endorsed by twenty-five of the nation's Republican governors, prevented disputed Taft delegates from the South from voting for each other's seating. The victory of the Eisenhower forces on this issue foreshadowed the general's eventual nomination.

Korea, foreign affairs, corruption in government, internal communism, and the domestic economy were the major issues of the 1952 campaign. Of these, only the domestic economy—booming through the stimulation of the Korean War—proved to be in any way a plus for the Democrats. The other issues aided the Republican campaign.

The most dramatic episode of the campaign opened September 18 with an article in the New York Post, charging that GOP vice-presidential nominee Richard Nixon had been the beneficiary of an allegedly secret fund financed by California businesses. For a week, controversy raged with many demands that Nixon resign from the ticket so that the corruption issue against the Democrats would not be diluted.

Eisenhower declined to take a firm stand on Nixon's continuance on the ticket. Finally, Nixon on September 23 went on nationwide television for a melodramatic defense of the moral rectitude of the fund and to make a complete accounting of his own relatively limited personal assets. In this speech Nixon referred to his wife's "respectable Republican cloth coat" and a gift dog, Checkers—"regardless of what they say about it, we're going to keep it."

Response to Nixon's speech overwhelmingly favored keeping him on the ticket. Eisenhower immediately issued a statement lauding Nixon for his bravery in a “tough situation.” At a September 24 meeting between the two men in Wheeling, West Virginia, Eisenhower announced that Nixon had completely “vindicated himself.”

Results of the 1952 Elections

In contrast to 1948, when the pollsters and commentators had all foreseen a sweeping Dewey victory, there was a marked reluctance to make a firm prediction on the outcome of the 1952 campaign. But when the returns started to roll in election eve, it was clear that Eisenhower had won by a landslide and that his victory had probably never been in doubt.

Only nine of the forty-eight states went for Stevenson, and they were in the South or border areas (West Virginia, Kentucky, Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina). Every state across the East, Midwest, and West went for Eisenhower; and the tide rolled on into many parts of the South, with the Eisenhower-Nixon ticket carrying Texas, Oklahoma, Florida, Virginia, and Tennessee.

The electoral vote count was 442 for Eisenhower, 89 for Stevenson. In popular votes Eisenhower won a plurality by 6,621,242 votes. He polled 33,936,234 votes, the highest number of votes ever received by a presidential candidate. But in defeat Stevenson won 27,314,992 votes, the highest number ever received by a losing candidate.

Seeking explanations for the Eisenhower landslide, observers found a multitude of reasons. The doubts, fears, and frustrations stemming from the stalemated Korean War, the Hiss case and the communist spy trials, revelations of corruption in the federal government, rising prices, and high taxes—all contributed to a strong desire for a change in executive leadership. Stevenson’s divorce and wit were thought to be unpopular with many voters. Sparkman’s identification with the white supremacy views of the Alabama Democratic Party harmed the ticket among black voters.

The lack of enthusiasm for the Republican congressional leadership, the memory of the Depression, and fear of reversal of social-economic gains of the Democratic years might have nullified these Republican advantages, however, if the Republicans had not found in Eisenhower an ideal candidate to allay such fears. A national hero, a man whose leadership had already been proven in World War II and in laying the groundwork for the North Atlantic Alliance, Eisenhower also had the invaluable asset of a personality that charmed voters and the image of being “above politics.” Few could seriously believe that “Ike” would scuttle the New Deal reforms.

The uniquely personal aspect of Eisenhower’s victory was underlined by the narrow margins with which Republicans moved into control of Congress, despite the presidential landslide. Republicans made a net gain of twenty-two House seats to a new total of 221, only three more than the 218 needed to give them control. The Democratic House total slipped from 235 to 213. In Senate elections the Republicans made a net gain of only one seat, just enough to give them a one-seat edge in the new Senate. The new Senate totals were forty-eight Republicans, forty-seven Democrats, and one Independent (Wayne Morse of Oregon, formerly a Republican).

In what proved to be a significant Senate race, thirty-five-year-old Democratic representative John F. Kennedy defeated Republican Henry Cabot Lodge Jr., a top leader in the Eisenhower drive for the GOP presidential nomination, by a 70,737-vote margin in Massachusetts. Other newly elected senators included Barry Goldwater, R-Ariz.; Stuart Symington, D-Mo.; Mike Mansfield, D-Mont.; Henry M. Jackson, D-Wash.; and Albert Gore, D-Tenn.

On the gubernatorial level, Republicans solidified the national lead they had achieved in 1950 by winning five new seats. The winners were Christian A. Herter, R-Mass.; William G. Stratton, R-Ill.; J. Caleb Boggs, R-Del.; George N. Craig, R-Ind.; and Hugo Aronson, R-Mont. The new governorship totals were thirty Republicans and eighteen Democrats.

1953–1955: The Eighty-Third Congress

Many Americans had hoped that Eisenhower’s election to the presidency would usher in an era of domestic tranquility and international stability. In some respects these wishes were fulfilled. There was a more harmonious relationship between the president and Congress than at any time since World War II. A Korean armistice was finally signed July 27, 1953, with prisoner repatriation following shortly thereafter.

Republicans claimed that President Eisenhower’s action in instructing the U.S. Seventh Fleet to stop shielding Communist China from any possible Nationalist Chinese attacks, combined with information relayed to the Chinese that the United States would resort to full-scale war in Korea if the Communists refused to come to peace terms, were decisive factors in persuading the Communists to come to terms. Democrats replied that the terms of the armistice were no better than those the Truman administration had previously rejected.

Even with a return to relative stability in Korea, however, the international situation remained in flux on other fronts. Soviet premier Joseph Stalin died March 5, setting off a contest for succession in the Soviet Union. On July 7, 1953, an uprising that broke out in Communist-held East Germany was quelled when the Communists called in Soviet troops and tanks, which mowed down civilians revolting in the streets of East Berlin. The United States did not intervene, drawing into question the wisdom of the “liberation” policy spelled out by Republican campaigners in 1952.

Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy was Congress's most notorious anticommunist investigator of the post-World War II period. McCarthy's abuse of committee power led to his censure by the Senate in 1954 and reform in congressional committee procedures.

On August 20, 1953, the Soviet Union announced the successful testing of its first hydrogen bomb. President Eisenhower went before the United Nations on December 8 to urge the major powers to cooperate in developing the peaceful uses of atomic energy. The United States on January 21, 1954, launched the Nautilus, the first atomic-powered submarine.

The curtain began to go down on France's colonial empire as the nation admitted defeat in its seven-and-a-half-year war against Communist infiltration in Indo-China and submitted to a partition of Vietnam at the spring 1953 Geneva conference on Far Eastern affairs; France subsequently withdrew forces from Vietnam, Cambodia, and Laos. Threatened Communist inroads in Central America were reversed, however, by U.S.-supported anticommunist forces, which invaded Guatemala and overthrew the communist-oriented government of President Jacobo Arbenz Guzman in June 1954.

The Eighty-third Congress produced few innovations in domestic or foreign policy, but neither did it reverse New Deal social reforms. During the first session (1953), foreign aid and military appropriations were pared, the controversial Reconstruction Finance Corp. was abolished, legislation was passed giving the states title to the oil-rich coastal lands previously claimed by the federal government, and Congress permitted the president to carry out a governmental reorganization creating a new Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, which it had denied President Truman in 1949 and 1950.

Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy and his unrestrained accusations of communist influence throughout the government remained a domestic issue. Taking over the chair of the Senate Government Operations Committee in 1953, McCarthy conducted hearings and investigated the State Department, Voice of America, Department of the Army, and other agencies. An opinion-stifling "climate of fear" in many government agencies was said to be one of the results of his probes. The Army-McCarthy hearings, televised in spring 1954, were the climax of McCarthy's career, but his bullying tactics led finally to his censure by the Senate on December 2, 1954. McCarthy's influence waned steadily thereafter. He died in May 1957.

The Supreme Court on May 17, 1954, handed down a unanimous decision declaring racial segregation in the public schools to be unconstitutional. The opinion, written by Chief Justice Earl Warren (whom Eisenhower had appointed on the death of Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson in 1953), began a major movement toward racial desegregation across the nation. It inspired bitter hostility in the southern states.

A potential Democratic comeback with the nation's voters was presaged by special elections held during 1953. The traditional Republican hold on New Jersey was broken by the election of Democrat Robert B. Meyner to the governorship. Special elections in the New Jersey Sixth and Wisconsin Ninth Districts resulted in the election of two Democrats, Harrison A. Williams Jr. in New Jersey and Lester Johnson in Wisconsin. They were the first members of their party ever to win in either of those districts.

The 1954 Midterm Elections

The Republican success under Eisenhower in winning both houses of Congress in 1952 was not repeated in 1954. Democrats made significant comebacks, recapturing control of both House and Senate and reversing the Republican gubernatorial trend of recent years. But the swing back to the Democrats, while it indicated that the Republican Party was probably much weaker than its popular president, was by no means strong enough to spell a major change in the nation's mood. Although it was in the majority, much of the Democratic Party strength was concentrated in the conservative South.

President Eisenhower appealed to the voters to return a Republican Congress and he campaigned harder and longer than any other president had ever done in a midterm election. He claimed that Congress had enacted fifty-four of sixty-four legislative proposals he had submitted and that this "batting average of .830" was "pretty good in any league." (Congressional Quarterly figures showed Congress had approved 150 of 232 specific Eisenhower requests for a batting average of .647.)

In an October 8 televised address he warned that a Democratic congressional victory would start "a cold war of partisan politics between the Congress and the Executive Branch," which would block "the great work" his administration had “begun so well.” Congressional Democratic leaders Sam Rayburn and Lyndon B. Johnson, both of Texas, replied in a joint telegram to the president that “there will be no cold war conducted against you by the Democrats” and complained that the president had made an “unjust attack on the many Democrats who have done so much to cooperate with your Administration and to defend your program against attacks by members of your own party.”

In a last-minute effort to bolster the Republican vote in critical states, Eisenhower made an unprecedented one-day, 1,521-mile flying trip on October 29, 1954, to address crowds in Cleveland, Detroit, Louisville, Kentucky, and Wilmington, Delaware. In these speeches he implied that Democratic administrations had been able to boast of full employment and prosperity only during war. Following the campaign some observers speculated that Eisenhower may have kept many women’s votes by reminding them that the Republicans had put an end to the “futile casualties” in Korea. There was general agreement that his campaign activities averted a still stronger Democratic trend, especially in congressional elections. Vice President Nixon played a controversial role in the campaign, charging that the Democrats were unfit to govern because of their record on the communist issue.

On the issue of mounting unemployment in several areas of the country, Democrats charged Republicans with a “callous” attitude toward the problem, while Republicans replied that they had provided jobs without war. Public power was also an issue, with Democrats accusing Republicans of “give-aways” to private interests, while Republicans replied that Democratic public power policy had tended toward socialism and government monopoly.

Results of the 1954 Elections

Democrats moved into control of the Senate by a 48–47–1 margin as compared with the 49–46–1 Republican edge before the election. Among the new senators were Richard L. Neuberger, D-Ore., former vice president Alben W. Barkley, D-Ky., and Clifford P. Case, R-N.J.

In the House the new lineup was 232 Democrats and 203 Republicans, a net Democratic gain of nineteen seats over the previous Congress, which had had 221 Republicans and 213 Democrats.

The Democratic congressional majorities grew throughout the remainder of the Eisenhower years. Sam Rayburn, D-Texas, again became Speaker of the House, and Lyndon B. Johnson, D-Texas, Senate majority leader—posts they held through the rest of the decade.

Republicans fared even worse in the governorship races. Including the Democratic victory of Edmund S. Muskie in the September 13 Maine election, the Democrats ousted Republicans from eight state governments, and the Republicans failed to take a single Democratic seat. The gubernatorial balance shifted from 29–19 in favor of the Republicans to 27–21 in favor of the Democrats. In the New York governorship election to succeed retiring three-term governor Thomas E. Dewey, a Republican, Democrat Averell Harriman won a narrow 11,125-vote plurality over Republican senator Irving M. Ives. Other Democratic gubernatorial winners included Abraham Ribicoff in Connecticut, Orville Freeman in Minnesota, and George M. Leader in Pennsylvania.

1955–1957: The Eighty-Fourth Congress

Cooperation between a middle-of-the-road president and a middle-of-the-road Congress, tension in the Formosa Strait, growing pressures in Africa and Asia for independence from colonial rule, the Geneva “summit” conference, presidential illnesses, “de-Stalinization” in the Soviet empire, revolt in Poland and Hungary, war over the Suez Canal—these events were highlights of the last half of President Eisenhower’s first term in office.

Divided responsibility for government brought unexpectedly harmonious sessions of Congress, with nothing resembling the “cold war of partisan politics” predicted in 1954 by Eisenhower if the Democrats were to take control of Congress. Administration measures fared almost as well as they had during the Republican Eighty-third Congress, again with substantial aid from Democrats.

Especially in foreign affairs the Democratic leadership cooperated substantially with the president. Early in 1955 Congress approved the resolution Eisenhower had requested to give him authority to employ U.S. armed forces to defend Formosa. Prompted by Communist Chinese bombardment of the off-shore islands of Quemoy and Matsu, the resolution also gave the president authority to defend, in addition to Formosa, “related positions and territories now in friendly hands,” an evident reference to Quemoy and Matsu. Attempts in the Senate to delete this authority were overwhelmingly rejected.

The Senate approved, by almost unanimous votes, the Southeast Asia Collective Defense Treaty (which created the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization—SEATO), plus protocols ending the occupation of Germany, restoring sovereignty to West Germany, and permitting West German rearmament and NATO membership. The peace treaty with Austria, creating an independent, neutral state, was signed in Vienna on May 15 and was approved by the Senate June 7, 1955. The controversial constitutional amendment offered by Sen. John W. Bricker, R-Ohio, to trim the president’s treaty-making powers was reported out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1956, but it was not brought up for Senate debate because of the president’s firm opposition. In 1955 the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act was extended for three years, the longest single extension since 1945. Foreign aid appropriations came fairly close to matching presidential requests.

Domestic enactments by the politically divided government were less impressive. The two most important measures approved by Congress appeared to be the multibillion dollar federal highway program, providing for a 41,000-mile interstate superhighway program as part of the most extensive public works project in the nation's history, and the Agricultural Act of 1956, which included the soil bank program that supporters hoped would limit farm surpluses and raise farmers' incomes. Congress also voted an increase in the minimum wage to $1 an hour (as opposed to the ninety-cent figure recommended by the administration).

On the international scene the first conference of Asian-African countries met April 18–27, 1955, in Bandung, Indonesia. Delegates endorsed an end to colonialism, called for national independence, and demanded UN membership for all states that qualified under the UN charter (including Communist China). In the following month the Warsaw Treaty, counterpart to NATO for the Communist satellites of Eastern Europe, was ratified.

At the Twentieth Congress of the Soviet Communist Party in Moscow, February 14–25, 1956, Nikita Khrushchev proclaimed a new party line, which included destruction of Joseph Stalin as a national idol. The rush to “de-Stalinize” however, unleashed forces in the Communist world that the Soviet Union was able to control only by bloody repressions of the June 28, 1956, workers revolt in Poznan, Poland, and the revolt of Hungarians in October and November of 1956.

Reacting adversely to Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's acceptance of Soviet-bloc arms and economic agreements with the Communist world, the United States on July 19, 1956, informed Egypt that it was withdrawing its offer to aid in construction of the Aswan Dam on the Nile River. Britain on July 20 announced it was also withdrawing from the project. On July 26 Egypt seized the British-held Suez Canal and denounced the Western powers. Prolonged negotiations during the summer and fall failed to persuade Egypt to modify its decision on nationalizing the canal, and on October 29 Israel launched an invasion of Egypt. The move was coordinated with the British and French governments, which attacked Egypt on October 31. The Suez Canal was blocked by sunken and scuttled ships. The Soviet Union stepped into the controversy, threatening atomic war if Britain and France refused to retreat. The United Nations, led by the United States, condemned the French, British, and Israeli moves. A UN cease-fire ended the fighting November 7, and a UN international peace force moved in to enforce the peace, the terms of which allowed Egypt to regain control of the canal and forced Israeli withdrawal.

The question of President Eisenhower's health hung over the nation for a year before the November 1956 election. On September 24, 1955, the sixty-four-year-old president was stricken by a heart attack, which totally incapacitated him for a period of days and necessitated his hospitalization for almost two months. Republican leaders, who had confidently expected Eisenhower to seek (and easily win) reelection in 1956, suddenly faced the possibility that he might not be available. As the president gradually improved, party leaders, particularly GOP national chairman Leonard W. Hall, repeatedly urged him to run again despite his illness. After thorough physical examinations, Eisenhower on February 29, 1956, announced that he was convinced that his health would permit him to carry the “burdens of the Presidency” under a reduced work schedule and that he would seek reelection.

On June 8 the president was again hospitalized, this time with ileitis. He underwent successful surgery on June 9 and was once more hospitalized for several weeks. Again the possibility arose that he might not seek reelection. But on July 10 Eisenhower made it clear he would go ahead with his campaign for reelection.

Without the question of presidential illness, there would probably have been little doubt, at any time, that Ike could achieve reelection. The presidential illness, however, added an element of uncertainty to the entire campaign and made the Democratic nomination appear far more “worth having” than might otherwise have been the case.

The 1956 Campaigns

A familiar cast stepped forward to seek the Democratic presidential nomination: Adlai E. Stevenson, the 1952 nominee; Tennessee senator Estes Kefauver, the popular primary choice of 1952; and New York governor Averell Harriman. Senate majority leader Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas was supported for the nomination by several southern leaders, but he had little backing outside the South.

Early in the spring it appeared that Kefauver might again sweep the primaries. After winning the New Hampshire Democratic primary without opposition on March 13, he went on to pick up 56 percent of the vote in the March 20 Minnesota primary against Stevenson. The decisive contest came on June 5 in California, where both men had waged vigorous campaigns. The results: Stevenson, 1,139,964; Kefauver, 680,722. The Kefauver campaign limped along for a few more weeks. On July 26 Kefauver announced his withdrawal in favor of Stevenson.

When the Democratic National Convention met in Chicago on August 13, Stevenson and Harriman were the only two serious candidates for the nomination. Harriman's candidacy, discounted by most observers, received a boost when former president Truman on August 11 endorsed him. But in the vital contest for actual delegate votes, Stevenson, with Kefauver's support, was too far ahead to be stopped. On the first ballot on August 16 Stevenson was nominated with 905½ votes to 210 for Harriman, 80 for Johnson, and the remainder scattered.

Historically, the most significant event at the 1956 convention was the cliff-hanging decision about the Democratic vice-presidential nominee. Following his nomination, Stevenson made a brief appearance before the convention to tell the delegates he had decided “to depart from the precedents of the past.” He said “the selection of the vice-presidential nominee should be made through the free processes of this convention.”

After a stiff two-ballot contest, Kefauver, on August 17, narrowly won the vice-presidential nomination over Massachusetts senator John F. Kennedy. With 686½ votes required for nomination, Kennedy’s total moved as high as 648 at one point during the second ballot. But a series of vote switches gave the nomination to Kefauver, who had 755½ votes against 589 for Kennedy and 27½ scattered. Other unsuccessful aspirants for the vice-presidential nomination, all of whom received substantial first-ballot votes, were Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota, Sen. Albert Gore of Tennessee, and New York mayor Robert F. Wagner.

The vice-presidential fight marked Kennedy’s entry into presidential politics. The good showing that Kennedy had made, particularly in southern delegations, convinced his backers that despite his Roman Catholic faith Kennedy could be elected president.

The convention on August 16 adopted a platform including a compromise civil rights plank. It termed Supreme Court rulings “the law of the land” but made no specific pledge to apply the Court’s decisions and denounced the use of force to implement them. A move by a northern liberal group led by Gov. G. Mennen Williams of Michigan, Sen. Paul H. Douglas of Illinois, and Sen. Herbert H. Lehman of New York to insert a pledge to “carry out” the Court’s decisions, was defeated by voice vote on the convention floor.

On the Republican side from February 29, when Eisenhower announced he would seek a second term, there was no visible opposition to his renomination. Senate minority leader William F. Knowland, R-Calif., had previously announced his “provisional” candidacy, if Eisenhower were not to run, but Knowland quickly withdrew it. The president swept all the primaries where his name was entered.

With the GOP presidential nomination a foregone conclusion, interest centered on the Republican vice-presidential nomination. Eisenhower declined to make an early clear-cut endorsement of Richard Nixon for renomination as vice president and was reported to have suggested to Nixon that he consider a cabinet assignment or another government post, if Nixon planned to seek the GOP presidential nomination at a later date.

Presidential disarmament adviser Harold E. Stassen on July 25 attempted to spark a “stop Nixon” movement, claiming that Nixon’s presence on the ticket might cost Eisenhower as much as 6 percent of the vote in the fall and endanger Republican congressional campaigns. No major Republican leaders came forward to support Stassen and the stop-Nixon move quickly faded. At Eisenhower’s request Stassen actually ended by making a seconding speech for Nixon at the convention, which met in San Francisco August 20–23.

The convention adopted without dissent a platform pledging a “continuation of peace, prosperity and progress.” Threatened opposition to the civil rights plank evaporated after the Resolutions Committee modified an earlier and “stronger” version and proposed a plank acceptable to both northern and southern delegates.

The attack on Egypt and uprisings in Hungary and Poland dominated the news during the last weeks of the 1956 campaign, eclipsing domestic issues and changing the emphasis in international policy debates.

Early in the campaign Eisenhower boasted that his administration had offered, “in all levels of government,” an “honest” regime of “good judgment,” “tolerance,” and “conciliation.” The voters were asked to reelect him to keep the country “going down the straight road of prosperity and peace.” Vice President Nixon, answering Democratic criticisms of Eisenhower administration foreign policy, said the families of “157,000 Americans who were killed, wounded or missing in Korea” could testify “whether we have peace today.” Nixon said “the great majority of the American people have enjoyed the best four years of their lives under the Eisenhower Administration.”

Stevenson’s first approach was to challenge the effectiveness of Eisenhower’s executive leadership, putting forth his gospel of “the New America” under a Democratic Party that “can build as we have to build.” He criticized the administration for failing to pass school aid legislation and other vitally needed domestic programs. He said the administration had “pilloried innocent men and women under the pretense of conducting loyalty and security investigations.”

The tone of the campaign began to change as debate mounted over Stevenson’s proposals to end the draft and stop U.S. testing of hydrogen bombs. The Stevenson proposal to end the draft drew the reply from Eisenhower that he saw “no chance of ending the draft and carrying out the responsibilities for the security of the country.”

The debate was disturbed, however, by the beginning of the Hungarian uprising on October 23 and the Israeli attack on Egypt on October 29. Whatever the merits of the Stevenson proposals, they appeared to be badly timed in view of the international situation. Eisenhower again stressed that “we need our military draft for the safety of our nation” and that the country must have the “most advanced military weapons.” With war threatening both in the Mideast and in Eastern Europe, the general public reaction seemed to be that it was a bad time to change leaders, especially considering the president’s military background.

Results of the 1956 Elections

President Eisenhower was reelected with the largest popular vote in history and a plurality second only to that of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1936. Eisenhower came out with 35,590,472 votes (457 electoral votes) and Stevenson with 26,022,752 (73 electoral votes). Eisenhower's plurality was 9,567,720 votes.

In the North the president carried or ran unusually well in many urban areas formerly considered safe Democratic areas. More blacks voted Republican than in any election since pre-New Deal days. The only states where Eisenhower pluralities dropped from 1952 were several farm states where Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson and administration agricultural policies were highly unpopular.

The presidential election did not have the necessary coattail effect to give Republicans control of Congress. Although the returns indicated Ike's tremendous popularity with voters, the outcome for other offices made it clear that most citizens still identified their interests with those of the Democratic Party. For the first time since 1848 the winning presidential candidate was unable to carry at least one house of Congress for his party.

The Democrats amazingly maintained their 49–47 lead in the Senate, taking Republican seats in Colorado, Idaho, Ohio, and Pennsylvania to make up for their losses in New York, West Virginia, and Kentucky. Democratic senator Wayne Morse, the man whom the Republicans had wanted most to defeat, won over former secretary of the interior Douglas McKay. Newly elected senators included Thruston B. Morton, R-Ky.; Joseph S. Clark, D-Pa.; Jacob K. Javits, R-N.Y.; Frank Church, D-Idaho; and Frank J. Lausche, D-Ohio.

In the House the Democrats added to the twenty-nine-seat margin they had achieved in 1954, bringing their ranks to 234 as against 201 Republicans.

The Democrats made a net gain of one new governorship for a new 28–20 balance in their favor. Important Democratic gubernatorial victories included two in normally Republican farm states: Herschel C. Loveless in Iowa and George Docking in Kansas. Other Democrats winning previously held Republican governorships were Foster Furcolo in Massachusetts and Robert D. Holmes in Oregon. Republicans winning Democratic gubernatorial seats were C. William O'Neill in Ohio, Cecil Underwood in West Virginia, and Edwin L. Mechem in New Mexico.

1957–1959: The Eighty-Fifth Congress

The first two years of Eisenhower's second term in office were marked by two major events, one domestic and one foreign, in fall 1957. On September 4 a controversy over admission of black students to the previously all-white Central High School in Little Rock, Arkansas, reached a showdown as the National Guard, ordered out by Gov. Orval Faubus, prevented the black students from entering the school. A federal court on September 21 ordered removal of the National Guard. But when the black students reentered the school two days later, they were ordered to leave by local authorities because of fear of mob violence. Eisenhower then ordered federal troops sent into Little Rock to enforce the court's order, and the school began operation on an integrated basis.

The spectacle of angry, racist crowds in the face of fixed bayonets rioting to prevent black children from entering the school shocked the world. The scene was offset in part by the use of federal troops to enforce the constitutional rights of U.S. citizens. Throughout the South, however, the reaction was one of bitterness toward Eisenhower for using troops to enforce a deeply resented Supreme Court decision.

The second major event in fall 1957 was the Soviet Union's successful launching, on October 4, of the first manufactured satellite, Sputnik I, into an orbit around the world. Congress and the nation responded with anger, frustration, and alarm, directed chiefly at the Eisenhower administration because it had not pressed the U.S. effort to beat the Soviets into outer space and because it showed, at least initially, little concern about the Soviet achievement. More profound concern developed about the quality of U.S. education, especially in scientific fields. The first successful U.S. satellite, Explorer I, was launched by the Army from Cape Canaveral, Florida, on January 31, 1958.

Other major international events in 1957 and 1958 included:

- On March 25, 1957, the Common Market (European Economic Community) and Euratom (European Atomic Energy Community) treaties were signed in Rome by France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Luxembourg, Italy, and West Germany. These treaties were significant steps toward the U.S.-supported goal of a united Europe.
- Vice President and Mrs. Nixon narrowly escaped injury from Communist-inspired riots while on a goodwill tour in Caracas, Venezuela, on May 13, 1957.
- Great Britain exploded its first hydrogen bomb, May 15, 1957.
- Former premier Georgii M. Malenkov, former foreign minister V.M. Molotov, and L.M. Kaganovich were purged by the Soviet Presidium under Nikita Khrushchev's leadership, July 3–4, 1957, for alleged pro-Stalinist activities. On March 27, 1958, Chairman Khrushchev completed solidification of power by succeeding Nikolai A. Bulganin as premier.
- Charles de Gaulle became head of the French government on June 1, 1958, averting threatened civil war.

- At the request of the Lebanese government, U.S. Marines were dispatched to Lebanon on July 15, 1958, to forestall a threatened effort by Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's United Arab Republic and the Soviet Union to overthrow Lebanon's pro-Western regime. U.S. troops withdrew in August after calm was restored.
- In fall 1958 the United States and the Soviet Union began a three-and-one-half-year unpoliced moratorium on nuclear weapons tests.

Major domestic events included the development of the most serious postwar recession, in mid-1957 and lasting through 1958; a stroke suffered by President Eisenhower November 25, 1957, from which he was pronounced "completely recovered" on March 1, 1958; and the resignation of Sherman Adams, assistant to the president. Adams's resignation in September 1958 followed revelations before a House subcommittee that he had interceded with various federal agencies in behalf of his friend, Boston industrialist Bernard Goldfine, and that he had received gifts from Goldfine. The Goldfine-Adams episode hurt the Eisenhower administration on the corruption-in-government issue and was one of several elements contributing to the Democratic sweep in the 1958 congressional and gubernatorial elections.

The Eighty-fifth Congress established a record of moderate productivity, all its chief enactments bearing the "middle-of-the-road" stamp that was the natural result of compromise between a "mildly conservative" president and the "mildly liberal" congressional leadership of House Speaker Sam Rayburn and Senate majority leader Lyndon B. Johnson, both of Texas.

The mounting recession pushed the federal budget increasingly into the red, with a $2.8 billion deficit in fiscal 1958 and a $12.4 billion deficit for the fiscal 1959 budget, approved in mid-1958.

In foreign policy the Senate in 1957 approved the International Atomic Energy treaty (stemming from President Eisenhower's Atoms for Peace program). During its first session, Congress approved the Mideast Resolution (Eisenhower Doctrine), in response to the president's request for advance authority to use U.S. troops to protect free Middle East nations from "overt armed aggression" by "power hungry Communists." During the second session, Congress acceded readily to the president's request for authority to extend financial aid and technical assistance to the newly formed European Atomic Energy Community.

A military reorganization bill was approved by Congress in 1958. This bill eliminated the "separately administered" provision for army, navy, and air force written into the 1947 National Security Act and made it clear that the three military departments were to operate under the direction and control of the secretary of defense. Legislation passed in July 1958 established a civilian-controlled National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA). Both houses organized permanent standing committees on space matters.

The major domestic bill passed in 1957 was the Civil Rights Act. The bill created the executive Commission on Civil Rights and empowered the attorney general to seek injunctions when individuals are denied the right to vote. With strengthening amendments in succeeding years, this legislation gave more and more black citizens the power of the ballot, viewed by the bill's advocates as the foundation of most other civil liberties.

The most notable accomplishment of Congress's 1958 session was passage and signature by the president of the Alaska statehood bill, culminating decades of pressure to admit the territory to the Union.

Other important actions of the second session included emergency housing and highway construction legislation to help stem the recession; passage of the National Defense Education Act of 1958, including $295 million for loans to needy college students; the Transportation Act of 1958, designed to revive the failing railroads; and passage of a low-support farm bill with few controls generally in line with administration proposals.

Under the leadership of Democratic national party chairman Paul M. Butler, a policy-making Democratic Advisory Committee was organized in November 1956 and became the chief voice for the militantly liberal Democratic point of view. It made sharp partisan attacks on the Eisenhower administration. Democratic congressional leaders Rayburn and Johnson had been asked to join but instead actively opposed it, expressing a preference for policy formulation through regular Democratic congressional leadership channels. Many of the committee's statements reflected severe criticism of the Democratic congressional leadership for alleged lack of sufficiently aggressive opposition to the Eisenhower administration. (The committee was eventually abolished in March 1961 after the Democratic takeover of the White House. The new Democratic national party chairman, John M. Bailey, said the committee had "served a function" only when the party was out of power.)

The 1958 Midterm Elections

The swing of the political pendulum against the Republicans and in favor of the Democrats was apparent as early as mid-1957. It ended November 25, 1958, with a clean Democratic sweep in Alaska's first election as a state. The over-all national result was the most thorough Democratic victory since the Roosevelt landslide year of 1936.

In August 1957 Democrat William Proxmire easily won the Wisconsin Senate seat of the late Republican senator Joseph R. McCarthy, who had died May 2 of the same year. In the November 1957 off-year elections the Democrats reelected New Jersey Democratic governor Robert B. Meyner by a plurality of nearly 200,000 votes, also scoring important victories in Virginia and New York. In the Maine elections on September 8, 1958, the Democrats swept that normally Republican state, electing a Democratic governor, a Democratic senator, and two Democratic representatives.

The Republicans began the 1958 campaign with a number of handicaps. The Adams-Goldfine incident had been a source of profound embarrassment for the Eisenhower administration, only partly relieved by Adams's resignation in September. Although recovery from the 1957–1958 recession was already under way, the recession had served to weaken seriously voter confidence in the Eisenhower prosperity formula. Another crisis in the Formosa Strait, with renewed Communist China shelling of Quemoy and Matsu, reminded voters that the administration had yet to find a solution for the China problem. Sputnik had weakened voter confidence in the Eisenhower administration's defense and space programs.

In many states the Republicans backed ballot initiative proposals for right-to-work laws that were bitterly opposed by organized labor. This inspired labor to work particularly hard to get its members out to vote: against right-to-work and for Democrats. A major portion of the blame for Republican debacles in states such as Ohio and California was attributed to GOP right-to-work stands. Still another incident harming the Republicans was deep southern resentment against Eisenhower's ordering of paratroops into Little Rock in 1957. This effectively curtailed Republican efforts for new inroads in the South.

In the campaign the Democrats charged that the Republicans had callously allowed the country to slip into a serious recession, showing little regard for the interests of the unemployed. Adlai Stevenson on October 18 said that the crises over Quemoy, desegregation, education, and recession "could have been avoided if we had an administration which thought in advance instead of waiting placidly on the fairways until the mortal danger is upon us and then angrily calling out the Marines." "The tragedy of the Eisenhower Administration," Stevenson said, "is that its only weapons seem to be platitudes or paratroops."

Alarmed by the apparent Democratic inroads, the Republicans held an October 6 White House strategy session that produced a manifesto declaring that if a new Democratic Congress were elected, "we are certain to go down the left lane which leads inseparably to socialism." In Baltimore, on October 31, Eisenhower used such terms as "political free spenders," "gloomdogger," and "extremist" to describe his Democratic opponents.

House Speaker Rayburn on November 1 predicted that a new Democratic-controlled Congress would not fight the president despite "desperation" oratory in which Rayburn said Eisenhower went "pretty far in accusing us of being radicals and left-wingers." Rayburn said that "in the past about 85 percent of the time Eisenhower's programs were just an extension of Democratic principles....not going to hate Eisenhower bad enough for us to change our principles."

Much of the hard campaigning for Republican candidates throughout the country was done by Vice President Nixon. On October 21 Nixon said that the Democratic Party was split between "essentially moderate" Democratic leaders in Congress and the group "which presently controls the Democratic National Committee, which is radical in its approach to economic problems (and) bitterly partisan in its criticism of the Eisenhower foreign policy."

As the campaign progressed, the Republicans came under increasingly heavy Democratic fire for being antilabor. Eisenhower and Nixon refused to endorse the right-to-work laws, but the president called for legislation to let workers “free themselves of their corrupt labor bosses who have betrayed their trust.”

In reply to the potent Democratic “missile gap” issue of allegedly slow U.S. progress in rockets and missiles, Eisenhower repeatedly declared that no more than $1 million had been spent on development of long-range missiles in any year before he became president, but that “the so-called missile gap is being rapidly filled.”

Results of the 1958 Elections

As election returns poured in during the evening of November 4, it was clear that the Democratic tide had engulfed Republicans in virtually every area of the nation. Including the November 25 Alaska election, the results showed a new Senate of sixty-four Democrats and thirty-four Republicans, a Democratic gain of fifteen seats and a Republican loss of thirteen from the 49–47 Democratic edge in 1956. Democrats gained seats in California (where Republicans were embroiled in internecine fights and the right-to-work issue), Connecticut, Indiana, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Nevada, New Jersey, Ohio, Utah, West Virginia (two seats), and Wyoming, and took the two new seats from Alaska, which became a state January 3, 1959.

The new Democratic senators included Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota, Thomas J. Dodd of Connecticut, Clair Engle of California, Harrison A. Williams Jr. of New Jersey, and Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia. New Republicans elected to the Senate were Kenneth B. Keating of New York and Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania.

In the House there were 282 Democrats, forty-eight more than the previous Congress's total and the highest figure since the 1936 elections. Republicans slipped from 201 to 154 seats. Republican House losses were heaviest in the Midwest, where twenty-three seats were lost (many in the traditional Republican heartland), and in the East, where twenty were lost. Only two incumbent Democratic House members were defeated: Rep. Coya Knutson of Minnesota, evidently as a result of her marital difficulties, and Rep. Brooks Hays of Arkansas, a moderate on racial issues defeated on a write-in vote by Dale Alford, a Democratic archsegregationist in Arkansas's Fifth (Little Rock) District.

In gubernatorial races there was a net switch of five governorships, plus the new Alaska governorship, to the Democrats for a new total of thirty-five Democratic and fourteen Republican governors. Important Democratic gubernatorial victories included Edmund G. Brown in California (over Senate minority leader William F. Knowland); Michael V. DiSalle in Ohio; Ralph G. Brooks in Nebraska; Ralph Herseth in South Dakota; Gaylord A. Nelson in Wisconsin; and J. Millard Tawes in Maryland. Democrats also reelected Gov. Abraham A. Ribicoff in Connecticut by a record majority and reelected Democratic governor George Docking in traditionally Republican Kansas.

The brightest spot in the entire picture for the Republicans was Nelson A. Rockefeller's New York victory over incumbent governor Averell Harriman by a 573,034-vote margin. Republicans also won the Oregon governorship with Mark Hatfield and the Rhode Island governorship with Christopher Del Sesto.

1959–1961: The Eighty-Sixth Congress

Relations between the United States and the Soviet Union dominated the international news, running the gamut from cordial to extremely bitter during 1959–1960. In November 1958 Soviet premier Nikita S. Khrushchev had demanded an end to the four-power occupation of Berlin and threatened to turn control of Allied supply lines to West Berlin over to East Germany, asking that Berlin be made into a demilitarized “free city.” The Soviet Union set May 27, 1959, as the deadline for the end of the occupation of Berlin. An international crisis, threatening atomic war, appeared to develop over the ensuing months. But when the Big Four foreign ministers sat down for consultations in Paris the following May, the Soviet deadline had been lifted and no changes in the Berlin status quo evolved.

Meanwhile, President Eisenhower had lost his key foreign policy adviser when Secretary of State John Foster Dulles was stricken by cancer early in 1959. Dulles resigned by April 15 and died on May 24. Undersecretary Christian A. Herter, former Massachusetts representative and governor, succeeded Dulles.

A period of moderation in U.S.-Soviet relations followed. Vice President Nixon on July 22 left for a thirteen-day tour of the Soviet Union. Nixon received a friendly reception by Russian crowds. In September, at Eisenhower's invitation, Khrushchev visited the United States for consultations with the president and a transcontinental tour. But the 1959 “spirit of Camp David” failed to result in a lasting thaw in the cold war.

In May 1960, just before a scheduled Big Four summit conference in Paris, the Soviet Union announced that an American plane had been shot down over its territory. The United States at first said no violation of Soviet air space had been intended. After Khrushchev revealed that the pilot of the U-2 reconnaissance plane had confessed to being on an intelligence-gathering flight for the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, Secretary of State Herter admitted that the United States had engaged in “extensive aerial surveillance of the USSR.” President Eisenhower took full responsibility for the flights, terming them a “distasteful but vital necessity.”

When the Big Four met May 16, Khrushchev denounced the “spy flight” and demanded a U.S. apology and punishment of responsible officials before the summit conference could continue. He withdrew an already-accepted invitation to Eisenhower to visit the Soviet Union in June 1960. Eisenhower said the flights had been discontinued and would not begin again, but he refused to accept Khrushchev's ultimatum. The conference collapsed, and leaders withdrew to their capitals amid mutual recriminations.

The incident weakened the confidence of many voters in the Republicans' skill in handling foreign affairs. Some observers later speculated that if there had been no U-2 incident, and if the summit conference and the Eisenhower trip to the Soviet Union had proceeded as planned, the country might have been in no mood to replace the Republican hold on the White House in the November elections.

Other important international developments in 1959 and 1960 included the following:

- Fidel Castro assumed power in Cuba after collapse of the Batista dictatorship on January 1, 1959. Communist influence and control over the Castro revolution became increasingly evident in the succeeding years.
- A revolt by the Tibetan people against Chinese Communist rule was crushed in March 1959.
- Eisenhower made goodwill visits to Europe, Asia, and Africa in December 1959, to Latin America in February-March 1960, and to the East Asia in early summer 1960. Leftist riots in Japan protesting the new U.S.-Japanese treaty of mutual security and cooperation forced Eisenhower to cancel plans to include that country in his East Asian Tour.
- The French tested their first nuclear device in the Sahara, February 13, 1960.
- The Belgian Congo gained independence, becoming the Republic of the Congo on June 30, 1960; soon thereafter the country was plunged into civil war, resulting in UN intervention in July 1960.

On the domestic front heavy Democratic majorities in the Eighty-sixth Congress failed to produce the kind of pro-labor, liberal legislation for which many observers had seen a mandate in the 1958 election returns. The two major accomplishments of Congress—Hawaiian statehood and a labor reform law—were in fact just as much administration as Democratic bills.

Statehood for Hawaii, signed into law March 18, 1959, after fifty-nine years of territorial status for the one-time island kingdom, added a fiftieth state to the Union on August 21, 1959. The new state elected the nation's first two representatives of Chinese and Japanese ancestry: Sen. Hiram L. Fong, a Republican, and Rep. Daniel K. Inouye, a Democrat.

In the waning days of the 1959 session, Congress passed a "strong" labor regulation law (the Landrum-Griffin bill), which contained major Taft-Hartley Act amendments favored by business and opposed by organized labor. The continuing exposure of union corruption and labor-management collusion by the Senate Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field had produced a deluge of letters, telegrams, and editorials calling for action.

The relatively mild Kennedy bill for labor regulation was passed by the Senate April 25. The House, on August 13, by a 229–201 roll call, approved a tougher measure, the Landrum-Griffin bill, which incorporated important Taft-Hartley reforms sought by President Eisenhower. The vote was a major victory for Eisenhower and the House Republican leadership under the newly chosen minority leader, Charles A. Halleck of Indiana. It was a defeat for House Speaker Sam Rayburn, who preferred a milder measure. Most of Landrum-Griffin was incorporated in the conference committee compromise.

Determined to prevent adoption of expensive domestic programs suggested by liberal Democrats, Eisenhower sought to dramatize the issue of "spending" in his press conferences and other public utterances. Grassroots response was so positive that he was able to galvanize the Republican minority and invigorate the Republican-southern Democratic coalition, preventing passage of most liberal measures and rallying sufficient strength to sustain his vetoes of all but a handful of those that did pass. Thus Democratic proposals for a wide program of aid for school construction and teachers' salaries, for a massive area redevelopment program, for an increased minimum wage, and for medical care for the aged under Social Security all came to naught.

During 1960, however, the liberals found a new issue on which to base their call for increased social welfare legislation: the need for a rapid rate of growth in the national economy. The issue of economic growth developed too late to assist in passage of liberal measures in the Eighty-sixth Congress, but it provided campaign fodder for Democratic nominee John F. Kennedy in the 1960 presidential campaign.

The failure of many important domestic bills to clear Congress was largely attributed to the continuing party division between the executive and legislative branches and the approaching presidential elections. In 1959, for instance, the Senate took time out for a long and bitter debate that ended in rejection of the president's nomination of Lewis L. Strauss to be secretary of commerce. In 1960 a $750 million pay raise for federal employees was passed over the president's veto. Scanting victory in the upcoming elections, Democrats refused to pass a bill creating thirty-five badly needed new federal judgeships.

After long debate over the "missile gap" and the general adequacy of the nation's defense effort, Congress passed the president's defense budget with few overall changes in 1959 but in 1960 added $600 million more than Eisenhower had requested. The missile gap became a major issue in the 1960 presidential campaign, only to recede as an apparent mirage early in 1961.

During the postconvention session of Congress that began August 8, 1960, Democratic presidential candidate John F. Kennedy, a Massachusetts senator, and his running mate, Senate majority leader Lyndon B. Johnson, failed in their efforts to complete action on major Democratic legislation planks. The Senate approved the Kennedy minimum wage bill, but the measure died when House conferees refused to budge from their own truncated version. Medical care for the aged under the Social Security system—a second “must” bill—was rejected by the Senate, and a school construction bill expired when the House Rules Committee refused to send it to conference. As Congress adjourned September 1 and the campaign began in earnest, Republicans made the most of their opponents’ plight.

The 1960 Campaigns

The Twenty-second Amendment to the Constitution, placing a two-term limitation on the presidency, meant that Eisenhower was ineligible to seek reelection in 1960. Adlai E. Stevenson’s record of two defeats for the presidency appeared to preclude him from being the choice as the Democrats’ candidate, barring a convention deadlock. Thus both parties were faced with the prospect of coming up with new nominees in 1960. For the Republicans the choice appeared relatively easy since Vice President Richard Nixon had been in the public eye for eight full years. Nixon had been an extremely active vice president, he was a tireless campaigner for GOP candidates, and he had strong support in Republican organizations throughout the country. For the Democrats the choice was more difficult because no members of the party had clearly established themselves as leaders of presidential stature.

In a departure from the American tendency to select governors for presidential nominees, all four chief contenders for the Democratic nomination were senators. In order of their announcements they were Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota, John F. Kennedy of Massachusetts, Stuart Symington of Missouri, and Majority Leader Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas. Of these four, only Kennedy and Humphrey chose to campaign in the primaries. In the end the primaries were the decisive factor in Kennedy’s victory.

Symington dismissed primary contests as useless and Johnson maintained that he could not carry out his Senate duties properly and simultaneously run in numerous individual primaries. (Congressional Quarterly 1960 Senate Voting Participation scores showed an average of 80 percent for all Democrats. Kennedy scored 35 percent, Humphrey 49 percent; both campaigned extensively during the session. Symington scored 58 percent, and Johnson, 95 percent.)

The issue of Kennedy’s religion dominated much of the preconvention and general-election debate and speculation about his chances. Not since 1928, when the Democrats nominated Alfred E. Smith of New York for the presidency, had a Roman Catholic headed a national ticket. Smith had been resoundingly defeated, with many normally Democratic but heavily Protestant states going against him, although considerations other than religion, perhaps equally important, ran against Smith. In the intervening years Roman Catholics had become a far larger segment of the population than before (16 percent in 1928; 22.8 percent by 1960, with especially large concentrations in the urban areas in the biggest states). The consensus was that the nation had become far more tolerant in its religious outlook.

The spring primaries produced a string of unbroken victories for Kennedy. Unopposed, he piled up an impressive 43,372 vote total in the early-bird New Hampshire primary March 8. In May Humphrey withdrew after the West Virginia primary, leaving Symington and Johnson as opponents for Kennedy. Just before the convention it appeared that Stevenson might reenter the race.

At the Democratic National Convention, which opened in Los Angeles on July 11, Kennedy won on the first ballot. After conferring with Democratic leaders, he announced that Lyndon B. Johnson would be his running mate. Most observers were surprised that Johnson, powerful Senate majority leader and almost ten years Kennedy’s senior, would accept the nomination. Most party liberals expressed consternation at Kennedy’s selection. Later it became evident that Johnson’s presence on the ticket was probably an essential element in holding most of the South behind Kennedy and achieving Democratic victory in one of the closest presidential elections in U.S. history.

Without any significant opposition, Nixon breezed through the primaries and at the Republican National Convention was nominated July 27, receiving 1,321 votes to ten for Barry Goldwater. He selected UN ambassador and former Massachusetts senator Henry Cabot Lodge Jr. as his running mate.

By election day, November 8, Kennedy had covered 75,000 miles and visited forty-six states, while Nixon had traveled more than 60,000 miles and appeared in all fifty states. Speaking as often as a dozen times a day, both candidates were seen and heard by millions of voters, in person as well as on radio and television, in what may have been the most talkative as well as the most expensive campaign on record at the time.

The central issue, Kennedy asserted time and again, was the need for strong presidential leadership to reverse the nation’s declining prestige abroad and lagging economy at home. Arguing that the position of the United States relative to that of the Soviets had deteriorated under the Eisenhower administration, he called for a stepped-up defense effort and an enlarged federal role in a wide variety of fields at home and abroad “to get America moving again.”

In an unprecedented series of face-to-face encounters, candidates Kennedy and Nixon appeared on four nationally televised, hour-long programs during which they were questioned by panels of journalists and permitted to rebut each other's answers. The time was provided free of charge by the networks when Congress suspended the equal time provision of the Communications Act for the duration of the 1960 campaign. The audiences for the four debates were estimated by the Arbitron rating service at 70 to 75 million, 61 million, 65 million, and 64 million, respectively.

Republicans generally were dismayed by Nixon's appearance on the first debate, blaming it on poor lighting and their candidate's unaggressive stance, but they found little fault with the remaining three programs. Democrats regarded all the debates as highly successful on grounds that they served to demolish the GOP theme of Kennedy's "immaturity" and to project his personality to millions of undecided voters, many of whom were disturbed by his Catholic faith.

Results of the 1960 Elections

On election day 68,838,219 Americans—the largest number up to that time—cast ballots for president. Kennedy emerged the victor with a solid majority in the electoral college. But his popular-vote plurality over Nixon was only 118,574 votes, the smallest vote margin thus far in the twentieth century. In eleven states—eight won by Kennedy, three by Nixon—a shift of less than 1 percent of the vote would have switched the state's electoral votes.

The Kennedy-Johnson ticket carried twenty-three states with 303 electoral votes. They put together a coalition of eastern states (including New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey), central industrial states (Illinois, Michigan, and Minnesota) and several of the traditionally Democratic southern states (including Johnson's own Texas) that was sufficient to win, despite loss of almost the entire West and farm belt and several southern states.

Democrats maintained their heavy majorities in Congress and among the nation's governors in 1960, but Republicans were able to make some important gains, especially in the House of Representatives. Republican gains, taking place in the face of a victory for Democratic candidate Kennedy, appeared due in part to the return of normally Republican seats to the GOP to offset the serious losses suffered by Republicans in the 1958 Democratic sweep.

The continued heavy Democratic congressional majority, especially in the Senate, made it appear unlikely that Republicans would be able to regain control of Congress at any time during President-elect Kennedy's first term in the White House.

The Republicans made a gain of two Senate seats, replacing Democrats in Delaware and Wyoming. Despite advance predictions of possible trouble for Republican Senate incumbents in Massachusetts and New Jersey, both were able to withstand the Kennedy tide in those states.

Democrats held their seats in Minnesota, Missouri, Michigan, and Montana, where Republican challengers ran energetic campaigns. The new Senate balance was sixty-four Democrats and thirty-six Republicans.

The Republican Senate gain was reduced when Senator-elect Keith Thomson, R-Wyo., died on December 9 and was replaced by Democrat J. J. Hickey. But the Senate balance returned to 64–36 in May 1961, when Republican John Tower won the Texas Senate seat vacated by Lyndon B. Johnson, the new vice president.

In House elections Republicans made a net gain of twenty seats. The new House had 263 Democrats and 174 Republicans, as compared to a 283–154 balance in the previous Congress.

In contrast to most presidential elections, the victory of the national Democratic ticket did not appear to play an important part in most congressional contests. If Kennedy coattails existed at all, they were probably evident in New York, which he carried by a wide margin and where three incumbent GOP representatives were defeated; in Connecticut, where Democrats held two close seats; and in New Jersey, where one Republican seat went Democratic. All other Democratic House gains appeared to be the result of special local conditions.

The most important Republican congressional gains came in the Midwest, where Nixon ran a strong race. Widespread and deep-seated anti-Catholic sentiment, combined with a marked cooling off of the farm issue, which hurt midwestern Republicans so badly in 1958, appeared to form the basis of much of the increased Republican midwestern strength in both presidential and local races.

Many Republican gains, which came through midwestern farm states but also in Connecticut, Maine, Ohio, Vermont, Oregon, and Pennsylvania, seemed to mark the return to the GOP fold of traditionally Republican congressional districts, which had gone Democratic in 1958 in a temporary protest against Republican policies.

In gubernatorial races the Democrats captured seven seats from the Republicans, and the Republicans captured six from the Democrats. The new lineup was thirty-four Democrats to sixteen Republicans, a net gain of one for the Democrats. Among the governors elected were Democrats Otto Kerner of Illinois, Matthew E. Welsh of Indiana, John B. Swainson of Michigan, and Frank B. Morrison of Nebraska. Republican governors elected included John A. Volpe of Massachusetts, Elmer L. Andersen of Minnesota, Norman A. Erbe of Iowa, and John Anderson Jr. of Kansas.

Hopes were high, both in America and abroad, when John F. Kennedy took office as president January 20, 1961. In his inaugural address Kennedy called on Americans and all free people "to bear the burden of a long twilight struggle...

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS WHO BECAME PRESIDENT

From James Madison to Barack Obama, twenty-five presidents have served previously in the House of Representatives, or the Senate, or both.

Following is a list of these presidents and the chambers in which they served. Three other presidents—George Washington, John Adams, and Thomas Jefferson—had served in the Continental Congress, as had James Madison and James Monroe.

James A. Garfield was elected to the Senate in January 1880 for a term beginning March 4, 1881, but declined to accept in December 1880 because he had been elected president. John Quincy Adams served in the House for seventeen years after his term as president, and Andrew Johnson after his presidency returned to the Senate five months before he died.

against the common enemies of man: tyranny, poverty, disease and war itself.” Kennedy urged Americans: “Ask not what your country can do for you—ask what you can do for your country.”

Some of this idealism was translated into specific programs and action during the next two years. Kennedy established the Peace Corps, sending young Americans to underdeveloped nations, to provide trained personnel for development projects. Fulfilling another campaign promise, Kennedy got congressional approval of a U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. On March 14, 1961, the president announced an Alliance for Progress with the countries of Latin America, under which the United States would step up aid to the other Americas but expect to see political and social reforms to guarantee true democracy and promote stability and progress in those countries.

In the domestic field, several items of “liberal” legislation that had failed passage because of a stalemate between President Eisenhower and a Democratic Congress were enacted into law. Chief among these were a hike in the minimum wage to $1.25, a subsidy program for economically distressed areas in the United States, widening of Social Security benefits, a $4.88 billion omnibus housing bill, stepped-up federal aid to localities to battle water pollution, and a vastly increased public works program.

The first two years of Kennedy’s term, however, contained disappointments, both foreign and domestic. In January 1961 the administration had high hopes of a period of relaxed tensions with the Soviet world. Congratulating Kennedy on his election, Soviet premier Nikita S. Khrushchev had expressed the “hope that while you are at this post the relations between our countries will again follow the line along which they were developing in Franklin Roosevelt’s time.” Khrushchev made specific mention of chances for early conclusion of a nuclear test ban treaty and a German peace treaty. During the first week of Kennedy’s presidency, the Soviet government freed two U.S. Air Force RB-47 pilots who had been held in the Soviet Union since their plane was downed off Soviet shores in July 1960. But the optimism of January 1961 seemed more like overconfidence by late 1961 as the tide of events continued to run almost consistently against the nation’s foreign policy objectives.

On April 17, 1961, 1,200 Cuban refugees—recruited, trained, and supplied by the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency—landed ninety miles south of Havana; their announced goal was to overthrow the Communist-oriented regime of Fidel Castro. Within three days the invasion had been crushed, inflicting a disastrous blow to American prestige and to that of the new president.

Kennedy met with Khrushchev June 3–4, 1961, in Vienna. At this summit conference Khrushchev made clear his determination to sign a peace treaty with the East German Communist regime, a move long interpreted in the West as part of the effort to force the Western powers out of West Berlin. The Vienna confrontation convinced Kennedy that it was time to muster public support in behalf of a “firm stand” in Berlin. In a July 25 televised report to the nation, he called for an immediate buildup of U.S. and NATO forces along with an extra $3.5 billion in U.S. defense funds. Congress promptly granted his requests.

Khrushchev’s reply was to threaten Soviet mobilization and to boast that the Soviets could build a hundred-megaton nuclear warhead. Much more damaging to the West, however, was the Communists’ unexpected action on August 13 in sealing off the border between East and West Berlin. The wall virtually stopped the large flow of refugees from East to West that had bled the Communist regime of much of its most valuable personnel during the postwar years.

Adding immeasurably to the tension over Berlin was the Soviet announcement on August 30, 1961, that it would break the three-year voluntary moratorium on testing of nuclear weapons because of the “ever increasing aggressiveness of the policy of the NATO military bloc.” The Soviet test series began September 1 and concluded in November 1961. Their tests completed, the Soviets returned to the test ban negotiations in Geneva on November 28. The United States, however, refused to reimpose an uncontrolled moratorium on itself and, between April 25 and November 4, 1962, carried out a series of tests underground and in the atmosphere.

Two southeast Asian nations, Laos and Vietnam, were thorny problems for the new administration. Fearful that a Communist takeover of Laos would make the Western position in Vietnam untenable, the administration supported establishment of a “neutral” government in Laos, in the hope that the tiny kingdom could serve as a buffer. In Vietnam increased Communist guerrilla activity forced increased commitment of U.S. military “advisers,” who soon found themselves in the thick of military engagements.

Cuba, however, remained the chief foreign policy problem of the administration. The Castro regime became increasingly identified as a Soviet satellite and was expelled from the Organization of American States. During summer 1962 Soviet arms began to pour into Cuba. On October 22 President Kennedy told the American people in a radio-television address that U.S. aerial surveillance of the Soviet military buildup in Cuba had produced “unmistakable evidence” that “a series of offensive missile sites is now in preparation on that imprisoned island. The purpose of these bases can be none other than to provide a nuclear strike capacity against the Western Hemisphere.”

As countermeasures the president announced “a strict quarantine on all offensive military equipment under shipment to Cuba” and said that U.S. ships would begin checking incoming shipments to the island. He called on the Soviet leader to withdraw his offensive weapons from Cuba.

For several days the Soviets continued preparation of their missile sites, and the world wondered whether it might be plunged into war. On October 27 Khrushchev, apparently unwilling to take the ultimate risk, sent a note to Kennedy in which he agreed to remove the offensive weapons systems from Cuba under UN observation and supervision in return for removal of the U.S. quarantine and agreement not to launch an invasion of the islands.

In succeeding weeks the removal of the bases took place at a relatively rapid rate. Castro, however, blocked UN inspection, and the United States never formalized its agreement not to invade Cuba. Thousands of Soviet troops and technical personnel remained on the island, along with a heavy array of “defensive” weapons.

Kennedy’s chief domestic problem during his first two years in office was the lagging condition of the U.S.

economy. The new administration made clear its commitment to a general monetary and fiscal policy aimed at the inducement of economic growth, even at the price of heavy federal budget deficits. Federal expenditures rose from $81.5 billion in fiscal 1961 to $87.8 billion in fiscal 1962 and $94.3 billion in estimated figures for fiscal 1963. The federal deficit rose from $3.8 billion in 1961 to $6.4 billion in 1962 and dropped slightly to $6.2 billion for fiscal 1963.

Aided in part by the sharply increased federal expenditures under Kennedy, the 1960 recession tapered off by mid-1961. But the basic underlying problems remained.

Although President Kennedy had himself served in the House for six years and in the Senate for eight, relations between his administration and Congress were far from ideal. The change in Democratic leadership in both houses, some congressional apprehension about use of political power by the new administration, and a continuing “conservative coalition” between Republicans and southern Democrats all tended to slow down if not wreck parts of the Kennedy program.

Most apparent and serious was the shift in leadership. The elevation of Lyndon B. Johnson to the vice presidency removed one of the strongest majority leaders in the history of the Senate. He was succeeded by Sen. Mike Mansfield, D-Mont., a mild-mannered man who lacked Johnson’s drive.

On November 16, 1961, House Speaker Sam Rayburn, D-Texas, died of cancer. Rayburn had been a member of the House for almost forty-nine years and had served as Speaker for seventeen years (twice interrupted by brief periods of Republican majorities). Any successor would have faced difficulties in filling the shoes of “Mr. Sam,” a man who understood the House and, until his later years, could draw together the disparate elements of his party with remarkable success. John W. McCormack of Massachusetts, elevated from the majority leadership to be Speaker, faced the unenviable task of succeeding Rayburn. His first year in office was considered a qualified success.

The Eighty-seventh Congress ended on an acrimonious note. A year-long feud between the House and Senate on procedural issues regarding appropriation bills was symptomatic of a broader rift between the two chambers that had been growing for several years. The dispute held up several fund bills for months (well beyond July 1, the start of the new fiscal year) and helped prolong the 1962 session to October 13. Not since the Korean War year of 1951 had a session lasted until so late in the autumn.

During the ensuing months increasing discussion was heard of the need to modernize and streamline congressional procedures.

The 1962 Midterm Elections

The Kennedy administration entered the 1962 campaign determined to reinforce the narrow margin by which the president had been elected in 1960 and to prevent serious losses in Democratic congressional strength. The off-year elections of 1961 had produced mixed results. In a May 1961 special election in Texas the Democrats had lost the Senate seat vacated by Vice President Johnson to Republican John Tower. Not since Reconstruction days in the 1870s had Texas sent a Republican to the Senate.

But in the November 1961 elections, Democrat Richard J. Hughes, aided by a personal appearance on his behalf by President Kennedy, won the New Jersey governorship against Republican James P. Mitchell, secretary of labor in the Eisenhower administration. Mayor Robert F. Wagner, a political ally of the president, easily won reelection in New York City. The administration felt confident that with sufficient presidential campaigning, the party could fare well in the 1962 elections.

Kennedy set the tone for the 1962 battle in a July 23 press conference. Declaring that the congressional Republicans were almost wholly negative on domestic social legislation, he said that he would go all-out to defeat them in the fall campaign. Kennedy said a Democratic gain of one or two Senate seats and five or ten House seats would make it possible to enact controversial administration bills in such fields as Medicare, public works, mass transit, and urban affairs. He said the 1962 elections would give the American people a “clear” choice: to “anchor down” by voting Republican or to “sail” by voting Democratic.

In midsummer the president began to make flying campaign trips to various states every weekend and some weekdays. Until halted by the Cuban crisis October 20, the president’s campaigning promised to be the most vigorous of any U.S. president in a midterm election. In every appearance he went down the line for all Democratic candidates. The president was accorded a warm personal reception in most cities, confirming the high degree of personal popularity with the people that had been recorded in Gallup polls. Whether his plea to elect “more Democrats” was making a serious impression remained in doubt, however.

By October public uneasiness over the Communist arms buildup in Cuba was growing. Republicans made a central campaign issue of Cuba, and most observers thought the GOP would make some gains. But the president’s October 22 announcement of a naval quarantine of Cuba and his ultimatum to Khrushchev blunted the Republican arguments and rallied the country behind him.

The Republicans began the 1962 campaign in hopes they could win important congressional and gubernatorial gains and thereby increase their effectiveness as an opposition party in Washington and prepare for a possible presidential comeback. They counted on the traditional pattern of midterm gains for the party out of power to help them in the congressional elections.

The party, however, was suffering from image problems. The congressional wing of the GOP, headed by Senate minority leader Everett Dirksen, R-Ill., and House minority leader Charles Halleck, R-Ind., had dominated the news of Republican activity in Washington since Eisenhower's retirement. Deprived of the expertise of the executive branch, Hill Republicans came up with few legislative initiatives and had few counterproposals to the stream of legislative requests that flowed from the White House. The only serious competition to Dirksen and Halleck for the Republican spotlight was Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona, whose outspoken conservatism made him the favorite of the right wing throughout the country. Moderate and liberal Republicans received scant attention. Eisenhower had retired; Nixon was embroiled in the race for the governorship of California; New York governor Nelson A. Rockefeller was busy preparing for his reelection campaign in New York and wrestling with possible adverse effects of his divorce announced late in 1961.

The Republicans waged the 1962 campaign with familiar issues: the need for fiscal responsibility in government, calls for a balanced budget, and warnings of the dangers of encroaching federal (especially executive) power. But the GOP lacked any single strong issue, such as the demand for an end to wartime controls in 1946 or alleged Democratic responsibility for the Korean War in 1950, with which to rout the Democrats. For a while they hoped Cuba would be that issue, but the president's firm action in late October effectively deprived them of it. In the end improved Republican organizations, especially in the big cities, helped the party to some victories. But the only region of the country in which they made any significant congressional gains was the South, where they jumped from nine to fourteen seats.

Results of the 1962 Elections

The Democratic Party confirmed its heavy majorities in both houses of Congress and among the states' governors. Democrats avoided "normal" midterm losses of the party in power by gaining four Senate seats and suffering only a nominal loss in the House. Not since 1934 had the presidential party fared so well in a midterm election. Democrats said that, in contrast to the familiar patterns of major midterm losses by the presidential party, the 1962 results constituted a real vote of confidence in the administration.

Republicans replied that they saw "no endorsement of the New Frontier and its policies." They pointed out that President Kennedy had not carried Democrats into office with him in 1960, actually losing twenty House seats that year, so that there were fewer vulnerable seats for the GOP to pick off in 1962. The Republicans argued that the national House vote for the GOP had actually risen to 47.7 percent, 4.0 points higher than 1958 and 2.7 points higher than 1960. Privately, however, Republicans expressed deep disappointment that they had not been able to register important gains, especially in the House.

Congressional reapportionment after the 1960 census had caused major shifts in the distribution of seats in the House. The eastern states lost a net of seven seats; the South, one; and the Midwest, four. The western states were the beneficiaries, picking up ten new seats; eight of them went to California.

Democrats controlled the California legislature, which redistricted in 1961. As a result they gained eight seats from California in the 1962 elections. A similar Republican gerrymander in New York State misfired, and Republican gains in other areas barely balanced the Democratic bonus from California.

Republicans were especially disappointed by their net loss of four Senate seats. The new Senate was so heavily Democratic that the Republicans had no real hope of regaining control until 1968 or later.

Despite a heavy turnover in the governorship elections (Democrats took seven from the Republicans and lost a like number), the gubernatorial party balance remained 34–16 in favor of the Democrats. The Republicans, however, did seize control of several important state governorships including those of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan.

The most devastating defeat of the year was suffered by former vice president Nixon, who was soundly defeated for governor of California only two years after barely missing election to the presidency. Other political veterans retired by the voters included longtime senators Homer E. Capehart, R-Ind. and Alexander Wiley, R-Wis.; Rep. Walter H. Judd, R-Minn.; and Gov. Michael V. DiSalle, D-Ohio.

The potential national leaders elected in 1962 included Republican representative William W. Scranton, elected governor of Pennsylvania by 486,651 votes; former auto maker George W. Romney, a Republican who ended fourteen years of Democratic control of the Michigan governorship; youthful Democratic state representative Birch Bayh, who toppled Homer Earl Capehart in the Indiana Senate race; Edward M. "Ted" Kennedy, youngest brother of the president, who was elected to the Senate from Massachusetts; and Robert Taft Jr., a Republican who was elected representative at large from Ohio.

Among the new senators elected in 1962 was Democrat Abraham A. Ribicoff, former governor of Connecticut and first secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare in the Kennedy administration. Hawaiian voters sent Rep. Daniel K. Inouye, a Democrat, to the Senate. He was the first senator of Japanese ancestry. The new governorship roster included James A. Rhodes, R-Ohio; John A. Love, R-Colo.; Karl Rolvaag, D-Minn.; John B. Connally, D-Texas; and John A. Burns, D-Hawaii.

Among the "miracle men" of 1962 were Philip H. Hoff, who became the first Democratic governor of Vermont in more than a century, and Henry L. Bellmon, who became Oklahoma's first Republican governor since the state joined the Union.

Incumbents who won impressive victories included Sen. Jacob K. Javits, R-N.Y., reelected by a plurality of almost one million; Republican Senate whip Thomas H. Kuchel, R-Calif., reelected by a quarter-million vote margin despite the 296,758-vote triumph of Democratic governor Edmund G. “Pat” Brown over Nixon in the same state’s balloting; Sen. Thruston B. Morton, former national chairman of the Republican Party, reelected against powerful Democratic opposition in Kentucky; and New York governor Nelson A. Rockefeller, whose plurality was down slightly from its 1958 level but still big enough to make him appear the top contender for the 1964 Republican presidential nomination.

Across the nation, voters showed a continuing tendency to disregard traditional party lines in choosing people for high office. The success of Democrats in the traditional Republican states of northern New England and breakthroughs for the Republicans in the South—including a near miss in the Alabama Senate race—attested to the possible development of significant new voting patterns.

1963–1965: The Eighty-Eighth Congress

The years 1963–1964 were good years for most Americans as the nation enjoyed continued economic prosperity and international affairs remained relatively tranquil. These same years, however, witnessed the assassination of a president, the launching of the most profound equal rights drive since the Civil War, and seizure of control of one of the major American political parties by staunch conservatives.

John F. Kennedy was shot on November 22, 1963, as his motorcade moved through cheering crowds in downtown Dallas. Approximately one-half hour later the president was pronounced dead. A special presidential commission, headed by Chief Justice Earl Warren, reported September 27, 1964, that Lee Harvey Oswald, “acting alone and without advice or assistance,” had shot the president. The report also said Jack Ruby was on his own in killing Oswald and that neither was part of “any conspiracy, domestic or foreign,” to kill President Kennedy. The report called for an overhauling and modernization of the Secret Service, the group entrusted with physical protection of the president, and of FBI procedures.

At 1:39 p.m., November 22, Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson took the oath of office as the thirty-sixth president aboard the presidential jet plane just before its departure from Dallas to Washington. The next few days witnessed President Kennedy’s funeral; the confluence in Washington of heads of state, dignitaries, and emissaries from governments all over the world to pay their respects to the dead president; and the resolute grasp of the reins of power by President Johnson.

The new president’s political roots reached into the liberalism of the New Deal on the one hand and into the conservatism of political life in his native Texas on the other. His wealth of experience in American political life, especially in Congress, served him well as he moved into the presidency. He quickly embraced the salient features of President Kennedy’s program, especially the tax cut bill and civil rights legislation; moved to win the confidence of the liberal community by a well-publicized “war on poverty” in America; and won the confidence of the business community and many conservatives by ordering strict economies in federal spending. Johnson’s foes accused him of political sleight-of-hand in being both liberal and conservative at the same time, but opinion polls—and the 1964 elections—indicated the American people approved wholeheartedly.

The issue of civil rights produced a profound domestic crisis for the United States in 1963 and 1964. Discontented with the pace of their advances in all spheres of life, African Americans pressed for full rights in every field from voting to employment, from education to housing.

President Kennedy, in February 1963, had sent his first civil rights legislative program to Congress—one characterized by liberals of both parties as “thin.” On April 3 mass demonstrations for equal rights began in Birmingham, Alabama. Dramatized by the use of children in the demonstrations and the use of dogs and hoses by the police against the blacks, events in Birmingham sparked a determined nationwide series of protests. By the end of 1963 demonstrations had taken place in more than 800 cities and towns, climaxed by a gigantic but orderly “March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom” in which more than 200,000 persons participated on August 28.

The demonstrations began primarily with black protesters, but millions of white Americans—most noticeably church groups and college students—took interest in the lot of black Americans. At the same time, however, many northern whites showed their hostility to the civil rights drive because it appeared to threaten de facto segregation in housing, employment, and education. Capitalizing on white northern fears, Alabama's segregationist governor, George C. Wallace, entered spring 1964 Democratic presidential primaries in Wisconsin, Indiana, and Maryland and won 33.8, 29.8, and 42.8 percent of the vote in the respective races. But when the new Republican national leadership sought to cultivate the "white backlash" vote in the 1964 presidential campaign, the effort proved singularly unsuccessful outside a few Deep South states.

In early June 1963 congressional Republicans and liberal Democrats began to press for strong civil rights legislation, and on June 11 President Kennedy told the nation: "We cannot say to 10 percent of the population that...the only way they are going to get their rights is to go into the streets and demonstrate." A week later he submitted a new and broadened civil rights program to combat discrimination in public accommodations, schools, jobs, and voting, which he urged Congress to enact.

For a while it appeared the bill might go aground, but in November the House Judiciary Committee reported a bipartisan civil rights measure, the fruit of conferences between administration leaders and Republican congressional civil rights advocates. Working under cloture, the Senate passed the bill June 19, 1964, by a 73–27 vote. The House passed the amended bill July 2, and President Johnson signed it into law a few hours later. Among other things the bill expanded federal power to protect voting rights; guaranteed access to all public accommodations and public facilities for all races, with federal power to back up the pledge; gave the federal government power to sue for school desegregation; outlawed denial of equal job opportunities in businesses or unions with twenty-five or more workers; and authorized the federal government to intervene in any court suit alleging denial of equal protection of the laws. It was the most sweeping civil rights measure in American history.

Determined to prevent economic stagnation and give the country's economy a major boost forward, President Kennedy in January 1963 proposed a $10.3 billion personal and corporate income tax cut to take effect July 1, 1963. After protracted hearings in the House and Senate, the final version, reducing taxes $11.5 billion annually, was signed into law by President Johnson February 26, 1964.

In the meantime the economy, which the tax bill had been designed to help, was doing surprisingly well on its own. The 1963 gross national product reached $585 billion, and the Council of Economic Advisers predicted a $623 billion level in 1964. With the exception of unemployment, which remained above 5 percent of the workforce, most economic indicators continued a gradual upward rise during 1963 and 1964. In October 1964, 71.2 million Americans were employed. Despite the rise in the economy, only a few economists saw any serious threat of inflation.

In his State of the Union message January 8, 1964, Johnson called for an "unconditional" declaration of "war on poverty in America." The poverty program constituted the chief innovation in the president's legislative proposals. Submitting his specific program to Congress March 16, he called for a fiscal 1965 outlay of $962.5 million to fight poverty. When Congress finished action on his request in August, it had authorized $947.5 million, only $15 million less than the draft proposal, with approval of almost all the president's requests. As enacted, the bill authorized ten separate programs under the supervision of the Office of Economic Opportunity, created by the bill. Major sections authorized a Job Corps to provide youths with work experience and training in conservation camps and in residential training centers, a work-training program to employ youths locally, a community action program under which the government would assist a variety of local efforts to combat poverty, an adult education program, and a "domestic peace corps" program.

The years 1963 and 1964 witnessed a steady relaxation in the tensions of the cold war, perhaps the closest approximation to an East-West detente since 1945. At the beginning of 1963, U.S.-Soviet relations were at a standoff, produced by Russian withdrawal of missiles from Cuba in October 1962. By mid-1963 a Soviet-Chinese rift had deepened, and a lessening of U.S.-Soviet tensions was evident.

In a speech on June 10, 1963, Kennedy announced that the United States, the Soviet Union, and Great Britain would begin talks on a partial test ban, apart from the seventeen-nation Geneva talks that had dragged on intermittently without much hope since 1958. Then, before many realized that progress was at last to be made, a limited treaty was initialed in Moscow July 25. The Senate consented to ratification September 24.

A moderately optimistic tone pervaded U.S.-Soviet relations in 1964. On April 20 both the United States and the Soviet Union announced they were going to cut back their production of nuclear materials for weapons use. The growing tensions between China and the Soviet Union caused the Soviets to turn their attention more and more inward. On October 16 the Western world was shocked to hear that Nikita S. Khrushchev had been ousted from his duties as premier and also as first secretary of the Soviet Communist Party. He was replaced as premier by Aleksei N. Kosygin and as party secretary by Leonid Brezhnev, possibly presaging a prolonged struggle for power within the Soviet hierarchy. The new Soviet leaders quickly made it clear they would follow Khrushchev's policy of "peaceful coexistence" with the West.

The Kennedy-Johnson administration's Alliance for Progress suffered as democratically elected regimes were deposed in Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, the Dominican Republic, and Bolivia. The Johnson administration faced its first major foreign policy crisis in January 1964 when large-scale violence broke out in Central America as Panamanians protested the 1903 treaty under which the United States administered the Panama Canal and Americans enjoyed special privileges in the Canal Zone. The United States was encouraged, however, when President Joao Goulart of Brazil, accused of conducting a leftist and chaotic administration, was deposed in a bloodless coup on April 1, 1964.

Apparently upset by Vietnam government moves against Buddhists, suicidal burnings by Buddhist monks, corruption within the government, and inadequate military success against the Communist Viet Cong, the State Department in 1963 gradually curtailed aid to the Vietnamese regime of President Ngo Dinh Diem. On November 1 a military coup ended the Diem regime. The State Department denied participation in the coup, but unofficially it admitted that it might have encouraged the “proper climate” for such a revolt. The new ruling junta in Vietnam was itself overturned by a coup in January 1964, starting a series of bewildering governmental shifts that lasted through 1964 as the military situation continued to deteriorate.

The off-year elections of November 1963 provided no definite clue to possible trends for 1964. Democrats maintained control of the Kentucky and Mississippi governorships and the Philadelphia mayoralty in the top three races, but the GOP vote was up sharply in all three areas.

Top Republican takeovers of the year were scored in New Jersey, where the Assembly reverted to GOP hands to give the Republicans majorities in both houses, and in Indiana, where the GOP elected twenty-five new mayors. The Republicans also scored gains in Virginia and Mississippi legislative elections. Democratic Representative John F. Shelley won election as mayor of San Francisco, ending fifty-five years of GOP control in technically nonpartisan elections. Suburban New York also showed some Democratic gains.

The 1964 Campaigns

From the beginning of 1964 it was apparent that President Johnson was the strong favorite to win a full four-year White House term in his own right. As the Democrats gathered in Atlantic City for their convention on August 24, Johnson kept silent about his final decision for a running mate. In a move unprecedented in American politics, he appeared before the Democratic National Convention just before his nomination the same evening to announce to the delegates that Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota was his choice for the vice-presidential slot.

The most fascinating story of the 1964 presidential campaign, however, lay in the opposition party. Throughout the postwar years, the Republican Party, despite its conservative inclinations, had generally embraced the wide consensus of U.S. politics: agreement on basic social welfare responsibilities of the government together with a firm but not bellicose policy toward the Communist world. But in 1964 the Republican Party turned abruptly from the moderate course. For president it nominated a militantly conservative two-term Arizona senator, Barry Goldwater, known for his hostile views toward the power of the federal government and his apparent willingness to risk nuclear confrontation with the Soviets to advance the Western cause. The course set by Goldwater brought the Republican Party its most devastating defeat in more than a quarter-century. Republican ranks in Congress and the state legislatures were greatly reduced. Even worse, national confidence in the party was so badly shaken that it seemed it might take years to recoup.

Early in 1964, however, only one Republican of national stature was willing to speak out on the possible dangers of Goldwater and his philosophy for the Republican Party. That man was New York governor Nelson A. Rockefeller, who had entered the race for the GOP nomination November 7, 1963. Rockefeller symbolized the eastern progressive wing of the Republican Party that had dominated Republican National Conventions since 1940. The other leaders of the Republican Party’s moderate wing—governors William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania and George W. Romney of Michigan, Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge Jr., and former vice president Richard M. Nixon—all were thought to harbor some presidential ambitions, but none was willing to take the plunge in the presidential primaries or to risk an open challenge to the Goldwater wing of the party.

The “National Draft Goldwater Committee,” which organized formally in the spring of 1963, aimed both at nominating Goldwater and at remaking the entire Republican Party into a vehicle for militant conservatism. Their aim appeared to be the reforming of two U.S. political parties along straight liberal versus conservative lines. By the autumn of 1963 the years of Goldwater stewardship within the ranks of the Republican Party had begun to bear fruit. Goldwater supporters held important positions in the Republican Party apparatus. Rep. William E. Miller, R-N.Y., who would later become Goldwater’s vice-presidential running mate, was the Republican national chairman.

The Republican National Convention, meeting in San Francisco July 13–16, turned sharply to the right, rejecting the party’s moderate tone of the postwar years and substituting instead an unabashed conservatism in domestic affairs and all-out nationalism in foreign policy.

Goldwater’s controversial stands and his failure to advance meaningful alternative solutions to national problems relieved Johnson of having to spell out in any substantial detail what his plans for the “great society” were. For the most part Johnson confined himself to calls for national unity and remarks aimed at broadening the breach between Goldwater and the bulk of moderate and liberal Republicans. Johnson was so successful in preempting the vital “middle ground” of American politics that a Democratic victory was assured long before election day.

Results of the 1964 Elections

In the November 3 elections President Johnson led the Democratic Party to its greatest national victory since 1936. Not only did Johnson win a four-year White House term on his own, amassing the largest vote of any presidential candidate in history, but his broad coattails helped the Democrats score major gains in the House of Representatives and increase their already heavy majority in the Senate.

The Johnson-Humphrey ticket ran 15,951,378 votes ahead of the Goldwater-Miller ticket, easily exceeding the record national popular vote plurality of 11,073,102 by which Franklin D. Roosevelt defeated Alfred M. Landon in 1936. The final, official vote for Johnson-Humphrey was 43,129,566; for Goldwater-Miller, 27,178,188.

Johnson won forty-four states and the District of Columbia (which voted for the first time for president, under the terms of the Twenty-third Amendment to the Constitution). His electoral vote total was 486. Goldwater won six states with a total of fifty-two electoral votes. The Democratic presidential victory began in New England and the East, where Johnson carried every state and chalked up a better than 2–1 majority.

The Democratic sweep continued through the Republican midwestern heartland, where every state also cast its electoral vote for Johnson. The president was the winner in every mountain and Pacific state except Arizona, Goldwater’s home state. California, which had boosted Goldwater to the Republican nomination in the June primary, went for Johnson by more than a million votes.

Only an unusual degree of ticket splitting saved the Republican Party from almost total annihilation in races for congressional and state posts. As it was, the Republicans were reduced to their lowest congressional levels since Depression days. In elections to the House, the Republicans suffered a net loss of thirty-eight seats. The new House balance was 295 Democrats and 140 Republicans, the lowest GOP membership figure since the 1936 elections. Among the more serious Republican House losses were seven seats in New York, five in Iowa, and four each in New Jersey, Michigan, Ohio, and Washington. Many of the northern Republican representatives defeated were among their party’s most conservative, representing formerly “safe Republican” seats. For example, fifty-four Republican House members had backed Goldwater’s nomination drive in June by signing a statement saying his nomination would “result in substantial increases in Republican membership in both houses of Congress.” Of these, seventeen were defeated, another three retired but saw their districts go Democratic, and all but six saw their winning percentages dwindle. Of the twenty-one northern Republicans who had voted with Goldwater against the 1964 Civil Rights Act, eleven were defeated. Republicans who disassociated themselves from Goldwater and his policies were generally more successful. The most spectacular Republican House victory of the year was scored by Rep. John V. Lindsay of New York, who refused to endorse Goldwater but won a 71.5 percent victory in his district, while Johnson was carrying it by more than 2–1.

The only area of significant Republican House gains was the deep South, where Goldwater coattails helped the party elect five new representatives in Alabama and one each in Georgia and Mississippi. They were the first Republican House members from these states since Reconstruction. But at the same time three conservative GOP southern House members—two in Texas, one in Kentucky—were going down to defeat.

One result of the election was to erode the power base of the “conservative coalition” between Republicans and southern Democrats. Not only would there be less conservative representation in the House, but the relative strength of northern liberals in the Democratic House Caucus would be increased substantially.

The Senate elections resulted in a net Democratic gain of two seats, making the new balance sixty-eight Democrats and thirty-two Republicans. Not since the elections of 1940 had the Democrats held such a heavy majority. But the major story was not the new Democratic Senate gains of 1964 but the fact that the members of the liberal Democratic class of 1958 were all reelected to office. The Democrats’ gain of thirteen formerly Republican seats in 1958 had effected a basic realignment of power within the Senate, giving it a much more liberal orientation than the House. The Republicans had long looked forward to 1964 as the year when they would win back many of the class of 1958 seats.

The Democrats actually won three GOP Senate seats in 1964: Kenneth Keating’s seat in New York, taken by Robert F. Kennedy, brother of the slain president; J. Glenn Beall’s seat in Maryland, won by Democrat Joseph D. Tydings; and the New Mexico seat of interim senator Edwin L. Mechem, won by Rep. Joseph M. Montoya. The sole GOP gain was in California, where George Murphy scored an upset victory over interim senator Pierre Salinger, former presidential press secretary.

A major blow to the GOP was the defeat in Ohio of Robert Taft Jr., who was challenging Democratic senator Stephen M. Young. Before the election Taft had been looked to as a major future leader of his party. But the Goldwater “drag”—Johnson won Ohio by 1,027,466 votes—was too much for Taft to overcome.

In gubernatorial elections, the Republicans scored gains in Washington, Wisconsin, and Massachusetts, and lost seats they had held in Arizona and Utah. The result was a net gain of one for the GOP. But the already heavy Democratic majority was not weakened significantly. The new lineup was thirty-three Democrats and seventeen Republicans.

Without Goldwater at the head of the ticket the Republicans might have scored much better. Their most disappointing defeat came in Illinois, where Charles H. Percy, who had been regarded as a possible future presidential candidate, went down to defeat in the Democratic landslide.

The most spectacular GOP governorship win was scored by Michigan governor George Romney, seeking reelection. He withstood a Johnson landslide of more than 2–1 to win reelection. The outcome established Romney, who had refused to endorse Goldwater's candidacy, as a powerful future leader of his party.

Among the new governors elected were Samuel P. Goddard, D-Ariz.; Roger D. Branigin, D-Ind.; Daniel J. Evans, R-Wash.; and Warren P. Knowles, R-Wis.

Democratic governors who won substantial reelection victories despite the Republican complexion of their states included Frank B. Morrison of Nebraska, Harold E. Hughes of Iowa, John W. King of New Hampshire, and Philip H. Hoff of Vermont. But in normally Democratic Rhode Island, Republican governor John H. Chaffee won reelection with 61.3 percent of the vote, while Goldwater received only 19.1 percent of the state's vote.

THE VIETNAM WAR YEARS

The years of the 1960s and 1970s were some of the most turbulent in the nation's history. The seeds of the great upheavals ahead were already sprouting even before President John F. Kennedy's death in November 1963. The country's role in the Vietnam War was inching upward. Black Americans were becoming ever more insistent in demanding an end to all forms of racial discrimination. A huge generation of teenagers, born in the post–World War II baby boom, were reaching college age and were preparing to challenge authority on a scale unprecedented in American history. There were also growing indications of conservative political strength, especially within the Republican Party.

In the late 1960s the nation experienced a series of cataclysmic changes that, while they did not appear to endanger the basic economic health of the nation, did jeopardize the postwar politics of consensus and promise as yet unpredictable changes in the social and political climate of American life. Only when the nation found itself entangled in a seemingly endless and unwinnable war in Vietnam in the mid-1960s did the first major cracks appear in the general national consensus behind U.S. foreign policy. For the first time serious doubts were raised about the role of the nation as a global policeman, and there were indications that a period of limited isolationism might come in the wake of any Vietnam settlement.

Through the 1964 election the United States had enjoyed remarkably stable two-party politics in the postwar years. No major ideological gulfs existed between the parties, and although the Democrats were more frequently victorious at the polls than the Republicans (an apparent legacy of Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal), few Americans were deeply concerned when the party in power changed in Washington or the state capitals. Indeed, two-party politics infused virtually every region of the country for the first time in its history. As the parties became more competitive, personal allegiances shifted more frequently and ticket splitting became an American electoral pastime.

When Barry Goldwater was repudiated at the polls in 1964, the post–New Deal consensus seemed to have been reaffirmed. Indeed, the year 1965 saw the last major burst of legislative accomplishments and national optimism that the country was to witness for some time. With the large Democratic majorities created by the Johnson landslide, Congress enacted federal aid to education, a national health insurance program, and a voting rights act.

But the Johnson administration's fortunes soon changed. The decision to commit massive U.S. ground forces to Vietnam resulted in increased opposition at home to American participation in the war. The war further stimulated student unrest on the campuses resulting in siege conditions at some universities. Blacks burst forth in anger and destroyed large sections of American cities. The Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Sen. Robert F. Kennedy were assassinated in 1968.

The Democratic Party coalition broke open under these strains in 1968, with the challenge to President Johnson's renomination and the Independent candidacy of Alabama governor George C. Wallace. The result was that Republican Richard Nixon was elected to the presidency.

At the end of the 1960s both parties were clearly in transition. The Democrats, in order to hold their solid base among low-income voters and minorities, would be obliged to remain strong advocates of wide-ranging social reform. But that course could possibly seal their eventual downfall in the South, even if an increased black vote in that region compensated for some of that loss. While organized labor had turned out a strong Democratic vote in 1968, its leaders were having increasing difficulty in convincing workers that they should remain unswervingly loyal to the Democratic Party.

The Republicans, even in winning the presidential election of 1968, received only 43 percent of the national vote and had to recognize that in their major base of support—the predominantly white, middle-class rural areas and small cities—they faced a diminishing asset in overall population terms. It was clear that the Republicans' growing strength in the burgeoning white suburban areas of America would hold solidly only as long as the party maintained domestic prosperity and found a way to calm inner-city tensions.

During his first term President Nixon too had to deal with antiwar demonstrations. But his policy of gradual withdrawal of American troops, climaxing with the peace settlement of January 1973, finally removed the war from the top of the American political agenda.

At the same time, with the passage of the baby-boom generation out of college and into the labor market, the nation's campuses became more peaceful. The movement of many African Americans onto the voter rolls, into public office, and into more jobs and better housing seemed to relieve some of the racial tension.

But at the very moment when things began looking better, the nation was hit by a fresh series of calamities. Throughout 1973 and 1974 the Watergate scandal implicated several top public officials, including the president himself, in illegal activities. The immediate result was the first presidential resignation in U.S. history, but the deeper ramifications could be found in the weakening of the confidence of the people in their government and leaders.

While the revelations were continuing, the United States was hit with an energy crisis when the Arab states cut off the flow of oil during the October 1973 war in the Middle East. Even when the flow was resumed, the price had been jacked up more than 300 percent, and this increase, combined with other trends in the economy, produced some of the worst inflation in the nation's history. Buffeted by these forces, seemingly beyond their control, many Americans wondered about the future of their country and the stability of their economic and political system.

President Gerald R. Ford, with his low-key personality and image of personal integrity, helped calm the country after these misfortunes. But he was not seen by many as a strong leader and was almost defeated for the presidential nomination of his party in the 1976 primaries.

1965–1967: The Eighty-Ninth Congress

Buoyed by the largest party majorities enjoyed by any president in three decades, Lyndon Johnson led the Eighty-ninth Congress in an amazingly productive 1965 session. The scope of the legislation was even more impressive than the number of major new laws. In the course of the year, Congress approved programs that had long been on the agenda of the Democratic Party—in the case of medical care for the aged under Social Security, for as long as twenty years. Other long-standing objectives were met by enactment of aid to primary and secondary schools, college scholarships, and immigration reform.

The pace of the 1965 session was so breathless as to cause a major revision of the image, widely prevalent in preceding years, of Congress as structurally incapable of swift decision. The change was because of three primary elements not always present in past years: the decisive Democratic majorities elected in 1964, the personal leadership of President Johnson, and the shaping of legislation to obtain maximum political support in Congress.

The expanded Democratic pluralities were most significant in the House, where the Democrats had not only gained thirty-eight seats over the Republicans in the 1964 elections but had also traded a number of conservative Democratic votes in the South for liberal Democratic votes in the North. The new liberal strength in the House showed itself most dramatically in passage of the aid to education and medical care (Medicare) bills. The Senate had passed similar measures in previous years only to see them blocked by the hitherto powerful coalition of Republicans and conservative southern Democrats in the House. But the “conservative coalition,” where it did appear in House roll call votes, was victorious only 25 percent of the time in 1965, compared with 67 percent in 1962 and 1964 and 74 percent in 1961, the first year of President Kennedy's term.

The president gained maximum political effect from his efforts to build a broad consensus of support. An excise tax cut, designed to keep the economy growing steadily, appealed to business and consumer interests alike. Lack of strong opposition from business circles made it easier for Democrats to mount the Great Society program of greatly increased civil benefits and tended to smother Republican protests that Congress was merely rubber stamping ill-conceived administration proposals.

The Voting Rights Act of 1965, the most comprehensive legislation to ensure the right to vote in ninety years, was prompted by the brutal suppression of demonstrations in Selma, Alabama, and other parts of the South. The bill went beyond the milder courtroom remedies of earlier civil rights acts. In the wake of this legislation, an additional 500,000 southern blacks were registered by the time of the 1966 elections.

Other legislation included a housing bill authorizing $7.8 billion to fund new and existing housing programs through 1969 and a bill establishing a cabinet-level Department of Housing and Urban Development.

The year 1965 was punctuated by major crises in Vietnam. Faced with the threat of success by the Viet Cong Communist insurgents in South Vietnam, President Johnson initiated large-scale bombing raids in North Vietnam, which was giving major aid to the Viet Cong. When this tactic failed to turn the unfavorable course of the war, he ordered a vast increase—from about 20,000 to eventually more than 140,000—in American troop strength in the South and an aggressive prosecution of the land war. Both steps required new outlays for personnel and materiel.

Capt. Donald R. Brown of the 2nd Battalion of the 46th Vietnamese regiment rushes to cover through a rice paddy while under attack during the Vietnam War. The war was a divisive issue in politics for more than a decade.

Despite highly vocal criticism of his Vietnam policy by a small band of senators, Congress overwhelmingly approved Johnson's special request for funds.

The Vietnam budget pressures soon had serious effects on the domestic economy. As 1966 began, the U.S. economy was already strained to its noninflationary limit. After fifty-nine months of stable economic growth, it was near full employment. Plant capacity was in full use. Any sizable increase in demand under these conditions would be bound to result in inflation. This is precisely what occurred as the defense budget shot upward, without any significant offsetting measures to cut back on other purchasing power. The cost-of-living index jumped from 111.0 percent in January to 113.8 percent in August. The president early in the year asked and received congressional approval of a $5.9 billion bill to accelerate certain types of tax payments and reimpose 1965 excise tax levies, but the measure was hardly adequate to counter the Vietnam spending boom. Almost every leading economist in the nation called for a general tax increase, but President Johnson refused.

With the public increasingly concerned with inflation and the Vietnam War, congressional Republicans found new Democratic allies in the effort to curb the Great Society—not only its spending programs but almost any measure providing social reform. Despite strong persuasive efforts by the president, the administration was rebuffed on many major bills.

An important reason for the defeat of the administration's new civil rights proposals was a wave of summertime riots in black "ghetto" areas of the large cities. In August 1965 a six-day disturbance had erupted in Los Angeles's predominantly black Watts area, with about 7,000 youths participating in rioting, looting, and arson. The National Guard finally restored order, but only after thirty-four deaths. In the summer of 1966 other riots followed in the black areas of several other American cities. The 1966 riots were attributed not only to decades of frustration among urban blacks in education, housing, and employment fields but to the growth of a new philosophy of "black power," expounded by extremist civil rights groups such as the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC).

In the House, Rep. John William McCormack of Massachusetts continued as Speaker. Sen. Mike Mansfield of Montana remained as Senate majority leader, with Sen. Everett Dirksen of Illinois his Republican counterpart. House minority leader Charles Halleck of Indiana was defeated for reelection to his leadership post by Rep. Gerald R. Ford of Michigan, just before the formal opening of the Eighty-ninth Congress. Ford's election as minority leader was a continuation of the revolt of younger House Republicans that had begun with Ford's election as House GOP Conference chairman two years before. As in 1963 the leadership struggle seemed to be based less on ideological differences than on the question of which representative could give the most forceful leadership to the depleted Republican House ranks.

The 1964 elections had left the Republicans at such a low point that some resurgence seemed inevitable. In 1965 it began in a spectacular way as Republican-Liberal John V. Lindsay won election as mayor in heavily Democratic New York City. Lindsay's victory, combined with the victories of liberally inclined Republican candidates for district attorney in Philadelphia and mayor in Louisville, Kentucky, signaled a potential Republican resurgence on the left in the very areas where Goldwater had been weakest—in the major cities and especially among blacks and other minority groups.

In New Jersey, however, the Republican gubernatorial candidate took a conservative tack similar to that of the 1964 Goldwater campaign and found himself defeated by Democratic governor Richard J. Hughes by a record 363,572-vote margin. Democrats also held the Virginia governorship and legislature and easily maintained control of the mayors' offices in major cities such as New Haven, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, and Detroit. In Cleveland a black state legislator running as an Independent came within 2,143 votes of upsetting the incumbent Democratic mayor. In the smaller cities some of the most interesting contests took place on June 8 in Hattiesburg and Columbus, Mississippi, where the first Republicans of the twentieth century—all staunch conservatives—were elected mayors.

The 1966 Midterm Elections

From the beginning of the 1966 campaign, the Democrats realized that they faced formidable odds if they hoped to maintain their overwhelming margins of control in Congress and in the state governorships and legislatures. Yet at the end of 1965 it looked as if the minority Republicans might be held to minimal gains. The first session of the Eighty-ninth Congress had passed laws with benefits for almost every segment of the population. President Johnson still enjoyed the wide “consensus” support he had enjoyed in 1964, from every group from organized labor to big business and minorities. The economy, however, was booming on virtually every front.

By the beginning of the 1966 campaign, however, it was apparent that the odds had shifted significantly to the benefit of the Republicans. Behind the change was the escalation of the Vietnam War, with its heavy toll both in American lives and dollars. The conflict in Vietnam, because of its limited nature, increased frustrations across the country and began to undermine public support of the administration in power.

The war effort generated inflationary pressures that were being felt throughout the country by mid-1966. The Republicans were able to argue with some effectiveness that the Johnson administration should be cutting down, rather than increasing, national expenditures for a wide variety of Great Society programs. Moreover, those very social welfare programs that had looked so politically attractive at the end of 1965 were beginning to encounter serious administrative difficulties, with wide gaps between the administration's promises to improve educational standards, end conditions of poverty, and ensure racial peace, and its ability to deliver on those promises.

President Johnson's popularity plummeted during the year; wide splits appeared in the Democratic Party in many important states; and at the same time several attractive Republican candidates appeared to lead the GOP in critical states—in sharp contrast to the unpopularity of Goldwater, the party's 1964 standard bearer.

Early in 1965 the Democrats had launched an ambitious Operation Support from within the Democratic National Committee, designed to reelect a large portion of the seventy-one freshman Democratic representatives who came into office in the 1964 Democratic sweep—thirty-eight of them from formerly Republican districts. But while Operation Support functioned smoothly in 1965, it tended to fall off in 1966 as the national committee obeyed presidential orders to cut back on its activities to pay off a heavy debt left from the 1964 campaign.

The Republican congressional effort, on the other hand, was bolstered by a massive fund-raising campaign that made it possible to funnel thousands of dollars into every doubtful congressional district in the country. Reports just before the elections showed national-level gifts of $1.6 million to GOP congressional candidates from their party headquarters, compared with only $250,000 from national-level Democratic committees.

The primary season indicated some significant shifts in the political landscape. In California, long a bastion of liberal Republicanism, actor Ronald Reagan, an outspoken conservative, won a sweeping gubernatorial primary victory over more liberal opposition. In the Virginia primary two aging House members of traditional conservative southern Democracy were defeated by younger men of more moderate persuasion. In Florida the mayor of Miami, Robert King High, won the Democratic gubernatorial primary with liberal support over the more conservative incumbent governor. Staunch segregationist candidates, on the other hand, won Democratic gubernatorial primaries in the Deep South: Jim Johnson in Arkansas, Lester Maddox in Georgia, and Lurleen Wallace, wife of outgoing governor George C. Wallace (who was ineligible to succeed himself), in Alabama.

As the campaign gathered steam in the fall, the Republicans concentrated their fire increasingly on the issues of inflation, Vietnam, crime, and the alleged credibility gap between what President Johnson and his administration said they were doing and their actual performance.

Results of the 1966 Elections

The Republican Party reasserted itself as a major force in American politics by capturing eight new governorships, three new seats in the Senate, and forty-seven additional House seats in the November 8 elections. In a striking comeback from its devastating defeat of 1964, the GOP elected enough new governors to give it control of twenty-five of the fifty states with a substantial majority of the nation's population. The Senate and House gains left the party still short of a majority but in a position of new power and relevance on the national scene.

A new vigor shown by Republican candidates across the country marked a return to more competitive two-party politics and the possibility that the 1968 presidential election could be closely contested. The vast majority of successful Republican candidates, both for congressional and state offices, appeared to have rejected the ultraconservative ideology espoused by former senator Barry Goldwater. But the winning Republicans did represent a somewhat more conservative philosophy than that of the president and his administration, reflecting a national movement to the right, which many observers felt was reflected in the slowdown on major domestic reforms in the closing session of the Eighty-ninth Congress. The 1966 elections appeared to lay the groundwork for a strong moderate Republican challenge to Johnson in 1968.

The party control among the state governorships shifted from 33–17 in favor of the Democrats to 25–25, the greatest Republican strength since the early 1950s. The Republicans gained California and held New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan to give them control of five of the nation's seven largest states. In addition to California, the Republicans added Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Maryland, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, and New Mexico to the list of governorships under their control. Among the new Republican governors were Winthrop Rockefeller of Arkansas; Claude R. Kirk Jr. of Florida (in the traditionally Democratic state); and Spiro T. Agnew of Maryland, a political moderate who defeated George P. Mahoney, the narrow victor in a three-way Democratic primary who had pitched his campaign to the “white backlash” vote. (In general, “backlash” candidates were unsuccessful in the elections.) Republican gubernatorial candidate Howard Callaway won a plurality of the votes in the one-time impregnable Democratic stronghold of Georgia. But Callaway failed to poll an absolute majority, and under the Georgia constitution, the election was thrown into the state legislature, which chose the Democratic runner-up, Lester Maddox.

The Republicans' most spectacular gain was in the House, where they picked up fifty-two seats and lost only five to the Democrats. The new party lineup in the House would be 248 Democrats and 187 Republicans. The Republican total in the thirteen southern states rose to twenty-eight seats, compared with only fourteen in 1962. In Senate elections Republicans gained seats in Illinois, Oregon, and Tennessee, giving them thirty-six seats to the Democrats' sixty-four. Democrats failed to take any Senate seats from the Republicans.

In the state legislatures the Republicans scored net gains of 156 senate seats and 401 seats in the lower houses, reflecting not only the strong party trend running in the Republicans' favor but the fact that reapportionment, by adding seats in suburban areas, was helping them as much as it helped the Democrats, if not more.

1967–1969: The Ninetieth Congress

The United States in 1967–1968 underwent two of the most trying years in its history as a rising wave of rioting and looting swept over its largely black central cities, the Vietnam War continued to build in human and dollar costs, inflationary pressures mounted, and two major national leaders were assassinated. President Johnson, recognizing the inability of his administration to command continued strong popular support, announced in March 1968 that he would not seek reelection to a second full term in the White House.

The Vietnam War became increasingly troublesome. It often overshadowed civil rights and city problems, distorted the U.S. economy, and loomed over U.S. foreign policy. Its cost soared to more than $2 billion a month. Reflecting the expense of the war, the federal budget by fiscal 1969 was at a record $186 billion, with $80 billion of that for defense.

Hopes for a political settlement in Vietnam were buoyed on October 31, when President Johnson announced he was ordering a complete halt to all American bombing of the North. Though not officially confirmed, it was believed that the bombing halt was undertaken with tacit agreement that it would last only so long as the North Vietnamese did not use it to their military advantage. A new and complicated round of negotiations then began in Paris on the means and protocol for substantive peace negotiations.

The patterns of violence in American life reasserted themselves when two prominent Americans became victims of assassins' bullets. The first was the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., who was shot and killed April 4, 1968, in Memphis, Tennessee. Following his death, rioting, looting, and burning broke out in black districts in more than one hundred cities. On June 5 another apostle of social progress and reconciliation between the races was struck down. Leaving the Los Angeles hotel ballroom in which he had made his California presidential primary victory statement, Sen. Robert F. Kennedy was shot in the head and died twenty-five hours later.

The 1968 Campaigns

Few presidential election years in the history of the nation brought as many surprising developments as 1968. Just a year before the election, it appeared likely that the two candidates might be President Johnson for the Democrats and Michigan's governor George W. Romney for the Republicans. But by late winter 1968 both Johnson and Romney were out of the picture, and each of the major parties was plunged into spirited fights for their presidential nominations. During 1968 continued racial tensions in the nation led to fears that Alabama's former governor George C. Wallace, running as the candidate of his own American Independent Party, might win a major share of the national vote or at least cause deadlock in the electoral college.

For the Democrats the year of surprises began November 30, 1967, when Minnesota's Eugene McCarthy announced that he would enter four 1968 presidential primaries to demonstrate opposition to the Johnson policies. McCarthy's candidacy struck an immediate chord of response, especially among younger Americans who shared his fervent distaste for the war in Vietnam. Most political observers discounted the seriousness of McCarthy's candidacy, but in the March 12 presidential primary in New Hampshire, McCarthy scored an amazing "moral" victory by gathering 42 percent of the vote against the president's 49 percent.

The McCarthy vote in New Hampshire then triggered another major surprise: the entry of Robert Kennedy into the Democratic presidential race, announced March 16. On March 31 President Johnson stunned the nation by announcing, at the end of a lengthy radio and television address on Vietnam policy, that he would not seek reelection in 1968.

After Johnson withdrew, the race for the Democratic nomination turned into a three-way affair: McCarthy, Kennedy, and Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey, who entered the fray in April. On June 4, in the conclusive California primary, Kennedy emerged the narrow victor over McCarthy, only to be assassinated as he left the hotel ballroom where he had claimed victory.

The death of Kennedy, who had shared McCarthy's Vietnam views while taking a far more aggressive stance on urban and minority problems, was followed by an eerie moratorium in Democratic politics as the shaken party factions sought to decide on their next move. But within weeks Humphrey emerged as the odds-on favorite for the nomination.

While violence flared in the city streets and thousands of police and guards imposed security precautions unprecedented in the annals of American presidential conventions, the Thirty-fifth Democratic National Convention met August 26–29 in Chicago to nominate Humphrey of Minnesota for the presidency and to endorse the controversial Vietnam policies of the Johnson-Humphrey administration. Humphrey's selection as running mate was Maine's Sen. Edmund S. Muskie. In the campaign that followed, Muskie's calm-voiced appeals for understanding between the groups in American society would prove an asset for the Democratic ticket.

In a minority were the antiwar factions that rallied around the candidacies of McCarthy and George McGovern. The McCarthy forces mounted a series of challenges to the Humphrey faction, on credentials, rules, the platform, and the nomination itself. An unprecedented number of credentials were challenged. McCarthy, McGovern, and other liberal factions won their greatest breakthrough on convention rules, obtaining abolition of a mandatory unit rule for the 1968 convention and at every level of party activity leading up to and including the 1972 convention.

Many Humphrey-pledged delegates also backed the move. For the first time in recent party history, the functioning of party machinery at every level had been questioned. Humphrey won his party's nomination, but he would lead a bitterly divided party into the autumn campaign.

In the Republican Party, George Romney had established himself as the early leader in the race for the nomination, but his liberalism was distasteful to many orthodox Republicans. He was followed into the GOP race by Richard Nixon, who made his long-anticipated candidacy formal on February 1. The two front-runners entered the New Hampshire presidential primary, but it soon became apparent to Romney that he faced a likely loss, and on February 28 he surprised the nation by withdrawing from the contest. Nixon won an overwhelming victory in the March 12 New Hampshire GOP primary. Moderate and liberal Republicans hoped that New York governor Nelson A. Rockefeller would step into the void created by Romney's withdrawal, but Rockefeller declared on March 21 that he would not run because "the majority of (Republican) leaders want the candidacy of Richard Nixon."

Without significant opposition Nixon swept the Wisconsin, Indiana, Nebraska, Oregon, and South Dakota primaries, shedding most of the "loser" image he had acquired from his 1960 defeat for president and 1962 defeat for governor of California. Rockefeller reversed his ground once again by entering the race on April 30, but even in the primaries where write-ins were permitted, the vote for him was generally low.

The Republican National Convention, meeting in Miami Beach August 5–8, wrote a moderately progressive party platform and then chose candidates for president and vice president who, at the moment of their selection, seemed to be taking increasingly restrictive attitudes on the sensitive national issues of law, order, and civil rights.

Nixon won nomination for the presidency on the first ballot, bearing out the predictions of his campaign organization. For vice president, at Nixon's suggestion, the Republicans selected Spiro T. Agnew, governor of Maryland since his election in 1966. The selection of Agnew, one of the major surprises of the year, was announced by Nixon the morning after his own nomination, and in the wake of almost-solid all-night conferences with Republican leaders, chiefly those of a conservative bent. Liberal Republicans were outraged at Agnew's designation.

Nixon seemed to represent the middle ground of the Republican Party of 1968, substantially to the right of Governor Rockefeller and well to the center of the road compared to the conservative Ronald Reagan. The Republican platform of 1968, adopted by the convention August 6 without a floor fight or any amendments, was generally moderate in tone and contained a preamble calling for a major national effort to rebuild urban and rural slums and attack the root causes of poverty, including racism.

To conduct his second campaign for the presidency, Nixon assembled a massive—and doubtless the best-financed—campaign organization in U.S. history. Nixon was intent on avoiding the mistakes of his 1960 campaign, when a frenetic campaign pace resulted in exhaustion and snap decisions.

A central theme of Nixon's campaign was an appeal to a group he called the "forgotten Americans," whom Nixon defined as "the nonshouters," those who "work in America's factories, run America's business, serve in Government, provide most of the soldiers who died to keep us free." By suggesting that his administration would look chiefly to the interest of this group, Nixon was able to make a strong bid for the support of white suburban and small-town America, the traditional heartland of GOP strength in the nation.

Humphrey's bid for the presidency got off to a depressing start in September 1968 with sparse crowds, disordered schedules, and vicious heckling by left-wing, antiwar elements virtually everywhere he sought to speak. Humphrey's first task was to establish some measure of independence from the vastly unpopular Johnson administration. A significant step to win some of the antiwar Democrats to his side came in a September 30 televised address from Salt Lake City, when he said he would stop the bombing of North Vietnam "as an acceptable risk for peace." When President Johnson actually took that step on October 31, Humphrey could hardly restrain his glee. The combination of his softened stand and the presidential position won him, at least at the last moment, the support of many of the Democrats who had been most disaffected at Chicago.

Humphrey endorsed virtually all the social advances of the Kennedy-Johnson years but called for a substantial broadening of domestic efforts to solve the problems of cities and minorities. He charged that Nixon's economic policies would bring America "back to McKinley," with recessions and unemployment like those the country experienced during the Eisenhower-Nixon years.

Wallace had announced on February 8, 1968, that he would run for president as a third-party candidate under the banner of the American Independent Party. His campaign had a narrower goal: to win the balance of power in electoral college voting, thus depriving either major party of the clear electoral majority required for election. Wallace made it clear that he would then expect one of the major party candidates to make concessions in return for sufficient support from the Wallace supporters to win election. Wallace indicated he expected the election to be resolved in the electoral college and not go to the House of Representatives for resolution. At the end of the campaign, it was revealed that he had obtained affidavits from all his electors in which they promised to vote for Wallace "or whomsoever he may direct" in the electoral college.

Results of the 1968 Elections

In one of the closest elections of the century Nixon on November 5 was elected president. In percentage terms, Nixon had 43.4 percent of the popular vote, the lowest winning percentage for a presidential candidate since 1912, when Woodrow Wilson won by 41.9 percent. Humphrey's percentage was 42.7; Wallace's was 13.5.

For the Republican Party, Nixon's victory had special significance. He was the first successful GOP presidential contender since the 1920s who was closely identified with the party organization. The victories of Dwight D. Eisenhower in the 1950s, followed by Nixon's defeat in 1960, had raised the possibility that the Republicans might lack the broad appeal ever to win a presidential victory unless their candidate possessed special nonparty appeal.

The Democrats had feared that the election would bring a final dissolution of the grand Democratic coalition that had controlled the federal government in most elections since the 1930s. The election returns did show the South deserting the Democratic Party in presidential voting, the Deep South to Wallace, the border South to Nixon. But the other elements of the Democratic coalition held together remarkably well, helping the party to win the electoral votes of several major states and to return a high proportion of its congressional incumbents.

Preelection surveys of Wallace voters had indicated that if they had been obliged to choose between Nixon and Humphrey, about twice as many would have preferred Nixon as Humphrey. If Wallace had not been on the ballot, Nixon would possibly have carried some of the five Deep South states that went for Wallace, possibly building up a stronger national vote lead in the process. But it was difficult to tell from the election returns whether Wallace had hurt Nixon or Humphrey more in the nonsouthern states.

Another bright spot for the Republicans was on the governorship level, where the GOP added five seats for a new total of thirty-one. But the Democrats retained control of both houses of the Congress.

In the Senate, Republicans gained five new seats, for a total of forty-two, the largest number they had held since 1956. The gain was a major accomplishment for the GOP. It was the biggest gain since 1950, when the Republicans also won five new seats. The breakdown for the new Senate was fifty-eight Democrats and forty-two Republicans. In the Ninetieth Congress, there had been sixty-three Democrats and thirty-seven Republicans. Republicans actually won seven seats previously held by Democrats, but since Democrats won two seats previously held by Republicans, the net gain for the Republicans was five. No incumbent Republican standing for reelection was defeated, while four incumbent Democrats lost their bids for additional terms.

The makeup of the new Senate was expected to result in a shift, although not a dramatic one, to the right. While liberal strength remained the same as in the Ninetieth Congress, strength among moderate senators dropped and strength among conservative senators rose correspondingly.

The seven Republicans who captured Senate seats previously held by Democrats included Barry Goldwater, former senator from Arizona and unsuccessful Republican presidential candidate in 1964. Goldwater, whose previous service gave him seniority over the other Republican freshmen, replaced retiring Carl Hayden, president pro tempore of the Senate.

Three Republican representatives also won Senate seats previously held by Democrats. They were Edward J. Gurney of Florida, Charles McC. Mathias Jr. of Maryland, and Richard S. Schweiker of Pennsylvania. Other Republicans winning seats previously held by Democrats were Henry L. Bellmon of Oklahoma and William B. Saxbe of Ohio. The other two freshman Republicans were Marlow W. Cook of Kentucky and Rep. Robert J. "Bob" Dole of Kansas. The two Democrats who won seats previously held by Republicans were Alan Cranston of California and Iowa governor Harold E. Hughes.

In the House the party breakdown when the Ninety-first Congress convened was 243 Democrats and 192 Republicans. In all Republicans took nine seats from the Democrats and lost five of their own for a four-seat net gain. Republicans had scored a net gain of forty-seven seats in the 1966 elections and had won a special election to fill a Democratic vacancy earlier in 1968. The Republicans had lost thirty-eight seats in the 1964 elections.

Of the 435 representatives elected in November, 396 were incumbents (223 Democrats and 173 Republicans), and only thirty-nine (twenty Democrats and nineteen Republicans) were newcomers. The new winners included two former representatives, one a Democrat and the other a Republican.

The new Congress would have the smallest crop of freshman members in years. Between 1940 and 1948 an average of ninety-six newcomers were elected to each new House. The average dropped to sixty-eight between 1950 and 1958 but rose to seventy-two between 1960 and 1966. In 1964 there were ninety-one newcomers elected and in 1966, seventy-three.

In gubernatorial races the Republican Party, winning thirteen of the year's twenty-one races and capturing seven seats held by Democrats, increased its control of the nation's statehouses from twenty-six to thirty-one. Even after the selection of a Democrat to succeed Vice President-elect Agnew, the GOP would boast thirty governors, equaling its holdings after the Eisenhower sweep of 1952, when there were two fewer states.

In light of the extremely close presidential race and the continuing, though narrowed, control of Congress by the Democrats, the Republican margin of ten governorships gave the party its most broad-based mandate for leadership. The GOP scored a net gain of three seats each in the East and the Midwest and lost one in the West. There were no party changes in the South.

Nixon's coattails had a less decisive effect than did Eisenhower's four national elections earlier. Nixon carried six of the seven states in which Republicans took governorships formerly held by Democrats (including two incumbents), but it was far from clear who helped whom in several of those races. In Montana an easy Nixon win failed to save Gov. Tim M. Babcock, an early Nixon backer. In Rhode Island, the only other race in which a Republican incumbent was beaten, Gov. John H. Chaffee's advocacy of a state income tax appeared to be the major factor in his defeat.

Battling for seats vacated by Democratic incumbents, Republicans won in Indiana, Iowa, West Virginia, New Hampshire, and Vermont. State matters, primarily fiscal, were the main issues in all five states. The Democrats suffered particularly through the voluntary retirement of their popular governors in normally Republican Iowa, New Hampshire, and Vermont. Except for Montana and Rhode Island, the Democrats picked up no seats formerly held by Republicans.

Republicans scored minimal gains in the contests for state legislature seats around the country. As a result of the elections, they would control twenty legislatures, the same number controlled by the Democrats. (The other ten were split in control or nonpartisan.) The GOP rose in strength from 41.8 to 43.4 percent of the seats in all senate chambers around the country but held static at just over 42 percent of all seats in lower houses.

1969–1971: The Ninety-First Congress

The Ninety-first Congress, which adjourned on January 2, 1971, compiled a substantial record of domestic accomplishments despite drawn-out disputes with President Nixon over foreign policy and spending.

The Senate made the first substantial attempt since World War II to challenge the president's authority on foreign policy and military involvement. Although the House generally agreed to uphold President Nixon's requests to finance new weapons systems and to send money and troops into Vietnam, the Senate engaged in numerous long debates on those issues.

It was in domestic legislation, however, that Congress compiled its most substantial record of accomplishment. This legislation included major air and water pollution control measures, a $25-billion education authorization, and a bill extending the 1965 Voting Rights Act and allowing eighteen-year-olds to vote in national elections. In the final days of the 1970 session, Congress completed action on a bill extending the food stamp program that, for the first time, provided free food stamps for the poorest families.

Congress and the administration worked to establish new federal agencies. Foremost among these was the government-owned postal corporation to replace the Post Office Department. Congress also agreed to the president's reorganization plans to set up an independent Environmental Protection Agency and a National Atmospheric and Oceanic Administration in the Commerce Department.

Problems concerning the economy dominated Nixon's first two years in office, and Congress attempted periodically to deal with these problems. In 1969 it enacted a major overhaul of the tax code. It sliced funds from military, foreign aid, and space requests and added money to numerous domestic programs, notably education, health, training, and pollution control. Congress enacted a federal spending ceiling for fiscal 1971, as it had for fiscal years 1969 and 1970.

Congress engaged in debates over the Vietnam War in attempts to limit deployment of troops and reduce spending. The Senate voted twice to repeal the 1964 Tonkin Gulf resolution, and the House eventually went along.

The 1970 Midterm Elections

Despite the unprecedented off-year campaign efforts of President Nixon and Vice President Agnew, most observers felt the Republicans suffered a net loss in the elections of November 3, 1970. In their drive to improve the Republican position in Congress and in state capitals, the president campaigned for candidates in twenty-three states during the weeks preceding the election, and the vice president visited twenty-nine states.

Although the effect of a presidential appearance for a candidate was unclear, Nixon and Agnew could point to victories in several states where they campaigned: Senate victories in Maryland, Connecticut, Ohio, and Tennessee, for example, and gubernatorial victories in Connecticut, Tennessee, California, Arizona, Iowa, Vermont, and Wyoming. Administration efforts failed to pay off in other states on the Republican target list. Democratic candidates were elected to the Senate in Utah, New Mexico, Wyoming, Nevada, North Dakota, and Indiana, despite the high-level administration campaigning. Nixon or Agnew visits also failed to persuade voters to elect Republican senators in California, Texas, Illinois, or Florida.

The most spectacular third-party victory of the year was that of James L. Buckley of New York, a Conservative Party candidate who was elected to the Senate with a minority of the votes. Buckley's election was made possible by a division of the votes for the Republican-Liberal incumbent, Charles E. Goodell, and the Democratic candidate, Rep. Richard L. Ottinger.

Another third-party success belonged to Sen. Harry F. Byrd Jr. of Virginia. In March 1970 the veteran Democrat announced that he would not run as a Democrat because of a party "loyalty oath" that he claimed would force him to commit himself to the Democratic presidential candidate in 1972. Byrd ran as an Independent, easily defeating the Democratic and Republican candidates.

A second incumbent Democratic senator who ran as an Independent was Thomas J. Dodd of Connecticut. Dodd had been censured by the Senate in 1967 for diverting funds from testimonial events and campaign contributions to his personal use. He was regarded as unlikely to win the Senate nomination in a Democratic primary. His Independent candidacy divided the Democratic vote and helped elect a Republican, Rep. Lowell P. Weicker Jr., to his seat.

Results of the 1970 Elections

Republicans registered a net gain of two Senate seats in the November 3 elections, leaving Democrats with a majority of fifty-five to forty-five in the Ninety-second Congress. Of the thirty-five Senate seats being contested, eleven were won by Republicans, twenty-two by Democrats, one by a Conservative Party candidate, and one by an Independent. Democrats had held twenty-five of the seats and Republicans, ten. Republicans who captured Democratic seats were Rep. Weicker, Rep. J. Glenn Beall Jr. of Maryland, Rep. Robert Taft Jr. of Ohio, and Rep. W. E. Brock III of Tennessee.

In Minnesota, Hubert H. Humphrey won back a seat in the Senate, where he had served from 1949 to 1964, when he became vice president. He defeated Republican representative Clark MacGregor for the seat of retiring Democrat Eugene J. McCarthy. In Texas, former Democratic representative Lloyd M. Bentsen defeated Rep. George Bush for the seat held by Ralph W. Yarborough, a Democrat defeated in the May 2 primary.

The Democratic Party showed renewed strength in the Great Plains and the West Coast in the 1970 elections as it gained nine House seats to open up a 255–180 margin for the Ninety-second Congress. Republicans claimed success in limiting Democratic gains to less than the thirty-eight-seat average pickup recorded by the nonpresidential party in off-year elections during this century. Democrats said their gains were significant because President Nixon's 1968 victory carried in few of the marginal candidates, who are normally easy prey to the party out of power in off-year contests.

Registering the most impressive net gain in statehouses by any party since 1938, Democrats in 1970 took thirteen governorships from Republican control, while losing only two, in Tennessee and Connecticut. The balance of state power shifted dramatically from eighteen Democratic and thirty-two Republican governors before the election to twenty-nine Democratic and twenty-one Republican governors.

State-level gains were doubly significant in 1970. Democratic control of a majority of the states furnished vital power bases for the 1972 presidential elections. Democrats won Ohio and Pennsylvania and held Texas, thus controlling three of the most populous states. Democrats also wrested from Republican control Alaska, Florida, Arkansas, and Oklahoma and the western and midwestern states of Idaho, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, South Dakota, and Wisconsin. Republicans continued to hold New York, California, Michigan, and Illinois.

Republicans went into the 1970 elections holding fifty-one of the ninety-nine state legislative bodies (Nebraska has a unicameral legislature). This figure included the two nominally nonpartisan legislatures of Minnesota and Nebraska, which were controlled by conservative, Republican-oriented majorities. Democrats held the other forty-eight chambers. Following the 1970 elections, Democrats gained control of eight new legislative bodies, giving them control of fifty-six.

1971–1973: The Ninety-Second Congress

The years 1971–1973 saw some of the boldest and most dramatic presidential initiatives in years. In the summer of 1971 President Nixon imposed wage and price controls on the economy, announced that he would visit Communist China, and planned a summit meeting with Soviet leaders. His visits to China and the Soviet Union in 1972 gave Nixon a strong boost in his campaign for reelection.

Dissent over the Vietnam War, which seemed on the rise in spring 1971, had waned by midyear following troop withdrawal announcements by Nixon. At year's end 45,000 additional troops were scheduled for withdrawal, practically bringing to an end the offensive combat involvement of U.S. ground forces. By late 1972 it appeared that a settlement of the Vietnam War, or at least a cease-fire and return of U.S. prisoners, was imminent. Presidential aide Henry Kissinger and North Vietnamese officials had hammered out a nine-point agreement, but the Saigon government balked, and the elusive peace had to await a final agreement in January 1973.

In October 1972 Congress gave President Nixon a major legislative victory: passage of a general revenue-sharing measure. The bill was the only one of the president's "six great goals" to pass during the Ninety-second Congress. In 1972 Congress also approved the Equal Rights Amendment, forty-nine years after it was introduced. The amendment was sent to the states for ratification March 22 after the Senate passed it 84–8.

On June 17, 1972, five men were arrested in the Democratic national headquarters at the Watergate building in Washington, D.C. This incident was the beginning of a process that was to continue over the next two years and destroy a presidency. The break-in was immediately tagged the "Watergate caper" by the press. But by the time the election arrived it had become the "Watergate affair," and it was being examined seriously. In the months following the celebrated break-in, allegations of a widespread network of political espionage and sabotage engineered by the Republicans were carried in the news media. Charges of involvement were leveled by the Democrats and the press against persons in high positions in the White House and the Committee for the Reelection of the President.

Seven men were indicted on criminal charges, three civil suits were filed, and one man was found guilty in a Florida court on a minor charge related to Watergate. Two congressional committees initiated staff investigations of the allegations. Watergate repeatedly surfaced in the presidential campaign, with Democratic nominee George McGovern and his campaign pursuing the charges and President Nixon and his staff denouncing them. Investigators and reporters began to backtrack: meetings, phone calls, financial transactions, and other related events were traced back months before the incident.

The 1972 Campaigns

President Nixon was in a strong position to seek another term as the 1972 presidential election year opened. His wage and price control system had curbed the inflationary spiral, while increased federal spending cut into the unemployment rate. His scheduled trips to Beijing and Moscow promised widespread publicity and a focus on the "peace" half of a peace and prosperity theme. Although he had alienated small groups of Republicans on the left and right wings of his party, Nixon could count on being renominated without much trouble.

The Democrats, meanwhile, headed toward a bruising battle for the nomination that would rip their party apart. Although Maine senator Edmund S. Muskie looked like a strong possibility for the nomination in late 1971, his centrist liberal political stance was not enough to hold the party together. His candidacy soon collapsed in the rush of primary voters toward the left or right wings of the party. Still angry over the Vietnam War, left-wing party activists gathered behind Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota. On the right, Alabama governor George C. Wallace gathered voters angry with busing and the rapid pace of social change in general.

Other well-known candidates who entered the fray for the Democratic presidential nomination were Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota. Several other hopefuls failed to gain any significant momentum; among them were former senator Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota and Rep. Shirley Chisholm of New York. Chisholm was the first African American to run in a series of presidential primaries.

McGovern began his upward climb to the nomination by a stronger than expected showing in the New Hampshire primary. Although Muskie won the popular vote there, he was labeled a loser because he received far fewer votes than expected. From there it was downhill for Muskie, and after he ran fourth in the Pennsylvania primary on April 25, he ceased active campaigning. McGovern, meanwhile, ran first in Wisconsin on April 4, then won Massachusetts, Nebraska, Oregon, and beat Humphrey in a June 6 showdown in California. From there on he was practically assured of the nomination, although there was a last-minute effort at the convention to stop him.

McGovern's highly vocal and long-standing opposition to the Vietnam War caused many political analysts to look on him as a one-issue candidate. But his major problem was one of recognition. Public opinion polls indicated that he had only 2 percent support from the voters in the field of prospective Democratic nominees. By mid-March, after two months of extensive campaigning, McGovern had gained only 3 percentage points in the polls.

Beyond any doubt the reform commission that McGovern had headed after the disastrous Democratic convention of 1968 had changed the face of the Democratic Party. Beyond any doubt the changes favored McGovern's candidacy by expanding the party's base and bringing more women, minorities, and youths into the process.

At the convention, McGovern's winning of the nomination was never really in doubt, even before the balloting began, and he moved steadily toward his goal. The Democrats chose Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton of Missouri as their nominee for vice president. But on July 25 Eagleton disclosed that he had voluntarily hospitalized himself three times between 1960 and 1966 for "nervous exhaustion and fatigue." Since 1966, said the candidate, he had "experienced good, solid, sound health." But Eagleton's statement, culminating an investigation by reporters of his past difficulties under stress, started a sequence of developments that included increasing pressure for Eagleton to withdraw from the ticket. After a meeting with McGovern on July 31, Eagleton withdrew from the ticket.

His presidential campaign sidetracked, McGovern announced August 5 that his choice to replace Eagleton was R. Sargent Shriver, former director of the Peace Corps and the Office of Economic Opportunity, U.S. ambassador to France, and member of the Kennedy family through marriage. In a display of unity and anti-Nixon oratory, the newly enlarged Democratic National Committee at an August 8 meeting in Washington nominated Shriver with 2,936 of the 3,013 votes cast.

In the Republican camp the renomination of President Nixon did not go completely unchallenged. He had opposition from both the left and the right. Assailing the president from the left was California representative Paul N. McCloskey Jr., who based his campaign on opposition to administration policies and its deception of the news media. McCloskey withdrew six days after the New Hampshire primary because of insufficient funds, but his name remained on the ballot in twelve other states as a symbolic protest. Nixon's opponent on the right was Ohio representative John

M. Ashbrook, who attacked the president for what he called his failure to live up to 1968 promises in fiscal matters, foreign affairs, and defense posture. Ashbrook's name was on the ballot in eleven state presidential primaries.

The Republican National Convention was a gigantic television spectacular from start to finish. The main business of the convention, the nomination of President Nixon and Vice President Agnew to a second term, was a preordained ritual.

Nixon did little campaigning for his second term. Because of his strong lead in the polls and lack of speech making, the president also was in the enviable position of making few, if any, concrete campaign pledges to the electorate. He enunciated the major themes of the campaign in his acceptance speech before the Republican convention, emphasizing the divisions in the Democratic Party and urging dissatisfied Democrats to downplay traditional party loyalty.

From almost every standpoint the Democratic campaign contrasted sharply with that of the Republicans. McGovern and his running mate were on the road incessantly from Labor Day until election day. McGovern tried in vain to draw Nixon into debate. His initial tax and welfare reform proposals attracted widespread criticism and helped alienate several traditional sources of Democratic strength, such as ethnic groups and blue-collar workers. When he substituted Shriver for Eagleton, he was attacked for poor judgment and vacillation. His chief issue, administration conduct of the Vietnam War, lost whatever remaining effect it might have had when an administration-negotiated peace appeared to be in sight during the last days of the campaign.

Rather than moving into the offensive against the administration, McGovern was kept on the defensive throughout the campaign, constantly forced to explain earlier positions and rebut Republican charges. The break-in at Democratic headquarters at Watergate in June and ensuing disclosures of the alleged involvement of administration officials in espionage and sabotage directed against the Democrats were potentially damaging, but the revelations failed to excite the voters enough to head off the Nixon sweep.

Results of the 1972 Elections

Nixon swept back into the White House on November 7 with a devastating landslide victory over McGovern. He carried a record of forty-nine states for a total of 520 electoral votes. Only Massachusetts and the District of Columbia, with a meager seventeen electoral votes between them, went for McGovern. The Nixon landslide was the first Republican sweep since Reconstruction of the once solid Democratic South. By runaway margins Nixon took all eleven states of the old Confederacy, plus all the border states.

Americans engaged in massive ticket splitting in the 1972 election. Nixon's landslide victory was not reflected in significant Republican gains in Congress or in governorships. Despite the avalanche of votes for Nixon, the Democrats scored a net gain of two seats in the Senate, thereby increasing their majority to 57–43 in the Ninety-third Congress. Of the thirty-three seats contested, the Democrats won sixteen and the Republicans won seventeen. Nineteen of those seats had been controlled by the Republicans in the Ninety-second Congress, fourteen by the Democrats.

The most significant, and surprising, element of the Democratic gain was the upset of four seemingly well-entrenched Republican incumbents: Gordon Allott of Colorado, J. Caleb Boggs of Delaware, Jack Miller of Iowa, and Margaret Chase Smith of Maine. If it had not been for Republican gains in three southern states (North Carolina, Oklahoma, and Virginia), the Democratic majority in the Senate would have been much larger.

Half of the eight new Democrats were considered significantly more liberal than the incumbent Republicans they upset. In this category were Floyd K. Haskell, who beat Allott in Colorado; Joseph R. Biden Jr., who defeated Boggs in Delaware; Dick Clark, who retired Miller in Iowa; and Rep. William D. Hathaway, who upset Smith in Maine. A fifth Democrat, Rep. James Abourezk, defeated Republican Robert W. Hirsch in South Dakota to take the seat of retiring Republican incumbent Karl E. Mundt. Abourezk was considered far more liberal than the conservative Mundt.

Two more Democrats were conservatives who replaced conservatives. Sam Nunn of Georgia and J. Bennett Johnston of Louisiana defeated Republican opponents to fill the seats of Democratic incumbents David H. Gambrell of Georgia and the late Allen J. Ellender of Louisiana. The remaining Democrat, Walter “Dee” Huddleston, defied the southern election trend by winning his race against Republican Louie B. Nunn in Kentucky for the seat of retiring Republican John Sherman Cooper. Both the incumbent and his successor were moderates.

Final returns showed that Republicans gained thirteen House seats in the 1972 elections, far short of the number they needed to win control of the House. The thirteen-seat pickup was slightly more than the four House seats gained when President Nixon first was elected in 1968, but it was far less than the winning party usually has gained in a presidential landslide. A close look at the House figures showed that the president not only lacked coattails but appeared to have little if any perceptible effect on House races.

The only semblance of coattail effects in the election was in the South, where the Republicans took seven House seats out of Democratic hands. For several states the election of Republican representatives meant drastic breaks with tradition.

The 1972 election was the first to take place after the reapportionment and redistricting that followed the 1970 census. More than a dozen entirely new districts were created, and others had major changes in their boundary lines. Most of these changes tended to favor the Republicans, because many new districts were placed in fast-growing Republican suburbs and because legislatures in several key states drew the lines to partisan Republican advantage.

Redistricting also played a significant part in the defeat of House incumbents. Thirteen incumbents, eight Democrats and five Republicans, were defeated. For nine of these incumbents, seven of them Democrats, redistricting was the dominant factor in their defeat. Three lost because redistricting forced them to run against other incumbents.

The House of Representatives in the Ninety-third Congress looked quite a bit different from its predecessor, but the reasons were mainly because of redistricting and retirement, not election defeats. The new count was 243 Democrats and 192 Republicans.

Chalking up a net gain of one, the Democrats in 1972 retained the wide margin of statehouse control they won in 1970, holding thirty-one governorships to the Republicans' nineteen. (Democrats had gained the Kentucky governorship in the 1971 off-year elections.) Of the eighteen seats up for election in 1972, Democrats won eleven and Republicans won seven. Despite upsets in several states, the net result was only a minimal change in party power.

Republicans lost governorships in Delaware, Illinois, and Vermont, while ousting Democrats in Missouri and North Carolina. Close races in New Hampshire, North Carolina, Washington, and West Virginia were won by Republicans, who also upset a favored Democratic candidate in Indiana. As expected, Republicans won gubernatorial contests in Iowa and Missouri.

Incumbent or favored Republicans were upset by Democrats in Illinois, North Dakota, Rhode Island, and Vermont, while Democratic incumbents were reelected in Arkansas, Kansas, South Dakota, and Utah. In Montana and Texas, Democrats were elected to succeed retiring Democratic governors. As expected, the Democratic challenger unseated Delaware's Republican incumbent by capitalizing on the issue of taxes.

In West Virginia's gubernatorial race, which drew national attention, Republican governor Arch A. Moore Jr. put together his general popularity and campaigning ability with Nixon's strong showing in the state—and the obvious incongruity of a millionaire populist candidate running in one of the nation's poorest states—to defeat Democratic challenger John D. “Jay” Rockefeller IV, the secretary of state.

1973–1975: The Ninety-Third Congress

The legislative activities of the Ninety-third Congress were overshadowed by one of the nation's greatest political crises: Watergate. Watergate dominated the news from the beginning of the second Nixon administration in January 1973 until the president's resignation on August 9, 1974. The year

Sen. Sam J. Ervin, D-N.C. (center) leads the televised hearings of the Senate Watergate Committee that exposed a web of political scandals in the Nixon administration, leading to the president's resignation in 1974.

1973 opened with the trial of the seven Watergate burglars beginning January 8. Five of the seven defendants pleaded guilty a few days after the trial opened, while the remaining two stood trial and were found guilty by the end of the month. Sentencing was March 23.

From mid-May until early August 1973, American television screens were filled with politicians and former government officials testifying before the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities—the Watergate committee. Most important of all information produced by the hearings was the revelation that tape recordings had been made of many presidential conversations in the White House during the period in which the break-in occurred and the cover-up began. The tapes contained evidence that ultimately led to Nixon's resignation.

Immediately after the existence of the tapes was made public on July 16, a struggle for the recordings began. The legal battle would last a year, from July 23, 1973, to July 24, 1974, when the Supreme Court ruled that Nixon had to turn over the tapes to U.S. District Judge John J. Sirica for use as evidence in the Watergate cover-up trial.

In the midst of the tapes battle, Spiro Agnew, on October 10, 1973, became the second vice president in American history to resign. Under investigation for multiple charges of alleged conspiracy, extortion, and bribery, Agnew agreed to resign and avoided imprisonment by pleading nolo contendere to charges of income tax evasion.

Two days after Agnew's resignation, President Nixon nominated House minority leader Gerald R. Ford of Michigan as his successor. Ford became the fortieth vice president of the United States on December 6, 1973.

While Americans were reeling from these events, they were overtaken by an energy crisis, as a result of the Arab oil embargo, and some of the worst inflation to hit the economy in peacetime history.

But even as public attention focused on the presidency and the economic problems of the country, Congress was passing landmark legislation representing an attempt to change the balance of power between the presidency and Congress. Among measures enacted were limits on a president's right to impound money, the establishment of a more thorough method for Congress to consider the federal budget, and restrictions on the president's war-making powers.

Investigation of Watergate continued. After two months of closed congressional hearings beginning May 9, 1974, and a series of televised debates beginning July 24, the House Judiciary Committee voted to recommend three articles of impeachment.

On August 5 Nixon released three previously undisclosed transcripts. The conversations showed clearly Nixon's participation in the cover-up. In a written statement the president acknowledged that he had withheld the contents of the tapes despite the fact that they contradicted his previous declarations that he had not known of or participated in the cover-up. These admissions destroyed almost all of Nixon's remaining support in Congress. On August 8 Nixon announced his resignation, to be effective at noon the next day, and Vice President Ford became the nation's thirty-eighth president.

A month after assuming office, Ford pardoned Nixon "for all offenses against the United States which he, Richard Nixon, has committed or may have committed" during his years as president.

President Ford nominated Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York to fill the vice-presidential vacancy. On December 10 the Senate gave its approval by a 90–7 vote, and on December 19, 1974, the House by a 287–128 vote. Thus the nation for the first time had both a president and a vice president chosen under the Twenty-fifth Amendment to the Constitution rather than by a national election.

Reacting to presidential campaign abuses, Congress in 1974 enacted a landmark campaign reform bill that radically overhauled the existing system of financing election campaigns. The new measure cleared Congress October 10, 1974, and was signed into law five days later by President Ford. It established the first spending limits ever for candidates in presidential primary and general elections and in primary campaigns for the House and Senate.

Although the Arab nations had lifted their oil embargo, they and other oil producing states refused to lower the posted price for oil. The energy situation became intertwined with the grave economic problems President Ford inherited on taking office. Within months, he and Congress were trying to get together on an economic-energy package that reflected the inseparability of the two crises. The continuing high oil prices played havoc with the international monetary system and contributed heavily to the deepening worldwide recession.

The 1974 Midterm Elections

Republicans paid the bill in November 1974 for two years of scandal and economic decline, losing heavily in congressional and gubernatorial elections throughout the country and slipping deeper into a minority status. Democrats gained forty-three seats in the House, three seats in the Senate, and four new governorships.

As soon as the November 5 election returns were in, Republicans began looking for comfort in the fact that parties holding the White House normally lose heavily in midterm elections. But it was a small comfort. Democrats went into the 1974 election with nearly 60 percent of the seats in the Senate and House. For the most part, the Democratic gains in the House were not marginal seats won by Republicans in a previous presidential sweep but solid Republican districts.

If there was one region that disappointed Republicans the most, it was the South. Shortly before the election the South was thought to be the one Republican bright spot. Losses were expected to be lightest in that area, and there was a good chance for the party to gain half a dozen House seats. As it turned out, Republicans lost ten House seats in the South and won only two Democratic ones.

The Midwest proved even more disastrous for Republicans. Before the election the Midwest had been the only region of the country in which Republicans held a majority of the House seats. But with a net Democratic gain of fourteen seats there, that was no longer true.

A look at the demographics of the election yielded another interesting conclusion: Republicans suffered badly in the suburbs, where much of the so-called emerging Republican majority was supposed to lie. The striking fact about these suburban districts was that they were not marginal. In many cases the suburban districts that went Democratic contained thousands of former Democrats who left their party behind as they became prosperous enough to move outside the city limits. The new suburban middle class had been hard hit by recession and inflation, and Republicans may have paid the price.

Perhaps more important, however, was the prevalence in the suburbs of independent and ticket-splitting voters. Surveys had consistently shown a clear majority of independent voters favoring Democratic congressional candidates in 1974, and the switch in the independent vote probably was concentrated in the suburbs.

The heavy turnover decreed by the election—eleven new senators, ninety-two new representatives, forty incumbent representatives defeated—broke one of the most consistent political patterns of previous years. The tendency since World War II had been for incumbents to seek reelection as long as they were physically able to serve and for nearly all of them to win.

In 1974 that changed. Thanks to the combination of retirement and defeat, there were more first-termers elected to the Ninety-fourth House than to any other since 1949. More than one-third of the new House was elected either in 1972 or 1974.

Results of the 1974 Elections

The Democrats scored a net gain of three Senate seats in the November 5 elections. A fourth gain came later in New Hampshire, where the state ballot law commission had at first declared Republican Louis C. Wyman the winner by two votes. But the Senate refused to seat Wyman, eventually declaring a vacancy that Democrat John Durkin filled after winning a special election in September 1975. In addition, the Democrats had gained a seat in Ohio by appointment early in 1974, which they held in the November balloting.

Two incumbents, both Republicans, were defeated in the election. Marlow W. Cook of Kentucky lost by a substantial margin to Democratic governor Wendell H. Ford. In Colorado, Republican Peter H. Dominick was swamped by Democrat Gary W. Hart.

Democrats also captured two seats from which incumbent Republicans were retiring. In a major upset in Vermont, Patrick J. Leahy beat Rep. Richard W. Mallary in a close race and became the first Democratic senator in the state's history. Leahy replaced retiring George D. Aiken, the Senate's senior Republican.

The Republicans' only Senate gain was in Nevada, where former governor Paul Laxalt was the winner by 624 votes.

In other races for vacant seats, there were no shifts in party lineup. Democratic representative John C. Culver won the seat of retiring Harold E. Hughes in Iowa. In North Carolina former state attorney general Robert B. Morgan easily held the seat of Sam J. Ervin Jr. Two Democrats who defeated incumbents in primaries, former astronaut John H. Glenn of Ohio and Gov. Dale Bumpers of Arkansas, won landslide victories over weak Republican opposition.

Republicans, while losing Aiken's seat, held onto the Utah Senate seat of Wallace F. Bennett, who retired. Salt Lake City mayor Jake Garn won easily over Democratic representative Wayne Owens.

The Democratic gain was kept modest because the Republicans managed to hold their vulnerable Utah seat and to reelect three incumbents who had been in serious trouble: Senators Robert J. "Bob" Dole of Kansas, Henry L. Bellmon of Oklahoma, and Milton R. Young of North Dakota.

Three Democratic incumbents in difficult races won reelection. They were Birch Bayh of Indiana, George McGovern of South Dakota, and Mike Gravel of Alaska. Other incumbents in both parties won easily.

In the House, Democrats gained forty-three seats, pushing their number just above the two-thirds mark. They had already made a net gain of five seats in special elections and a party switch, raising their total in the last days of the Ninety-third Congress to 248. Thus, after the elections, they had won 291 seats.

The Democratic trend was as broad as it was deep. It took away four Republican seats in New Jersey and four in California. It took five in Indiana, five in New York, three in Illinois, and two in Michigan. In nearly all cases the change to a new member of the House appeared to mean at least a slight shift to the left. There were a few new conservative Democratic representatives in the new House, such as John Birch Society member Lawrence P. McDonald of Georgia, but they were exceptions. For the most part liberal Democrats who retired were replaced by persons of similar persuasion, and conservative Republicans were replaced by Democrats who ran against them from the left.

The Republican group in the House was also expected to shift slightly toward liberalism even as it shrank by forty-three members. Nearly every House Republican beaten November 5 was counted among the conservatives; the liberal and moderate Republicans generally had little trouble winning reelection. The only serious casualty among the Republican moderates was John Dellenback of Oregon. Moderates such as John B. Anderson of Illinois and Paul N. McCloskey Jr. of California won without serious contest.

Election night was not pleasant for Republicans who remained loyal to President Nixon in the days just before his resignation. Four Republicans who supported Nixon during the House Judiciary Committee's impeachment inquiry were beaten decisively. They were David W. Dennis of Indiana, Wiley Mayne of Iowa, and Joseph J. Maraziti and Charles W. Sandman Jr. of New Jersey. Harold V. Froehlich of Wisconsin, who supported two articles of impeachment against Nixon but opposed the third, also was defeated. All the Republicans on the Judiciary Committee who consistently voted to impeach Nixon were reelected, as were several Nixon defenders.

Democrats increased their firm hold on the nation's governorships from thirty-two to thirty-six. Of the thirty-five seats up for election, Democrats won twenty-seven, Republicans won seven, and an Independent was elected in Maine. The new lineup of governorships was thirty-six Democrats, thirteen Republicans, and one Independent. Not since the 1930s had the Democrats—or any party—held as many as thirty-six of the nation's governorships.

Republicans lost governorships in three of the nation's ten largest states—New York, California, and Massachusetts. They suffered three losses in the mountain states—Wyoming, Colorado, and Arizona. Besides these states Republicans also lost control of governorships in Oregon, Connecticut, and Tennessee, for a total loss of nine.

The Democrats also suffered some gubernatorial reverses, despite their overall net gain. In Alaska, Ohio, Kansas, and South Carolina, Republicans picked up state capitols held by Democrats, leaving the Republicans with a net loss of five. Democrats also lost Maine to an Independent.

Perhaps the two greatest upsets in the gubernatorial races occurred in Maine and Ohio. In Maine voters rejected both major political parties, choosing instead James B. Longley, who ran as an Independent. Longley was the first Independent to be elected governor of any state since 1930. In Ohio, Democratic governor John J. Gilligan lost to former Republican governor James A. Rhodes.

Minority groups fared well in gubernatorial contests. Both Arizona and New Mexico elected Spanish-surnamed governors, Arizona for the first time in history and New Mexico for the first time in fifty-six years. In Hawaii Democrat George R. Ariyoshi became the first Japanese-American to hold the governorship of any state.

There were fifteen other newcomers, for a total of nineteen new governors. Among them were Edmund G. “Jerry” Brown Jr., D-Calif.; Ella T. Grasso, D-Conn.; Michael S. Dukakis, D-Mass.; David L. Boren, D-Okla.; James B. Edwards, R-S.C.; and Jay Hammond, R-Alaska.

YEARS OF UNEASY PEACE

By the time Jimmy Carter took the oath as president in January 1977, America’s confidence had been shaken by almost a decade and a half of violence and scandal. The country had in effect lost its first war; had gone through a series of political assassinations and its first case of presidential resignation; had been besieged by urban, campus, and racial violence; and had experienced the strains of an energy crisis and rampant inflation. In large part Carter’s victory stemmed from the weariness of the voters with the normal political leadership of the country and their search for a new start. But however great the hopes, President Carter soon became embroiled in national problems and Washington politics. Critics charged him with inflexibility and lack of leadership. His energy bill was stalled and dismantled in Congress. Inflation resumed its seemingly inexorable rise. By mid-1979 few were optimistic that the nation’s energy shortages and economic ills would be resolved any time soon. The debate over solutions continued to preoccupy the nation and its leaders.

The Democrats saw a reversal of fortunes in the 1980 election when conservative Ronald Reagan swept Carter from office. Reagan was the first GOP president since Dwight D. Eisenhower to have his party in a majority position in either chamber. The election gave conservatives a chance to control or influence national policy in the executive and legislative branches of government.

In line with his conservative ideology, President Reagan instigated huge tax cuts, which were largely credited with moving the country from recession to prosperity. The president came into office speaking in a traditional Republican manner, calling for a balanced budget. But he presided over the biggest deficits in American history, transforming the United States from the world’s biggest creditor nation to the world’s biggest debtor nation. During his tenure, the national debt increased nearly threefold, from $931 billion to $2.69 trillion.

The Reagan foreign policy took many turns, gradually toning down an early ideological bent and a tendency to exert military muscle—such as in the 1983 invasion of Grenada and the 1986 bombing of Libya. But the focus always was on the Soviet Union. Over the years the United States had grown accustomed to dealing with a Soviet Union that was predictable. Kremlin leaders came and went, but the fundamental Soviet policies remained the same, and Washington did not have to be particularly creative in responding to them. Mikhail Gorbachev, who came to power in March 1985, during the early stage of Reagan’s second term, upset many of the underlying assumptions about Soviet behavior.

At the outset President Reagan vested much of his energy in strengthening the armed forces. He left the presidency as an apostle of superpower disarmament, welcoming U.S.-Soviet summitry that he had once disdained and discarding his earlier belief that the Soviet Union was an “evil empire.” Reagan had vowed never to deal with terrorists, but he suffered the humiliation of a White House scandal that involved the secret sale of arms to Iran in an attempt to release American hostages in Lebanon—and the illegal siphoning of some of the sale proceeds to Central American guerrilla fighters.

President Reagan’s final year in office was one of warming relations between Washington and Moscow. He took his unique brand of politicking to Moscow May 29–June 2, 1988, for an upbeat summit meeting at which he and Gorbachev exchanged documents ratifying an arms control treaty they had signed the previous December in Washington. It was the first arms treaty ratified by the two countries since 1972 and the first to ban an entire class of nuclear weapons—ground-launched intermediate-range nuclear-force missiles.

Perhaps Reagan’s ultimate accolade from the nation’s voters was their elevation of his vice president and preferred successor, George H.W. Bush, to the Oval Office. In winning the party’s nomination and then the presidency in 1988, Bush portrayed himself as the rightful heir to the Reagan legacy.

1975–1977: The Ninety-Fourth Congress

The years 1975–1976 gave America a significant respite from the high political temperature of the previous several years. With Richard Nixon out of office and the Vietnam War over, the two great issues that had convulsed the country for so long were gone. But even as the country was cooling off, it found itself stalemated on the prime issues facing it. Congress and the president failed to agree on a workable energy program. A strategic arms limitation treaty with the Soviet Union was put off. While inflation lessened, unemployment jumped to alarming heights.

As the Ninety-fourth Congress opened, there were clear differences over what steps to take to cure the continuing economic ills of inflation and recession. The Democrats were calling for a massive tax cut, emergency jobs for the unemployed, housing construction subsidies, an end to certain tax shelters, and other proposals aimed at closing tax loopholes.

President Gerald R. Ford, who in late 1974 had called for a tax increase to combat inflation, in March 1975 reluctantly agreed to a tax cut package drafted by the Democrats that was retroactive to January 1. He and his advisers insisted that it was just as important to fight inflation as to reduce taxes. For this reason, he vetoed as too inflationary the Democrats' bill to create more than one million jobs; the veto was sustained by Congress even though the national unemployment rate was climbing to its high of 9.2 percent in May. Ford subsequently made an about-face and agreed to a compromise version that had a lower price tag but contained many of the same jobs programs.

No subject consumed more time during the first session of the Ninety-fourth Congress than energy legislation. But despite the amount of time expended in debate and hearings on energy issues, the legislation enacted fell far short of setting a national energy policy. Congress and the White House were deadlocked on fundamental energy questions, with Ford unable to sell his programs and the Democratic majority unable to draft viable alternatives. After a temporary compromise allowed extension of energy controls until mid-December, a more lasting resolution was attained under which controls would continue until early 1979.

In 1976 Congress generally agreed with the administration's request for increased defense spending. Impressed by evidence of a Soviet military buildup, Congress gave the Defense Department virtually all Ford had requested and accepted the principle that defense spending must continue to grow beyond the amount needed to cover inflation.

The 1976 Campaigns

Both parties witnessed an intense struggle for the presidential nominations in 1976, with President Ford barely surviving an effort by former California governor Ronald Reagan to deny him the Republican nomination and the Democrats selecting an obscure former governor of Georgia, Jimmy Carter.

Because of the scandals of the Nixon regime and the perceived weakness of the Ford administration, Carter was heavily favored to take the presidency at the beginning of the fall campaign. But the race gradually narrowed, until on election day Carter won by only 2.1 percentage points.

Carter's nomination represented a repudiation of the political establishment by Democratic primary voters. Such well-known names as Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington, Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama, 1972 vice-presidential nominee Sargent Shriver, and Rep. Morris K. Udall of Arizona, all fell before the little-known Georgian who espoused an anti-Washington rhetoric combined with an appeal to the old virtues. Tired of political corruption and what they perceived as too much government interference in their lives, voters responded positively to Carter's appeal, despite his lack of experience in the federal government.

On December 2, 1974, Carter announced his candidacy for the 1976 presidential nomination. His speech before the National Press Club included most of the themes of his campaign: restoration of public trust in government; reforms to make government more open and more efficient; a comprehensive energy policy; thorough tax reform; "a simplified, fair, and compassionate welfare program"; and a comprehensive national health program.

Carter won the New Hampshire primary February 24 with 28.4 percent in a field of nine candidates, including write-ins. In Massachusetts on March 2, Carter ran behind Jackson, Udall, and Wallace but picked up sixteen delegates. The same day he won Vermont's advisory primary with more than 42 percent against three other candidates. His next major test came March 9 in Florida, where he had vowed to defeat Wallace. When all the votes were counted, Carter had beaten Wallace 34.5 to 30.5 percent. Jackson was third with 23.9. Most observers felt that if Jackson had stayed out of the race Carter's victory over Wallace would have been much stronger.

Carter ended what was the longest primary season up to that point with 38.8 percent of all votes cast. Of the twenty-seven presidential preference primaries, Carter finished first in seventeen and second in eight. On the way to the nomination, he eliminated a dozen candidates who entered the campaign and showed enough strength to block his greatest potential rival, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey.

Carter brought the Democratic Party's diverse elements together in July at its national convention. The four-day convention in New York City was the party's most harmonious in twelve years and a stark contrast to the bitter and divisive conventions of 1968 and 1972.

Balloting for president was merely a formality. Besides Carter, three other names were placed in nomination: Udall, California governor Jerry Brown, and antiabortion crusader Ellen McCormack. The proceedings, however, turned into a love-feast as Udall before the balloting and Brown afterwards appeared at the convention to declare their support for Carter. On the presidential roll call, Carter received 2,238 of the convention's 3,008 votes, topping the needed majority a little more than halfway through the balloting with the vote from Ohio. The following morning Carter announced that his choice for vice president was Minnesota senator Walter F. Mondale.

Ford ran his campaign on his two-year performance record as president. The plan was to cultivate the image of an America healed of its divisive internal wounds, involved in a promising economic recovery, and at peace both at home and abroad. In doing this Ford had many of the incumbent's powers of policy making, media access, and patronage. All of these were to be used against Ronald Reagan, who announced his candidacy November 20, 1975.

Ford began early to capitalize on his position, spending considerable time in the fall of 1975 traveling across the country. Knowing that Reagan would have to make bold stands on key issues, Ford hoped to remain presidential in his own low-key manner.

At first the plan seemed to work. Ford won New Hampshire by about 1,500 votes. In Florida, where he was once thought far behind, the president was helped by older voters' fears that Reagan would alter the Social Security system. Ford scored a convincing victory. Following a big win in Illinois March 16, Ford strategists hoped to build a party consensus that would force Reagan to withdraw and support the president's nomination before the campaign moved into Reagan's Sun Belt strongholds. As they had done privately before the campaign had begun, Ford's supporters began publicly urging Reagan to pull out of the race in the name of party unity. It was at that point that the plan, as scheduled, began to bog down.

Reagan scored a series of important victories in the South and Southwest. By mid-May the Ford candidacy had fallen behind in the convention delegate count. Ford survived with a large victory in his home state of Michigan on May 18, breaking Reagan's momentum. Added to that victory were stepped-up efforts to cash in on Ford's incumbency with a flurry of patronage in key primary states and more effective usage of Ford's access to the press. The two candidates split the six May 25 primaries evenly, with Ford taking Kentucky, Tennessee, and Oregon. The border state wins were interpreted as a success for Ford, showing he could compete with Reagan for conservative votes.

The president finally regained the edge in the delegate count in late May by persuading his technically uncommitted supporters in New York and Pennsylvania to declare for him. Ford ended the primary season with an easy win in New Jersey and a hefty margin in Ohio. Reagan kept close with a landslide victory in California, ensuring that the nomination would turn on the status of the uncommitted delegates to the convention.

The Republican delegates arrived in Kansas City for their convention in August more evenly split than they had been since 1952. Both President Ford, breaking with tradition, and Ronald Reagan arrived in town three days before the balloting to continue their pursuit of delegates.

On the presidential roll call, Reagan, bolstered by the votes in California and some Deep South states, took a healthy lead. But Ford's strength in the big northeastern states—New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, Ohio—and others such as Minnesota and Illinois pushed Ford ahead. There was a pause as the Virginia delegation was individually polled. Then West Virginia put the president over the top.

The final vote was 1,187 for Ford, 1,070 for Reagan, one vote from the New York delegation for Commerce Secretary Elliot L. Richardson, and one abstention. On a voice vote the convention made the nomination unanimous.

Ford the next day selected Sen. Robert J. "Bob" Dole of Kansas as his running mate after Reagan ruled out his acceptance of the second spot. Dole was seen as an effective gut fighter against the Carter forces who would allow Ford to keep his campaign style presidential.

Ford's basic campaign strategy was to portray himself as an experienced leader, a calm and reasonable man who had restored openness and respect to the presidency. Carter's strategy was to attack Ford as an inept leader who lacked the imagination and instincts to move the country forward.

Also campaigning was Eugene J. McCarthy, who ran as an Independent, unaffiliated with any party. The McCarthy campaign was aimed at people who had been frequent non-voters in the past, a group making up nearly half the potential electorate. The Democrats, however, saw the McCarthy voter as a liberal Democrat who would choose Carter over Ford in a two-way race.

Results of the 1976 Elections

On November 2 Jimmy Carter swept the South, took a majority in the East, and did well enough in the Midwest to struggle home with a victory. But it was not easy. Carter's win in Ohio by 11,000 votes still left him with the smallest electoral college margin since Woodrow Wilson won reelection in 1916. Without Ohio's twenty-five electoral votes, Carter's total would have dropped to 272, giving him the smallest edge in a hundred years.

In several states McCarthy's Independent candidacy appeared to have tipped the balance to Ford, although in the national popular vote count McCarthy made little impact, receiving less than 1 percent of the total.

Carter won by welding together varying proportions of Roosevelt's New Deal coalition: the South, the industrial Northeast, organized labor, minorities, and the liberal community. Carter won majorities in each of these regions and voting groups and made a better than usual showing for a Democratic candidate in the rural Midwest.

Ford made his best showing in the West, winning 53 percent of the popular vote and carrying all but one state, Hawaii. Neither Ford nor Carter ran well in the region during the primaries, but Ford benefited from traditional Republican strength and the absence of an intensive Carter effort in the region to score a series of one-sided victories.

An unusual number of new people were elected to the Senate in 1976, but it changed little in ideology and none at all in party lineup. Voters turned nine incumbent senators out of office, more than in any year since 1958. But they took care to treat both parties about the same way, and when the Ninety-fifth Congress convened in January, there were sixty-two Senate Democrats and thirty-eight Republicans, just as there were in the Senate that had left in October.

It was an extraordinarily large freshman class—eighteen, including the replacement for Vice President-elect Mondale. Ten of the first-termers were Democrats; eight were Republicans. The large-scale rejection of incumbents had not been expected. The nine who lost represented more than one-third of all the incumbents seeking reelection. By

GOVERNORS WHO BECAME PRESIDENT

When George W. Bush was elected president in 2000 and 2004, he continued a recent trend of sitting or former governors advancing to the White House. Between 1976 and 2008, sitting or former governors won seven of the nine presidential elections. The two exceptions were George Bush, father of George W. Bush, and Barack Obama. Over the course of U.S. history, seventeen presidents have served previously as state governors.

Following is a list of these presidents and the states in which they served as governor. Thomas Jefferson's term of governor of Virginia was during the Revolutionary War. Two other presidents served as governors of territories: Andrew Jackson was the territorial governor of Florida and William Henry Harrison was the territorial governor of Indiana.

PRESIDENT	STATE	PRESIDENT	STATE
Thomas Jefferson	Virginia	Theodore Roosevelt	New York
James Monroe	Virginia	Woodrow Wilson	New Jersey
Martin Van Buren	New York	Calvin Coolidge	Massachusetts
John Tyler	Virginia	Franklin D. Roosevelt	New York
James K. Polk	Tennessee	Jimmy Carter	Georgia
Andrew Johnson	Tennessee	Ronald Reagan	California
Rutherford B. Hayes	Ohio	Bill Clinton	Arkansas

some stroke of challengers' luck, virtually every senator who found himself in a difficult race lost.

Three Democratic senators in the "class of 1958"—Vance Hartke of Indiana, Gale W. McGee of Wyoming, and Frank E. Moss of Utah—lost decisively. The other four were easy winners. They were Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Harrison A. Williams Jr. of New Jersey, Howard W. Cannon of Nevada, and Edmund S. Muskie of Maine.

But the group of senators that did worst in 1976 was the Republican "class of 1970," who had won their first terms six years earlier with Nixon administration help. All six senators ran for second terms in 1976, and four were beaten: J. Glenn Beall Jr. of Maryland, Bill Brock of Tennessee, James L. Buckley of New York (elected as a Conservative), and Robert Taft Jr. of Ohio.

The classes of 1958 and 1970 thus accounted for seven of the nine incumbent defeats on November 2. The other two beaten incumbents were Democrats John V. Tunney of California and Joseph M. Montoya of New Mexico.

The ten new Democrats were Dennis DeConcini of Arizona, Spark M. Matsunaga of Hawaii, John Melcher of Montana, Howard M. Metzenbaum of Ohio, Daniel Patrick Moynihan of New York, Donald W. Riegle Jr. of Michigan, Paul S. Sarbanes of Maryland, Jim Sasser of Tennessee, Edward Zorinsky of Nebraska, and Wendell R. Anderson, appointed from Minnesota.

The eight new Republicans were John H. Chafee of Rhode Island, John C. Danforth of Missouri, Orrin G. Hatch of Utah, S.I. "Sam" Hayakawa of California, John Heinz of Pennsylvania, Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, Harrison "Jack" Schmitt of New Mexico, and Malcolm Wallop of Wyoming.

In the House the Democratic freshmen taught the Republicans a lesson in the power of incumbency, winning reelection almost unanimously to ensure a Democratic majority by the same 2–1 margin the party held in the Ninety-fourth Congress. Democrats won 292 House seats, and the Republicans, 143.

The Democratic freshmen used the perquisites of office with consummate skill to build political strength and resist close identification with the rest of Congress and the federal bureaucracy. The nationwide Republican effort to brand them as big-spending radicals flopped and left the House GOP in the same minority status as before the elections.

Only thirteen House incumbents—eight Democrats and five Republicans—lost their seats. This was far below the number retired by the voters in 1974, when thirty-six Republicans and four Democrats were defeated in the Watergate landslide that raised the Democrats to overwhelming dominance in the chamber.

The majority of the open Democratic seats were safe, while most of the Republican ones were up for grabs, and many were won by the Democrats. The GOP held onto only nine of its seventeen seats while winning three held by Democrats, for a net loss of five in this open category.

In gubernatorial races the Democrats gained one more governorship, defeating Republican candidates in nine states out of the fourteen. The new lineup was thirty-seven Democrats, twelve Republicans, and one Independent, James B. Longley of Maine. Most of the races for governor ended as expected. Voters reelected five incumbents, defeated two others, and elected nine new governors.

The one real upset was in Missouri, where Democrat Joseph P. Teasdale defeated Republican governor Christopher S. “Kit” Bond by 13,000 votes. Bond, Missouri’s first GOP governor since World War II, was expected to win a second term.

Four states—Montana, North Dakota, Utah, and Washington—chose Ford over Carter but elected Democratic governors. Delaware voted for Carter but elected a Republican as governor.

1977–1979: The Ninety-Fifth Congress

With a new and unknown president taking office in January 1977, Congress and the nation waited expectantly to see how Carter would tackle the intractable problems of energy and the economy. In addition, the new president would have to work out a constructive relationship with a Congress that had asserted its power after a long period of presidential dominance. It was also a Congress that had selected new Democratic leadership on both sides of the Capitol, caused by the retirement of Senate majority leader Mike Mansfield, D-Mont., and House Speaker Carl Albert, D-Okla.

In foreign affairs the country was at peace, but the administration had to plunge into the labyrinths of relations with the Soviet Union and China and wrestle with attempts to achieve peace in the Middle East.

Carter did not hesitate to get to work on these difficult problems, early proposing an economic stimulus package and an energy program. It soon became clear, however, that major roadblocks stood in the way of enacting significant legislation, especially in the energy area.

The lack of consensus on crucial issues, both in Congress and among the public, was one problem. Another was the continued rivalry between the legislative and executive branches, with congressional leaders accusing the new administration of ineptness and lack of leadership and the executive pointing to Congress’s inherent inability to lead.

The partial deadlock reflected the malaise of a country that seemed to be ending its era of predominance in the world and continued economic expansion at home. How the country would cope with the new era remained unclear at the close of 1978.

The House installed Thomas P. “Tip” O’Neill Jr., D-Mass., as Speaker. In a sharp contest for House majority leader, moderate representative Jim Wright of Texas won out. In the Senate, Democratic whip Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia was chosen unanimously as the new majority leader. Republicans also had a leadership contest for Senate minority leader, with Sen. Howard H. Baker Jr., R-Tenn., the victor.

In January 1978 President Carter presented Congress with his major tax cut and reform program. After working on taxes most of the year, Congress gave final approval October 15 to an $18.7 billion tax cut for 1979 that included a substantial reduction in the tax on capital gains. The bill provided individual income tax reductions that were designed to offset Social Security and inflation-induced tax increases for 1979. In addition, it provided about 4.3 million taxpayers—mostly in the middle- and upper-income ranges—with generous capital gains tax reductions. For businesses, the bill included a reduction in corporate income tax rates and expanded investment tax credits.

In April 1977 Carter introduced his energy policy. For most of 1978 the measure was bogged down in the conference committee trying to resolve differences over the natural gas pricing section. Finally, on October 15, 1978, Congress cleared the bill and sent it to the president.

In summer 1977 a political scandal hit the Carter administration that damaged the president’s popularity. Questions were raised in the press about the propriety of a number of transactions that Bert Lance, Carter’s director of the Office of Management and Budget, had engaged in during his banking career. The Lance matter preoccupied the White House until Lance’s resignation in September 1977.

The Carter administration in 1977 laid the groundwork for two treaties with Panama, which were ratified by the Senate in April 1978. One would turn over the Panama Canal to Panama by 2000; the second guaranteed the U.S. right to defend the canal after that date.

Carter’s greatest foreign policy triumph came in September 1978 when he met at Camp David with Egyptian president Anwar Sadat and Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin to hammer out the outlines of a Middle East peace. The success of that effort gave Carter a major boost in prestige and in the polls, and it laid the groundwork for a possible solution to the thirty-year-old Middle East conflict.

President Carter had one more big foreign policy surprise for 1978. In a joint communiqué issued December 15, the United States and the People’s Republic of China announced that they would formally recognize each other January 1, 1979, and would exchange ambassadors and establish embassies March 1. This announcement ended another long-standing dispute: the thirty-eight-year refusal of the United States to recognize the Communists as the rulers of China.

The 1978 Midterm Elections

Republicans in the 1978 midterm campaign were curiously unable to capitalize on their carefully developed issues in what ought to have been their kind of year. Without a Republican president to have to defend, GOP congressional candidates were free to run against every branch of the federal government, an approach that brought them enormous gains the last time they tried it, in 1966. Besides, the rise of tax resentment gave them a drum to beat, and they pounded on it in virtually every contested congressional district in the country.

Humiliated by their failure to gain any House or Senate seats at all in 1976, Republicans redesigned their strategy for the 1978 campaign. In the House they abandoned their attempts to defeat many of the Democrats first elected in 1974, switching to place their emphasis on older incumbents weak in constituent service and name identification. In both the House and Senate they involved themselves in primaries to see that promising candidates won.

But Republican leaders made one other decision that did not work as well as they had hoped: they chose to base congressional campaigns throughout the country on a plan, proposed by Rep. Jack F. Kemp of New York and Sen. William V. Roth Jr. of Delaware, to cut federal income taxes by one-third. It was difficult to find a Republican nominee in any contested state or district who did not talk about Kemp-Roth.

The Republican approach allowed Democratic opponents to seize the popular side of the issue by charging that a Kemp-Roth tax cut was inflationary. Democrats insisted that spending cuts were the proper course, co-opting normal Republican rhetoric.

Results of the 1978 Elections

The 1978 elections produced a Republican gain of three seats in the Senate, along with the second largest freshman Senate class in the history of popular elections. The new Senate lineup for the Ninety-sixth Congress was fifty-nine Democrats and forty-one Republicans. The Democratic total included Harry F. Byrd Jr. of Virginia, elected as an Independent. While the GOP increase was not overwhelming, it was slightly greater than what GOP officials themselves expected a year before.

The GOP newcomers included Nancy Landon Kassebaum of Kansas, the first woman elected to the Senate without being preceded in Congress by her husband, and Thad Cochran, the first Republican senator elected in Mississippi since 1875. The only African American in the Senate during the Ninety-fifth Congress, Edward W. Brooke of Massachusetts, was defeated.

The large freshman classes of 1976 and 1978 differed markedly from their counterparts of the previous generation. The new freshman classes represented no distinct national trends. The 1976 class of eighteen was composed of eight Republicans and ten Democrats, and the 1978 newcomers included eleven Republicans and nine Democrats. The large Senate turnover in the 1970s meant that nearly half the members—forty-eight—were in their first terms as of January 1979.

The most notable conservative gains in the Senate occurred in Iowa, where Republican Roger Jepsen unseated incumbent Dick Clark, and in New Hampshire, where incumbent Democrat Thomas J. McIntyre lost to Gordon Humphrey.

The Democratic class of 1972 turned out to be somewhat more vulnerable than the Republican group. Democrats lost Clark, William D. Hathaway of Maine, and Floyd K. Haskell of Colorado. In addition to their defeats, the seat of retiring Democratic senator James Abourezk of South Dakota was captured by the Republicans.

Freshmen Democrats included Howell Heflin and Donald Stewart (both of Alabama), David Pryor (Arkansas), Paul E. Tsongas (Massachusetts), Carl Levin (Michigan), Max Baucus (Montana), J. James Exon (Nebraska), Bill Bradley (New Jersey), and David L. Boren (Oklahoma). Republican newcomers were William L. Armstrong (Colorado), William S. Cohen (Maine), Rudy Boschwitz and David Durenberger (Minnesota), Larry Pressler (South Dakota), John Warner (Virginia), and Alan K. Simpson (Wyoming).

In the House, Republicans made modest inroads on the lopsided Democratic majority, making a net gain of eleven seats. But Democrats remained in firm control, winning 277 seats to 158 for the GOP. With a record fifty-eight open seats in the House, Republicans hoped to make their biggest gains in the thirty-nine open districts held by Democrats. But that strategy brought only a net gain of two, as Republicans captured eight Democratic-held open seats but lost six of their nineteen vacant seats to the Democrats.

Campaigning against incumbents, usually a harder task, proved surprisingly successful for the GOP, as fourteen Democratic House members were defeated, compared to five Republicans. It was the largest number of Democratic defeats since 1966, when thirty-nine House Democrats, many of them brought in during the 1964 presidential landslide, lost their jobs.

In gubernatorial politics Republicans moved a step closer to respectability, increasing the number of statehouses under their control from twelve to eighteen. William Clements's upset election in Texas, Richard L. Thornburgh's come-from-behind triumph in Pennsylvania, and James A. Rhodes's narrow survival in Ohio guaranteed that the GOP would enter the 1980 election year with governors in five of the ten "megastates." That news diluted the Republican disappointment at failing to oust Democratic governor Hugh L. Carey in New York or even to come close against incumbent Democrat Jerry Brown in California.

1979–1981: The Ninety-Sixth Congress

The first session of the Ninety-sixth Congress passed into history as a contradiction. Members came to Washington in 1979 spurred by a nationwide antigovernment mood. Legislators, even some of the more liberal ones, talked bravely of the need to limit federal spending. Contrary to the rhetoric, which continued throughout the year, that session of Congress voted for massive new spending efforts and laid the groundwork for significant new federal involvement in the lives of American businesses and citizens.

The most massive expansion of the federal role was in the package of energy legislation, which was the focus of congressional debate most of the year. It called for spending billions of dollars on synthetic fuels development and imposing a major federal presence in the energy industry. It also was a year when advocates of more defense spending finally recouped from the travails of the Vietnam era and won a pledge of extra billions for the military from a president who initially opposed such increases.

Support for the energy package was grounded in troubled U.S. relations with oil-exporting nations and a continuing upward spiral in the cost of imported oil. Those trends were exacerbated by the crumbling of relations between the United States and Iran after militant Iranians seized the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and held fifty-three Americans hostage for the return of that nation's deposed shah, Mohammed Reza Pahlavi.

Advocates of higher defense spending, using the Iranian hostage situation as an example, argued more vigorously than ever before that America's strength and influence in the world were declining and that U.S. military strength was falling far behind that of the Soviet Union.

But if Congress acted with determination on energy and some other issues, it acted virtually not at all on the economic troubles of the nation. Faced with double-digit inflation and the threatened onset of a recession, Congress—much like the president—did not seem to know what to do. It appeared both were marking time until 1980 to decide whether federal action would help or worsen America's economic problems.

Congress showed little interest in social, consumer, and environmental legislation. The realization was growing that the federal budget was not open-ended and that government spending decisions required some distasteful choices. Nevertheless, members approved Carter's request to create a separate Department of Education.

In 1980, facing an aggressive and unified Republican Party and worried by its own reputation for big spending, the Democratic-controlled Congress began the election year concentrating on trimming programs in order to balance the federal budget. A recession combined with spiraling inflation soon dashed the Democrats' balanced-budget hopes. But these new economic woes also did nothing to encourage the Democrats to resume pushing for some of their favorite programs. In addition, because of escalating campaign pressures, Democratic leaders delayed until after the election consideration of the budget and a number of other key bills.

By year's end, however, the Democrats found their scheme had backfired. Instead of rewarding them for their restraint, the elections had deprived them of their control of the White House and Senate and put them in a substantially weaker position in the House in 1981.

The 1980 Campaigns

President Carter won enough delegates in his party's primaries and caucuses to win the Democratic presidential nomination. But he faced significant opposition at the convention from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts. Carter led Kennedy throughout the primary season, but as the convention neared, the momentum seemed to be with Kennedy. Although Carter continued to win more caucus delegates, Kennedy won five of the last eight primaries, which kept him in contention.

At the same time, the president's position in the popularity polls dropped, and Carter found himself in the midst of an embarrassing controversy over his brother Billy's connection with the Libyan government.

Alarmed by Carter's apparently diminishing reelection prospects, several party leaders grew concerned that a Carter defeat in November would drag down dozens of state and local candidates across the country. They called for an "open convention" that could nominate a compromise candidate. They also teamed up with Senator Kennedy to urge defeat of a proposed convention rule that would bind all delegates to vote on the first ballot for the candidate under whose banner they were elected.

When the convention opened, Carter could count 1,981.1 delegates pledged to him—315 more than he needed for the nomination. Kennedy had 1,225.8 delegates, and the only chance he had to gain the nomination was to defeat the rule. There were 122.1 uncommitted delegates and two for other candidates.

In the days before the convention opened Kennedy strategists claimed that there were continuing defections from the Carter camp. On Sunday they said they were within fifty to a hundred votes of the majority needed to overturn the rule binding the delegates. But the Kennedy predictions and hopes proved to be exaggerated. The final tally on the rule showed 1,936,418 delegates favoring the binding rule and 1,390,580 opposing it. Passage of the rule ensured Carter's renomination. Shortly after the vote, Kennedy ended his nine-month challenge to the president by announcing that his name would not be placed in nomination on August 13.

But Kennedy did not withdraw from the platform debate. The bitterly contested party platform pitted Carter against Kennedy and a coalition of special interest groups. The final document was filled with so many concessions to the Kennedy forces that it won only a halfhearted endorsement from the president.

Kennedy capped his platform victories with an August 12 appearance before the delegates in which he presented a stunning speech to a tumultuous ovation. His speech created a sense of enormous energy within the hall and left the feeling that a significant political event had occurred.

By the following day Carter began to reassert control over the convention. In a statement issued just hours after the platform debate ended, the president refused to accept—as diplomatically as possible—many of the platform revisions. In his carefully worded statement, Carter did not flatly reject any of Kennedy's amendments, but he did not embrace them either. Carter concluded his statement with the unity refrain that had become the hallmark of every White House comment on the platform since the drafting process began: "The differences within our party on this platform are small in comparison with the differences between the Republican and Democratic party platforms."

Carter won his party's presidential nomination on the first ballot, and his vice president, Walter F. Mondale, easily won renomination. Kennedy pledged his support and even made a brief appearance at the podium with Carter and Mondale as the convention drew to a close. But it was uncertain whether the appeals for unity had succeeded.

On the Republican side Ronald Reagan had carefully cultivated an image as the presumed GOP front-runner for 1980 from the day President Ford was defeated by Carter in 1976. During the primaries Reagan lost only four of the state preference primaries he entered. In states that chose their delegates in caucuses, Reagan was even more impressive, winning just under 400 of the 478 delegates picked by caucuses. But it was in the early primaries that Reagan was able to pare the field from a half-dozen major candidates to just two.

In South Carolina on March 8 Reagan knocked former Texas governor John B. Connally out of the race. Ten days later he deflated John B. Anderson's surging campaign with a victory in the representative's home state of Illinois. A similar result two weeks later in Wisconsin forced Anderson out of the GOP contest and into an unsuccessful independent bid for the White House.

After four quick defeats Senate minority leader Howard H. Baker Jr. of Tennessee dropped out. Neither Rep. Philip M. Crane of Illinois nor Sen. Robert J. "Bob" Dole of Kansas had ever caught the voters' attention. On March 15 former president Gerald Ford put to rest growing speculation that he might jump into the race in an effort to stop Reagan. By April the GOP contest was reduced to former Texas representative George H. W. Bush's frantic efforts to catch Reagan in a few major states. It was too little, too late.

Having outdistanced all the competition, Reagan easily won his party's 1980 nomination at the Republican National Convention in Detroit. Reagan won on the first ballot, receiving 1,939 of the 1,994 delegate votes. His nomination was then made unanimous.

The unusual anticipation over the selection of the vice-presidential nominee provided the only suspense at the convention. Rumors circulated that Ford was being tapped for the second spot. Ford himself had encouraged that speculation, although he declined to spell out his conditions. It became clear he wanted responsibilities that would have made him, in effect, co-president with Reagan. Late on July 16 the Reagan-Ford arrangement fell apart, and the two men agreed that it would be better for Ford to campaign for the GOP ticket than to be a member of it. The speculation prompted Reagan to make an unusual visit to the convention hall at 12:15 a.m. on July 17 to announce his choice of George H.W. Bush as his running mate.

The American hostage crisis was injected into the campaign in the eleventh hour when Iranian leaders miscalculated that Carter would accept their demands in return for release of the hostages before election day. Although Carter tried to keep the negotiations—which reached a peak during the weekend before November 4—out of the campaign, the publicity given them so close to the election worked against the president.

But what hurt Carter the most, in the opinion of many analysts, was his inability to improve the state of the economy. Throughout the fall campaign, Reagan blamed Carter for almost tripling the inflation rate he had inherited from the Ford administration. During 1980 the rate averaged about 13 percent.

Results of the 1980 Elections

No one publicly forecast the rout that developed election night. Reagan's triumph was nationwide. In most of the states that were expected to be close or to go for Carter, Reagan won, frequently by comfortable margins. In states Reagan was expected to carry, he won overwhelmingly. Reagan easily carried every region of the country, including the keystones of Carter's victory four years before—the industrial Northeast and the president's native South.

Reagan carried forty-four states in all, for a total of 489 electoral votes. Carter, the first Democratic incumbent president denied reelection since 1888, won only six states and the District of Columbia for a total of forty-nine electoral votes.

The Republican victory did not stop with the presidency. The GOP won control of the Senate for the first time in a quarter-century. Although the Democrats retained their majority in the House, the national shift to the political right combined with a variety of scandals, complacency by some incumbents, and unusually strong Reagan coattails cost the Democrats a net loss of thirty-three seats in the House. That made the Republicans twenty-six seats shy of controlling the House, although conservative Democrats were expected to give the GOP an ideological edge on many issues.

The twelve Senate seats won by Republicans represented the largest net gain in the Senate for any party since 1958, when the Democrats took control over fifteen new seats. The new lineup was fifty-three Republicans and forty-seven Democrats. The 1980 GOP Senate victory was the first since 1952 and ended the longest one-party dominance of the Senate in American history.

In addition to their increases the Republicans held on to the ten seats that were up in 1980. That included holding three open seats in Pennsylvania, Oklahoma, and North Dakota and the New York seat of Republican senator Jacob K. Javits, who was defeated for renomination in the primary but ran for reelection on the Liberal Party ticket.

Democrats had twenty-four seats up in 1980 and lost half of them. Not only would the Senate be more Republican; it would be noticeably more conservative. Several pillars of Democratic liberalism went down to defeat, including George McGovern of South Dakota, Warren G. Magnuson of Washington, and John C. Culver of Iowa.

To replace the Democrats, Republicans elected a freshman Senate class made up largely of dedicated conservatives. Representatives Charles E. Grassley of Iowa, Steven D. Symms of Idaho, James Abdnor of South Dakota, and Robert W. Kasten Jr. of Wisconsin had compiled distinctively conservative records in the House. John P. East of North Carolina, an expert in conservative political thought, was expected to carry out his beliefs in the Senate.

But there was a contingent of Republican moderates that could leaven some of the conservative impulses. Warren Rudman of New Hampshire, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, and Slade Gorton of Washington all were from the moderate wing of their party.

Among the losing Democrats were four of the six prime targets of the National Conservative Political Action Committee, which prepared hard-hitting ads attacking the records of liberal senators. The targeted senators were Birch Bayh of Indiana, Culver of Iowa, McGovern of South Dakota, Thomas F. Eagleton of Missouri, Frank Church of Idaho, and Alan Cranston of California. Bayh, Culver, McGovern, and Church went down to defeat.

In the House the lineup going into the election was 273 Democrats to 159 Republicans. There also were three vacancies that had been held by Democrats. After the November vote, the new lineup was 243 Democrats to 192 Republicans. The Democratic total included one Independent.

The Republican net gain of thirty-three seats was the largest increase for the GOP since 1966. Most of the GOP gains came at the expense of incumbents. In all, thirty-one of the 392 incumbents running for reelection were turned out. Of those, twenty-seven were Democrats who lost to Republicans. Only three incumbent Republicans were defeated.

There were seventy-four new faces in the new House, three fewer than in 1978. Republican freshmen had the edge with fifty-two seats, compared to twenty-two for the Democrats. Four new women—all Republicans—were elected, bringing the total number of women in the House to nineteen. There were four black freshmen, for a total of seventeen black voting members. All were Democrats.

Republicans increased their hold on governorships by four states, bringing their nationwide total to twenty-three. Democrats still maintained a lead, with twenty-seven governors' chairs. The Republican additions came in states west of the Mississippi River: Arkansas, Missouri, North Dakota, and Washington.

The Republican gain continued the party's gradual comeback on the gubernatorial level. After 1968, when the party won thirty-one governorships compared with the Democrats' nineteen, GOP gubernatorial fortunes slid to a low of twelve in 1977. The party began to make gains again in 1978, boosting its total by six. In 1979 the GOP added another governor in Louisiana.

Despite the party's success in gubernatorial races, Republicans advanced only negligibly in state legislatures, which were to redraw political boundaries in post-1980 census redistricting.

1981–1983: The Ninety-Seventh Congress

Dominated by Republicans for the first time in two and a half decades and guided by a forceful and popular president, Congress took bold steps in 1981 toward reducing the federal government's scope. Following the wishes of President Reagan, the Ninety-seventh Congress slashed government spending, cut taxes for individuals and business, and slimmed down federal regulatory activities.

The 1980 elections not only swept a conservative Republican into the White House but also floated the GOP into its first Senate majority since January 1955. The change in control meant that committee leadership shifted to the Republicans and that the Democrats were relegated to minority leadership. The new Senate majority leader was Howard H. Baker Jr. of Tennessee.

In the House the Democrats, under the leadership of Tip O'Neill of Massachusetts, were still in the majority, though by a slimmer margin, 243–192, than they enjoyed in the previous Congress. However, the conservative leanings of many of their numbers made the Democratic leadership's grasp on House proceedings tentative at times.

When Reagan entered office in January 1981, he laid out what appeared to some to be contradictory goals for his presidency. To revitalize the economy and strengthen the nation, he would cut federal spending yet increase spending for defense, reduce taxes yet balance the budget. Many traditional Republicans in Congress were uneasy with this “supply-side” economic approach. But the GOP leaders in both houses proved to be effective and loyal lieutenants for their president.

Congress enacted $35.2 billion in fiscal 1982 program reductions, cut nearly $4 billion more from appropriations, approved a cut in individual and business taxes totaling $749 billion over a five-year period, and added about $18 billion to the fiscal 1982 defense budget drafted by President Carter the year before. But the federal deficit for the year appeared to be heading over the $100 billion mark, and the economy was in recession. In the process of getting his program enacted, Reagan exhausted his winning coalition, stretched congressional procedures out of shape, and bruised sensitive legislative egos.

Almost all the sweeping budget cuts Congress approved were made in one package, the budget “reconciliation” bill. The use of the reconciliation method in such a massive way was criticized by some members as an abuse of the budget process. The budget bill touched on virtually every federal activity except defense. Included in it were a multitude of changes in existing law, including provisions to tighten eligibility for public assistance, cut funds for subsidized housing programs, reduce school lunch subsidies, and cut Medicaid payments to the states.

In September, when Reagan proposed a second package of $13 billion in further spending cuts and $3 billion in unspecified revenue increases for 1982, the president's coalition began to crumble. Even members who had worked hard for Reagan's first round of cuts had no stomach for a second in a single year. Moderate House Republicans threatened to desert him unless he shielded their pet programs. Conservative Democrats threatened to bail out over the growing deficit, and the Reagan team was split over the question of tax increases.

The president maintained symbolic pressure on Congress to make additional spending cuts, even bringing the government to a halt for a day in late November by vetoing a temporary funding resolution. But Congress was unwilling to make the cuts he demanded. The appropriations process ground to a halt, and the government limped through the end of the year on a series of temporary funding resolutions.

On defense, Congress granted Reagan's request for significant spending increases. The $200 billion fiscal 1982 defense appropriation was the largest peacetime appropriations bill ever approved.

Congress grew increasingly independent of the White House in 1982. The legislators adhered to President Reagan's general course of restraining domestic programs while increasing military spending, but they rejected many of the president's specific proposals. They substantially rewrote Reagan's fiscal 1983 budget and persuaded the president to support a large tax increase only a year after passing his three-year tax cut plan.

While modifying or rejecting many of Reagan's requests, Congress did not originate much of its own legislation in 1982. Faced with soaring federal deficits, members spent a lot of their time defending existing programs from budget cuts rather than trying to create new ones.

The 1982 Midterm Elections

The 1982 midterm elections produced major change in the House but left the Senate comparatively untouched. A combination of redistricting and recession produced a huge crop of eighty-one House freshmen, fifty-seven of them Democrats. In the previous thirty years only three other elections had brought in that many new Democrats.

Redistricting played a major role in 1982. This was the election in which reapportionment, the rise of the Sun Belt, and the decline of the Frost Belt were supposed to catch up with the Democrats, setting in motion a decade of conservative and Republican advance of power in the House. But it did not work out that way.

The Sun Belt proved the Republicans' greatest disappointment. The nationwide shift in population away from the industrial North gave southern and western states seventeen new districts, and the GOP at one time hoped to take at least a dozen of them. But Democratic legislative cartography and unfriendly federal court action got in the way, and in the end Democrats won ten of the seventeen.

Results of the 1982 Elections

The only thing remarkable about the 1982 Senate results was the sheer absence of change. Not only did the party ratio remain the same—fifty-four Republicans and forty-six Democrats—but ninety-five of the one hundred senators were incumbents. The class of five newcomers was the smallest in the sixty-eight-year history of popular Senate elections.

That stability was itself a dramatic reversal of recent election trends. During the previous decade a Senate seat had been one of the most difficult offices in U.S. politics to hold. While reelection rates for House incumbents regularly had run above 85 percent, senators struggled against well-financed challengers and effective special interest groups.

The Senate outcome was neither the “ratifying” election that Republicans had hoped for after their landslide of 1980 nor the “correcting” election that Democrats had wanted. But there were favorable results for both parties. Republicans kept their beachhead on Capitol Hill, ensuring that Reagan would be the first Republican president since Herbert Hoover to have a GOP Senate majority throughout his four-year term.

Democrats broke even in an election that could have relegated them to minority status in the Senate for a long time. Of the thirty-three seats that were contested in 1982, the Democrats were defending nineteen. They ended up winning 60.6 percent of the races.

In the House, Democrats scored a twenty-six-seat gain, as voters expressed antipathy toward President Reagan’s economic program but stopped short of repudiating it altogether. The outcome revealed an unusual degree of voter frustration with a party only two years into national power.

Democrats won 269 seats to 166 seats for the GOP, giving the Democrats a 103-seat advantage. Going into the election, Democrats held 241 seats and Republicans 192, with vacancies in two districts formerly occupied by Democrats. Twenty-six Republican incumbents and three sitting Democrats were beaten, nearly a mirror image of the 1980 election, in which the GOP lost three incumbents and unseated twenty-eight Democratic members.

Hurt by losses in the economically distressed Midwest, Republicans saw their hold on the nation’s governorships dwindle to sixteen in the November 2 elections. The Democrats controlled statehouses in thirty-four states. The GOP’s net loss of seven statehouses—the party dropped nine and picked up two—ended a comeback in the party’s gubernatorial fortunes. Republicans had been posting gains since 1977, when they hit a low point of twelve governors’ chairs.

Of the Republican governors’ seats that switched to the Democrats, five were in the Midwest, where the recession had been most acute, hitting both manufacturing and farming. Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Ohio, and Wisconsin opted for Democrats. Republican incumbents were retiring in all these states except Nebraska, where Gov. Charles Thone was turned out.

Republicans also encountered a setback in their progress in the South. They held four of the region’s thirteen governorships in 1982; in 1983 they had just two. Only Tennessee’s Lamar Alexander won reelection.

In addition, Democrats took over GOP governors’ seats in Alaska and Nevada. Republicans assumed power in California, where George Deukmejian edged out Democrat Tom Bradley, and in New Hampshire, where GOP challenger John H. Sununu unseated Democratic incumbent Hugh Gallen. Each party had six open seats at stake. Democrats held all theirs except for California. Republicans managed to retain only Iowa.

Democrats also turned the tables on the GOP in state legislative elections, regaining most of the chambers taken by the Republicans in the previous two elections and ending a six-year decline in the number of legislatures under Democratic control.

1983–1985: The Ninety-Eighth Congress

Congress and President Reagan generally kept to their own turf in 1983, each going about business with little involvement from the other side. Unlike the first two years of the Reagan administration, when the president essentially wrote the economic script, Congress conducted its 1983 debate on deficits without Reagan’s overt participation. While Congress tried to assert itself on foreign policy, Reagan consistently called the global shots.

There were important bipartisan agreements in 1983 on Social Security, jobs legislation, the War Powers Resolution, and fiscal 1984 appropriations bills. But these were rare commodities in a year in which political motivations ranked above policy considerations.

The prime example of this dilemma was the way Congress and Reagan reacted to massive federal deficits. No matter how many experts said soaring deficits hurt the economy, few people were willing to take the politically risky steps needed to cure the problem. Reagan made a calculated decision to stay out of the deficit debate, thereby ducking any responsibility for tax increases his advisers viewed as a 1984 election liability. Antideficit rhetoric was a constant refrain among legislators, but Congress took little decisive action on the issue.

Standing behind Reagan, House Speaker O’Neill in September helped push through a measure allowing the president to keep U.S. troops in Lebanon for up to eighteen months. In backing Reagan on Lebanon, Congress for the first time invoked major parts of the 1973 War Powers Resolution. On October 23, 241 U.S. Marines, sailors, and soldiers and fifty-eight French paratroopers were killed by a terrorist truck bomb in Beirut. Subsequent efforts to revise or revoke the measure keeping troops in Lebanon failed in both houses. Under congressional pressure, Reagan announced in February 1984 that he had ordered the troop withdrawal.

Congress reluctantly continued to back Reagan’s policy in Nicaragua. The House twice voted to force Reagan to stop backing rightist forces that were fighting to overthrow that country’s leftist government. When the Senate refused to go along, a compromise was reached limiting aid to the rebels and requiring Reagan to seek explicit approval from Congress for additional aid.

Reagan won widespread approval in both chambers for the October 25 invasion of the Caribbean island of Grenada. The president said the invasion was necessary to protect some one thousand Americans, mostly medical students, from civil strife that erupted following the murder of Marxist prime minister Maurice Bishop.

Reagan was victorious in most of his defense fights with Congress. He won the go-ahead for production of the MX missile, although the House came within a handful of votes of killing funding for the project.

On domestic issues Reagan met many disappointments on Capitol Hill in 1984. The president could not persuade Congress to approve his social agenda, which featured constitutional amendments to ban abortion and allow school prayer. Nor did Congress adopt his plan to give tuition tax credits to parents who sent their children to private schools or his enterprise zone system to provide tax relief to businesses that created jobs in depressed areas.

One of the biggest problems remained the massive federal deficit. Although Congress took actions designed to reduce the deficit by $149 billion over three years, the tax increases and spending cuts were viewed as a mere “down payment” on a larger remedy. While legislators spent much of 1984 talking about the evils of the swelling federal deficit, they took only a first step toward a cure. Instead, many members figured they would deal with the problem in 1985, after the November elections.

The 1984 Campaigns

The focus in the early months of the presidential election was not on Reagan but on the Democratic candidates seeking their party's nomination. Sen. Alan Cranston of California was the first to toss his hat in the ring formally, announcing his candidacy February 2, 1983. But Walter Mondale had informally started his campaign shortly after he and President Jimmy Carter lost to Reagan and George H. W. Bush in 1980.

Mondale was never particularly popular with the voters. His public personality and speaking style were bland, his traditional “New Deal” Democratic message seemed stale and, to many, ineffective, and his identification as a candidate of the special interests led voters to look closely and often approvingly at Mondale's competitors.

Before the primaries began, Mondale's main opponent seemed to be John Glenn, senator from Ohio and former astronaut. But the first delegate selection event of the season, the Iowa precinct caucuses of February 20, was disastrous for Glenn as well as for two other conservative Democrats in the race, South Carolina senator Ernest F. Hollings and former Florida governor Reubin Askew. Together these three drew less than 10 percent of the vote. In New Hampshire a week later the results for Glenn, Hollings, and Askew were just as discouraging. Hollings and Askew withdrew from the race.

Other challenges came from Colorado senator Gary Hart and from George McGovern, the former South Dakota senator whose losing 1972 presidential campaign Hart had managed. Glenn and McGovern withdrew from the race after Super Tuesday, leaving in contention Mondale, Hart, and the Rev. Jesse Jackson, the first black to pursue seriously the presidential nomination of any major political party.

Hart's momentum was blunted almost as quickly as it began. In the week after Super Tuesday, he ran behind Mondale in six of seven delegate selection events. Then Mondale got a much-needed boost by winning the New York and Pennsylvania primaries. His chance to eliminate Hart evaporated when Hart won Ohio and Indiana. Mondale continued to lead in the number of delegates committed to him, and with his win in New Jersey June 5 he had enough delegates to win the nomination. But his campaign ended on the same lackluster note that had characterized most of the last four months; the same day Mondale claimed the nomination, Hart won three other primaries including California's.

Despite the difficult, sometimes bitter, primary season campaign, Democrats mustered a display of party unity at their convention in San Francisco and made a historic vice-presidential choice. The Democratic National Convention picked Mondale to be the party standard bearer against President Reagan. As in much of his drive for the nomination, Mondale was almost overshadowed again, this time by the attention generated by his selection of New York representative Geraldine A. Ferraro to be his running mate. Ferraro was the first woman ever chosen for the national ticket by a major party.

President Reagan enjoyed the smoothest road to renomination that any presidential candidate could have. Brimming with confidence that President Reagan and Vice President Bush would be “the winning team” in November, a jubilant Republican Party held its convention in Dallas August 20–23. With the ticket's renomination certain beforehand, the convention was more a celebration for GOP activists than a business meeting. Criticisms from the party's shrinking band of moderates, worried by the strongly conservative tone of the platform, did little to dispel the optimistic mood of delegates, who looked forward with confidence to Reagan's easy reelection victory.

Highlights of the fall campaign were the two presidential debates. The first, held October 7, was focused on domestic issues. Mondale made a strong showing, which lessened his negative image. Equally important was the perception that Reagan turned in a poor performance; the seventy-three-year-old president seemed tired and disorganized, leading journalists and Democrats to suggest that age was catching up with Reagan.

The second debate, on October 21, focusing on foreign affairs, was a draw in the opinion of most analysts. The debate was not a significant boost to Mondale's campaign, and it allowed Reagan to ease concerns about his age and competence raised by his performance during the first debate. The vice-presidential candidates also held a nationally televised debate, on October 11. Most analysts viewed it as a draw or gave a slight edge to Bush.

Almost every thrust Mondale made was effectively parried by his Republican opponents. Mondale's efforts to draw attention to the massive budget deficits run up during Reagan's first term by promising a tax increase did not stand a chance against Reagan's promise not to raise taxes. Similarly, Mondale's attempts to paint Reagan as a man who favored the rich over the poor, the majority over the minority, did not overcome charges that Mondale was a tool of the special interests.

In the end perhaps no Democrat could have defeated Reagan in 1984. For one thing most voters thought they were better off than they had been four years earlier. (Reagan first asked that question during his 1980 run against Carter and Mondale.) Perhaps more important, voters seemed to respond to Reagan's upbeat attitude and his promise of continued peace and prosperity.

Results of the 1984 Elections

There was never much doubt that Reagan, one of the most popular presidents in American history, would win reelection in 1984. It would be hard to imagine a vote more decisive than the balloting that gave him his victory. Winning all but one state, he drew 59 percent of the popular vote, and he won a record 525 electoral votes.

Despite the size of Reagan's victory, its meaning remained unclear. The vote clearly exposed the Democrats' limited appeal in presidential elections. On the other hand, Democrats held their own in other elections. In the Senate, rather than gaining as most presidents do, Reagan lost two seats, reducing the Republican majority to 53–47. In the House of Representatives the president's party gained fourteen seats, far short of the historical average for landslides. The GOP gained one governor for a lineup of sixteen Republicans and thirty-four Democrats. Only in the state legislatures did the Republican Party make gains that could be considered significant.

Neither the Republicans nor the Democrats came away with quite what they wanted from the 1984 struggle for control of the Senate. Democrats had hoped to regain the majority they lost in 1980, when Republicans took control of the Senate for the first time since the 1954 elections. Republicans hoped that President Reagan's march to reelection would bring about a modest reprise of 1980, making the GOP hold on the Senate more secure.

But in this election Reagan was no trailblazer. Democrats retained thirteen of the fourteen seats they were defending, and a trio of Democratic House members captured Republican seats: Illinois representative Paul Simon edged out Sen. Charles H. Percy; Iowa representative Tom Harkin defeated Sen. Roger W. Jepsen; and Tennessee representative Albert "Al" Gore Jr. took the seat being vacated by Senate majority leader Howard H. Baker Jr. Countering the good news for the Democrats was an unexpected outcome in Kentucky: the defeat of Sen. Walter "Dee" Huddleston at the hands of Mitch McConnell.

Thus Democrats won a net gain of two Senate seats, shifting the party ratio to fifty-three Republicans and forty-seven Democrats. That standing was an improvement over the preelection ratio of 55–45 but a comedown from the Democrats' 1983 prediction that the party could recapture Senate control by picking up a number of Republican seats Democrats regarded as shaky.

As it turned out, Democrats failed to win most of the GOP seats in the "at risk" category. The biggest Democratic disappointment came in North Carolina, where GOP incumbent Jesse Helms narrowly won his bitter battle with Democratic governor James B. Hunt Jr. It was the most expensive Senate contest up to that time, with the campaigns spending a total of about $22 million.

In four other key states where Democrats had hoped to pull upsets, Republicans prevailed easily: Mississippi senator Thad Cochran won against former governor William Winter; Sen. Gordon J. Humphrey won a second term in New Hampshire; Texas representative Phil Gramm, who switched parties in 1983, replaced retiring GOP senator John Tower; and Sen. Rudy Boschwitz took 58 percent of the vote in Minnesota, encountering no problems with Mondale's coattails because the Democratic presidential nominee barely carried his home state.

For the second time in a little more than a decade, Republicans watched with disappointment as their presidential standard bearer swept triumphantly across the nation followed by a threadbare retinue of new U.S. House members. The November 6 elections revealed considerable hesitation nationwide over an all-out endorsement of Republican policies, as voters in district after district stopped short of backing GOP challengers who campaigned on their loyalty to Reagan. After several closely contested battles were decided, Republicans had gained fourteen seats, falling well short of making up the twenty-six seats they lost in the 1982 midterm elections. One seat, still undecided at year's end, eventually remained Democratic.

Not counting the undecided seat, Democrats retained control of the House with 252 members to the GOP's 182. Going into the election, Democrats held 266 seats and Republicans 167, with vacancies in a New Jersey district previously held by a Republican and in a Kentucky district held by a Democrat. Those seats stayed in their respective parties' hands and were filled for the remainder of the term in special elections. As a result of the election there were forty-three House freshmen in 1985, a small class, due mostly to the relatively low number of open seats in 1984.

The gubernatorial elections did little to dent the Democratic Party's 2–1 advantage in governorships. Republicans notched victories in North Carolina, Rhode Island, Utah, and West Virginia, where the statehouses were left vacant by departing Democratic incumbents. But the Democrats captured three seats, toppling Republican incumbents in North Dakota and Washington and picking up the seat left open by retiring GOP governor Richard A. Snelling in Vermont.

Republicans thus scored a net gain of one seat, boosting the total governorships under their control from fifteen to sixteen and reducing the number of states in the Democratic column from thirty-five to thirty-four. The GOP's showing represented an improvement over 1982, when the party suffered a net loss of seven seats. Republicans still remained a long way, however, from capturing a majority of governorships, a feat they had last accomplished in 1969.

1985–1987: The Ninety-Ninth Congress

The Ninety-ninth Congress compiled an extraordinary record. It revised the tax code more dramatically than at any time since World War II, rewrote immigration law, approved the most far-reaching environmental bills since the 1970s, boosted student aid, reversed President Reagan's policy toward South Africa, and joined him in openly seeking to overthrow Nicaragua's leftist government.

Congress seized the legislative initiative from the White House in 1985 and dominated the Capitol Hill agenda to a degree unmatched since President Reagan took office in 1981. Although Reagan was able to rescue his top domestic priority—tax-overhaul legislation—with a last-minute personal lobbying campaign, the close call was a testament to the altered relationship between the White House and Capitol Hill.

On other issues ranging from deficit reduction to federal farm spending, from South Africa sanctions to Middle East arms sales, Congress called the shots, in stark contrast to the opening year of Reagan's first term.

Lawmakers made a historic year-end decision: passage of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings legislation, which mandated paring of the federal deficit over the next five years until the budget was balanced in fiscal 1991. Although Congress embraced the budget reduction plan—offered by Republican senators Phil Gramm of Texas and Warren B. Rudman of New Hampshire and Democratic senator Ernest F. Hollings of South Carolina—as the best hope for future deficit control, many who shaped the measure were skeptical about its chances for working.

Deficit reduction had been the top priority of Senate majority leader Robert J. “Bob” Dole, R-Kan., when the Ninety-ninth Congress opened, but the expected deficit bequeathed to the next Congress remained about $180 billion.

In the two most important elections of 1985, moderation seemed to be the winning theme. Democrats retained the governorship in Virginia with Gerald L. Baliles, who mimicked the moderate philosophy of outgoing Democratic governor Charles S. Robb. Similarly, New Jersey Republican governor Thomas H. Kean thrived at the polls by positioning himself as more moderate than his party's national image. Because neither of the gubernatorial elections produced a partisan shift, the nationwide party lineup of governors remained at thirty-four Democrats and sixteen Republicans—unchanged from 1984.

The 1986 Midterm Elections

The 1986 Senate campaigns deserve special notice for what they said about the state of electioneering in the latter half of the 1980s. Most spectacularly they laid to rest a theory that took hold in 1980—that the GOP's superior financial resources give it an infallible ability to win close contests. The notion gained widespread currency in 1982, when the GOP's high-tech campaign techniques and last-minute infusions of money saved several endangered Republican candidates. That year the GOP won five of the six contests in which the winner took 52 percent or less of the vote.

But in 1986 nine of the eleven races won by 52 percent or less went to Democrats. That achievement came in spite of daunting obstacles: the National Republican Senatorial Committee's nearly 8–1 funding advantage over its Democratic counterpart, a $10 million nationwide GOP get-out-the-vote effort, and an army of consultants, pollsters, media advisers, and GOP field staff at the disposal of Republican candidates.

The difference lay in what each side did with the resources at its disposal. In many contests Democrats latched onto issues—of substance and of personality—that by election day were helping them frame the terms of the debate. Even more important, while the GOP was spending much of its money on television advertising and on a technology-driven voter mobilization effort, Democrats built on their strength at the grass roots. They developed extensive local organizations and, especially in the South, reawakened old party apparatuses and alliances.

In a year when there were so many close contests, the Republicans' lack of organizational depth hurt them, particularly in states where Democrats latched onto local issues that seemed more compelling to voters than national Republican pleas to keep the Senate in GOP hands.

The most striking examples of the Democrats' ability to outcampaign their opponents came in the South. All Democrats there used a variation on a single theme: that they were home-grown state patriots, while their opponents were national Republicans with little interest in local affairs. These Democrats used their state's traditional base to surmount better-financed Republican efforts.

Results of the 1986 Elections

Democrats on November 4, 1986, regained control of the Senate, which they had lost to the GOP in 1980. Six Republicans who won their seats that year were defeated in their bids for reelection, as Democrats captured nine GOP seats and lost only one of their own to take a 55–45 Senate majority. The results also gave Democrats the largest class of freshman senators since 1958. Of the thirteen new senators, eleven were Democrats.

The party's most significant set of victories came in the South, where Democrats won six of seven Senate contests. Their gains elsewhere were scattered across the map. Farm unrest in the Midwest cost two GOP members of the class of 1980 their seats. In Washington State, controversy over the possible locating of a high-level nuclear waste site in Hanford helped Brock Adams unseat Republican Slade Gorton.

The Democrats' other gains came in Maryland, where Rep. Barbara A. Mikulski easily won the seat of retiring GOP senator Charles McC. Mathias Jr., and in Nevada, where Rep. Harry Reid defeated former representative Jim Santini for the right to succeed retiring GOP senator Paul Laxalt. The sole Republican pickup was in Missouri. There, former governor Christopher S. "Kit" Bond won the seat held by retiring Democratic veteran Thomas F. Eagleton.

Not every potentially close Senate election broke the Democrats' way. In Oklahoma and Pennsylvania, Democratic representatives James R. Jones and Bob Edgar tried to turn local economic troubles to their advantage. Neither, however, could arouse the core Democratic constituency in the western half of their states. GOP senators Don Nickles of Oklahoma and Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania both won handily. In Idaho, Democratic governor John V. Evans lost to conservative Republican senator Steven D. Symms.

In North Carolina, Democrat Terry Sanford won with a campaign that stressed his long-standing ties to the state and painted incumbent James T. Broyhill as a captive of the Washington establishment. In Alabama, Rep. Richard C. Shelby waged a successful campaign against Republican senator Jeremiah Denton, whom he accused of being more interested in his personal agenda of "family" and social issues than in helping Alabama's economy.

Democratic representative John B. Breaux overcame an early lead by GOP representative W. Henson Moore to hold on to the Louisiana seat of retiring Democratic senator Russell B. Long. Breaux hammered away at Moore as a representative of GOP policies that were hurting Louisiana's farmers and its oil and gas industry.

In Georgia, Rep. Wyche Fowler ran an almost picture-perfect campaign against Republican incumbent Mack Mattingly. Fowler carried just under two-thirds of the state's 159 counties.

Florida's Democratic governor Bob Graham, a popular moderate, put Paula Hawkins on the defensive by portraying the first-term senator as a lightweight with a narrow focus. Hawkins won only 45 percent of the vote, the worst showing of any Senate incumbent.

Superior organization proved to be the key element in Democratic representative Timothy E. Wirth's victory over GOP representative Ken Kramer for the Senate seat left vacant by retiring Colorado Democrat Gary Hart. In California, where media ads played a crucial role, Democratic senator Alan Cranston ran a masterful campaign that kept Rep. Ed Zschau's legislative record in the spotlight for much of the campaign and prevented the Republicans from focusing on Cranston's performance.

House Republicans lost only five seats in 1986, giving the Democrats a 258–177 edge for the One Hundredth Congress. It was an extraordinarily good election for incumbents of both parties. The five Republican incumbents who went down to defeat were Mike Strang of Colorado; Webb Franklin of Mississippi; Fred J. Eckert of New York; and Bill Cobey and Bill Hendon, both of North Carolina. The Democrats suffered only one incumbent casualty: Robert A. Young of Missouri. The number of incumbents defeated was the lowest in postwar history.

The freshman House class of 1986 included twenty-three Republicans and twenty-seven Democrats. That was larger than the forty-three-member freshman class of 1984 but much smaller than the seventy-four-member GOP-dominated class of 1980 and the Democrat-heavy, eighty-member contingent elected in 1982.

The Republican Party made a strong showing in gubernatorial contests in 1986, winning a net gain of eight governorships. The Democrats, who entered the election holding thirty-four of the fifty governorships, saw their advantage drop to 26–24. The GOP count was the largest since 1970, when the party last held a majority of the governorships.

Republicans unseated Democratic incumbents in Texas and Wisconsin and won nine open seats that had been held by Democrats, including upset wins in Alabama and Arizona and a solid victory in Florida. Those victories were offset by the loss of three open Republican seats: in Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Tennessee.

The base of the Republican success was a small core of popular incumbents: California's George Deukmejian, Rhode Island's Edward DiPrete, and New Hampshire's John H. Sununu. The farm crisis that helped oust at least two Republican senators did not hurt most of the party's gubernatorial nominees. Iowa incumbent Terry E. Branstad won, as did three GOP candidates for open seats: Mike Hayden in Kansas, Kay A. Orr in Nebraska, and George S. Michelson in South Dakota. Republicans also picked up the governorship in Maine.

Democratic ineptness aided the Republicans in several states, particularly in Alabama, where Guy Hunt became the state's first Republican governor since Reconstruction. In Illinois, incumbent GOP governor James R. Thompson was considered vulnerable to a challenge from Adlai E. Stevenson III, until two associates of Lyndon H. LaRouche Jr. won Democratic primaries for state office, causing Stevenson to renounce his own nomination and run as an Independent. A three-way race in Arizona helped elect conservative Republican Evan Mecham to succeed Democratic governor Bruce Babbitt in Arizona.

Despite the GOP's poor showing in Senate elections in the South, the party made its greatest gubernatorial gains in that region. In addition to picking up Texas and Alabama, the GOP elected Tampa mayor Bob Martinez in Florida, former governor and senator Henry L. Bellmon in Oklahoma, and Carroll A. Campbell Jr. in South Carolina.

Democrats claimed three of the four seats being given up by Republican incumbents. Their largest catch was Pennsylvania, where Bob Casey defeated Lt. Gov. William W. Scranton III.

Republicans, however, were disappointed in their efforts to capture state legislatures. Nationwide, Democrats improved their lead in the number of legislative seats they controlled by 179 and won control of the legislatures in twenty-eight states, two more than they dominated before the election. Republicans controlled both chambers in ten legislatures, down from eleven before the election. Legislative control was split between the two parties in eleven states. (Nebraska has a nonpartisan, unicameral legislature.)

1987–1989: The One Hundredth Congress

The One Hundredth Congress, by its number, had a historic resonance. It convened in the year that the United States was celebrating the bicentennial of its Constitution and the government of checks and balances created by that Constitution.

Fittingly enough, members commemorated the separation of powers that lay at the heart of the Constitution by challenging the president over the Iran-contra affair and by checking his attempt to reshape the judiciary through the appointment of a controversial justice to a pivotal Supreme Court vacancy. The budget deficit engendered partisan wrangling within Congress and between Congress and the president for much of 1987. After the October 19, 1987, stock market crash, however, Congress and Reagan reached accord on a two-year deficit-reduction package.

For the first time since 1981 Democrats were in control of both chambers. Senate Democrats returned to power with a 55–45 margin; Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia was restored to his former position as majority leader. House Democrats, who increased their already formidable edge to 258–177, named Majority Leader Jim Wright of Texas to succeed Speaker O'Neill, who had retired in 1986. Wright was unopposed.

Two issues consumed as much if not more congressional attention than the perennial budget battles. The Iran-contra affair rarely left the front pages from February 1987, when a White House commission said the president had all but lost control of his national security apparatus, to November, when the Senate and House select committees investigating the scandal published their report. Continual revelations about the White House plan to sell arms to Iran in exchange for U.S. hostages in the Middle East and the subsequent diversion of some of the arms sale profits to “contra” guerrillas fighting the leftist government of Nicaragua severely damaged Reagan's public standing.

Almost as soon as the Iran-contra hearings concluded, Reagan's nomination to fill a Supreme Court vacancy created an equally clamorous controversy. Reagan nominated Robert H. Bork, a federal appeals court judge who had gained notoriety when, as solicitor general in 1973, he fired Watergate special prosecutor Archibald Cox. After a bitter fight, Bork was rejected. Reagan's second nominee, Douglas H. Ginsburg, was forced to withdraw his nomination after he admitted that he had smoked marijuana when he was a law student and law professor. Reagan's third nominee, Anthony M. Kennedy, was confirmed unanimously in February 1988.

Despite these divisive battles and other flare-ups between the Republican White House and the Democratic Congress, the two sides managed to reconcile their differences on a number of major issues, including measures to bail out the Farm Credit System and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation. For all its productivity, however, the One Hundredth Congress left for its successor a pile of unfinished business, with the deficit-ridden federal budget teetering at the top.

The 1988 Campaigns

Vice President George H.W. Bush's nomination for the presidency was never in any real jeopardy. His candidacy, though, generated little enthusiasm, which encouraged several Republicans to enter the race. Two contenders, former Delaware governor Pierre S. du Pont IV and former secretary of state Alexander M. Haig Jr., left the race early.

The Iowa caucuses gave the Bush forces a momentary scare when their candidate came in third behind Sen. Robert J. “Bob” Dole of Kansas and television evangelist Pat Robertson. A week later Bush trounced Dole in New Hampshire and then went on to sweep sixteen states on Super Tuesday, shutting Dole out of the March 8 events altogether. New York representative Jack F. Kemp, who had hoped to win the backing of the party’s conservative wing, did not fare well in the early primaries and decided to leave the race after Super Tuesday.

Bush confirmed his standing with Republican voters on March 15, decisively winning Illinois. Dole left the race two weeks later. On April 26 Bush won enough Pennsylvania delegates to clinch the Republican nomination.

On the Democratic side eight candidates entered the contest: former Arizona governor Bruce Babbitt; Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware; Gov. Michael Dukakis of Massachusetts; Rep. Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri; Sen. Albert “Al” Gore Jr. of Tennessee; former senator Gary Hart of Colorado; civil rights leader Jesse Jackson; and Sen. Paul Simon of Illinois. Dukakis did not emerge as the clear front-runner until well into the primary schedule.

By mid-March Jackson had accumulated more primary votes than any other Democrat and only four fewer delegates than Dukakis. Then came Wisconsin, where Dukakis beat Jackson by more than 200,000 votes. Dukakis followed his Wisconsin victory with a decisive win in New York. Dukakis went on to win all the remaining primaries except in the District of Columbia, which Jackson took. Even then, Dukakis was not assured of enough delegates until the last round of voting on June 7.

After years of internal warfare the Democrats staged a remarkable show of unity at their convention in Atlanta. The prospects for party peace were not at all guaranteed as the party gathered for its July 18–21 conclave. In the weeks before the convention Dukakis had two main tasks: to select a running mate and to find a way to involve Jackson in the fall campaign.

Jackson seemed to have scaled back his implicit demands that the vice-presidential nomination be offered to him. At the same time Dukakis seemed to find ways to demonstrate his respect for Jackson without pandering to him. Both men appeared close to accommodation on platforms and rules issues. Then, on July 12, Dukakis announced that he had chosen Texas senator Lloyd Bentsen to be his running mate. The decision angered Jackson supporters, who noted that Bentsen was both southern and conservative and who believed that Jackson and his message had been slighted. But Dukakis, Bentsen, and Jackson subsequently held a meeting and smoothed things over.

Jackson’s willingness to compromise on the platform contributed greatly to the bonhomie of Atlanta, signaling a victory of pragmatism over idealism. As a result the rest of the convention was tension-free, providing the backdrop for a Hollywood-style finale. Jackson himself kicked off the unity collaboration in an electrifying speech that unfurled his famous call for social justice and offered strong words of praise for Dukakis.

With the conclusion of Jackson’s speech, his virtual domination of the convention gave way to the business at hand. On July 20 Democratic delegates nominated Dukakis, who won 2,876.25 votes to Jackson’s 1,218.5. Jackson conceded by telephone, and the convention then ratified Dukakis’s nomination by acclamation.

Running behind Michael Dukakis in the public opinion polls, Vice President Bush came to the Republican National Convention in New Orleans in August with one main task: to convince delegates and the viewing public that he was not the “wimp” pictured by political cartoonists. His choice of Sen. James Danforth “Dan” Quayle of Indiana as his running mate, however, heightened many of the doubts he had sought to dispel.

To maintain some suspense, Bush had not been expected to name his choice for vice president until the last day of the convention. But at a welcoming ceremony on August 16, he announced his selection. Concern about Quayle’s youth and government inexperience quickly surfaced. A major controversy erupted when reporters questioned Quayle about whether he had used family influence to get into the Indiana National Guard in 1969 to avoid service in the Vietnam War. While controversy swirled around Quayle’s selection, the convention business proceeded as if nothing unusual were happening. With no fights over the platform or party rules (both were approved without debate), the Republicans could concentrate on positioning themselves for the fall campaign.

Although Democrats began the fall campaign with high hopes for November, the campaign turned out to be a downhill slide for Dukakis. Dukakis left the Democratic convention as much as seventeen points ahead of Bush in some polls. That lead evaporated under a withering Republican attack that began at the GOP convention. Despite continuing reservations among voters about the Quayle nomination, Bush surged ahead in the polls at the end of August. He maintained that advantage throughout the fall, emphasizing at every opportunity that Dukakis was a liberal out of step with the mainstream. Many scorned Bush for his tactics, but few argued with their effectiveness.

Bush’s ability to keep Dukakis on the defensive was reflected in the public opinion polls. A week before the election, they gave Bush as much as a twelve-point lead.

Results of the 1988 Elections

George H. W. Bush was elected the nation's forty-first president on November 8, winning 54 percent of the popular vote. Bush's victory confirmed that, absent economic crisis or White House scandal, the burden of proof was on the Democrats to convince voters that their party could be trusted with the executive branch of the federal government.

Bush was the first candidate since John F. Kennedy to win the White House while his party lost seats in the House. Unlike Kennedy's, Bush's victory margin was substantial in a number of states. His inability to carry others into office may have been partly due to his message, which was essentially a call to "stay the course."

In reviewing the results of the 1988 Senate elections, both parties had cause for rue and relief. But it was the Republicans who felt the keener disappointment. Democrats won nineteen of the thirty-three races, maintaining the 55–45 majority they had seized in the 1986 elections. They successfully defended fifteen of their eighteen seats and took over Republican seats in Connecticut, Virginia, Nebraska, and Nevada.

GOP Senate leader Robert J. "Bob" Dole conceded on election night that reclaiming the Senate had not been realistic in 1988. The Republican Party could be pleased at capturing three historically Democratic seats as well as holding eleven of its own fifteen. Of the four the GOP lost, the only surprise came in Connecticut, where incumbent Lowell P. Weicker Jr. was edged out by Joseph I. Lieberman.

The GOP had all but conceded the other three seats to the Democrats a year before the election. In Virginia former governor Charles S. Robb succeeded Republican Paul S. Trible Jr., who retired after a single term. David K. Karnes of Nebraska lost to former Democratic governor Robert Kerrey, and Chic Hecht of Nevada lost to sitting Democratic governor Richard H. Bryan.

The only Democratic incumbent the Republicans defeated was John Melcher of Montana. Conrad Burns became the state's first Republican senator elected in forty-two years. The other two new Republican seats in the Senate were won by House minority whip Trent Lott of Mississippi and Rep. Connie Mack of Florida. The latest emblems of the GOP's new day in the Old South, they replaced retiring Democrats John C. Stennis and Lawton Chiles.

An important measure of a party's performance in any election year is its score in contests where no incumbent is running. In this category the GOP won four of six. The party held on to retiring Robert T. Stafford's seat in Vermont, where at-large representative James M. Jeffords had no trouble moving in. In Washington State former GOP senator Slade Gorton, whom the voters had turned out two years before, was elected to succeed retiring Republican senator Daniel J. Evans. Mack and Lott picked up the other two open seats.

The two Democrats winning open seats were Robb and Herbert Kohl of Wisconsin. Kohl succeeded Democrat William Proxmire, who retired.

In the House of Representatives election day was cause for celebration for more than 98 percent of the members seeking reelection. Only six of 408 incumbents on the ballot lost, four Republicans and two Democrats. The Democrats picked up a net of two seats, putting the partisan lineup in the House at 260 Democrats and 175 Republicans.

The most prominent member to fall was Fernand J. St Germain of Rhode Island, who was soundly rejected after being dogged by questions about his ethical conduct. In Georgia the Democrats had little trouble knocking off Republican representative Pat Swindall, who was under indictment for allegedly lying to a grand jury about a money-laundering scheme.

Democratic representative Bill Chappell Jr. lost his Florida district after being battered by public questions about his links to a defense-procurement scandal. Democratic representative Roy Dyson of Maryland, also plagued by unfavorable stories about his links to the procurement scandal and his conduct in office, narrowly eked out a victory over a challenger he was expected to trounce.

Many victories in 1988 depended on more than political skills, personality, and partisan appeal. The powers of incumbency—free mailing, press attention, and fund-raising advantages—played a significant role in the election.

If the advantage of incumbency helped to explain why Republicans were having trouble reducing the Democratic advantages in the House, it did little to explain why they made no headway in the battle for open seats. In all, only three of the twenty-seven open seats changed partisan hands, with the Democrats winning two formerly GOP seats and the Republicans winning one seat held by the Democrats.

The 1988 results were unlikely to encourage challengers mulling the 1990 election. The 98 percent reelection rate from 1986 may well have played a role in discouraging competition in 1988, one of the quietest election years in recent memory.

There were twelve gubernatorial races on November 8. Of the nine governors seeking reelection, eight won, all by stressing their managerial skill. The only incumbent to fail, West Virginia Republican Arch A. Moore Jr., was ousted because voters had lost confidence in his ability to steer the state's struggling economy toward better times. Democrat Gaston Caperton defeated Moore. Two other GOP governors were as embattled as Moore—Edward DiPrete in Rhode Island and Norman H. Bangerter in Utah—but both eked out victories over stiff Democratic competition.

Those narrow GOP victories deflated the Democrats' high expectations of gubernatorial gains in 1988. Democrats were defending only four seats, compared with the GOP's eight. In addition, the three Democratic incumbents seeking reelection seemed solid, while Republicans looked to be struggling in at least four states. But on November 8 the Democrats scored a net gain of just one governorship, bringing to twenty-eight their number of chief executives. The GOP held twenty-two governorships.

While Democrats may have been disappointed in the results of the gubernatorial elections, Republicans suffered a setback in their efforts to take control of Democratic-held state legislatures in time to influence the next redistricting. The November 8 elections left the GOP controlling both houses in only eight states, down from nine going into the election. The Democrats retained control of twenty-eight and thirteen other state legislatures were split. (Nebraska's unicameral legislature did not organize along partisan lines.)

THE POST-COLD WAR ERA

When the history of the early 1990s is written, the signal event will surely be the collapse of Soviet communism and the dissolution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The world watched as, one by one, the countries of the Warsaw Pact broke away from the Soviet Union to turn toward democracy and market economies and then as the Soviet Union itself broke apart. Seemingly overnight, the super-power rivalry that had dominated U.S. defense and foreign policy for nearly half a century was over.

For many Americans, however, these astounding events were overshadowed by economic recession. Faced with slow economic growth and high levels of unemployment, more and more people began to fear that they and their children would never be able to realize the American dream of a continually improving standard of living.

Those fears were to make Republican George H.W. Bush a one-term president. Bush, entering the White House on the popularity of his predecessor, Ronald Reagan, saw his public approval ratings soar to record heights after the successful U.S.-led military action against Iraq in 1991. But Bush was never able to persuade voters that he had a credible plan for rejuvenating the economy or addressing other domestic problems, including a failing health insurance system and the huge budget deficits caused in part by the Reagan-Bush economic policies.

The Democratic-controlled Congress gave the president little quarter, although the two did cooperate to enact a far-reaching rewrite of the Clean Air Act. Other major achievements of the 101st and 102nd Congresses included measures to make public and work places accessible to Americans with disabilities and to restructure the thrift industry. But severe image problems overshadowed these achievements. More often than not, the Democratic Congress clashed with the Republican White House, with legislative gridlock the result. This perceived ineptitude combined with numerous scandals to drive congressional approval ratings to record lows.

The military victory in Iraq was the crowning moment of George Bush's presidency. But the euphoria was fleeting. Almost as soon as the war had ended, Democrats succeeded in turning the nation's attention to the economy's miserable performance.

When Bush assumed office, the economy was still in what would become the longest peacetime expansion to that time. Unemployment stood at 5.3 percent, and the inflation rate was 4.2 percent. But the expansion slowed during the first quarter of 1989, and the economy slid into recession.

The single action that may have dealt the biggest blow to Bush's political fortunes occurred in 1990 when Bush broke his 1988 campaign promise not to raise taxes. Concerned that a hemorrhaging deficit could severely damage the economy and his own reelection chances in 1992, Bush sought the help of Democrats to work out a bipartisan package deal that was expected to reduce the deficit by $500 billion over the next five years.

1989–1991: The 101st Congress

Despite the momentous events that rocked the world and nation in 1989–1991, Congress's focus was on internal politics. Congress was consigned to a role that was, if not peripheral, at most reactive. Moreover, the 1988 elections had not given either the new Republican president, George H.W. Bush, or the Democratic-controlled Congress any clear mandate, and neither party had a compelling agenda of its own.

For much of the two years, congressional attention was focused inward, on events surrounding the resignations of House Speaker Jim Wright, D-Texas—the first time in history a Speaker had quit midterm—and House Majority Whip Tony Coelho, D-Calif. Questions about their personal ethics forced both men out of office. Thomas S. Foley of Washington was elected to succeed Wright as Speaker. Ethics problems also surfaced for five senators who had intervened with federal regulators in behalf of an ailing savings and loan institution. The senators became known as the Keating Five, after the thrift's owner, Charles H. Keating Jr.

In the Senate, Democrat George J. Mitchell of Maine was serving his first years as majority leader, where he cautiously proceeded to impose order on the legislative schedule and to find consensus among Democrats. Most senators said Mitchell lived up to his promise to have an open, consultative leadership style. Relations with Republicans were easier than they had been under his predecessor, Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va.

The 101st Congress had some impressive accomplishments, including a plan to reduce the deficit, a massive overhaul of the Clean Air Act, a child-care assistance bill, a rights bill for the disabled, and broad revisions of immigration laws and federal housing and farm programs. These achievements were overshadowed in the minds of many people, however, by Congress's unfinished agenda—notably its inability to pass campaign finance legislation—and the drone of ethics inquiries, partisan caviling, and congressional irresolution. An ugly and public battle over the budget in 1990 provided one of the low points. Rank-and-file House members humiliated the congressional leadership when they rejected a package agreed to by the leaders and the White House.

The 1990 Midterm Elections

War and recession hovered ominously over the 1990 campaign, but neither figured prominently in its outcome. Instead, the election campaigns looked more like a series of hard-fought city council contests, shaped largely by personalities, local issues, and a pronounced absence of clear-cut national themes.

In reaching a compromise on the federal budget just weeks before the election, President Bush and Congress's Democratic leadership prevented the election from becoming a referendum on economic policy. Divisive issues such as taxes and abortion played out inconsistently across party and state lines. Even the growing prospects for war with Iraq failed to stir a wide-ranging debate over U.S. policy in the Persian Gulf.

Results of the 1990 Elections

While frustrated voters talked about “throwing the bums out,” on November 6 they returned incumbents to Washington en masse. Only one of the thirty-two Senate incumbents seeking reelection lost, while only fifteen of the 406 House members who ran in the general election were defeated.

Altogether, the Republicans lost one Senate seat and eight House seats, weakening the administration's hand. Bush had come to depend on a strategy of governing by veto in dealing with the heavily Democratic Congress. (As it turned out, a Bush veto was not overridden until the final days of the 102nd Congress.)

Colorado in 1990 became the first state to impose term limits on federal officeholders. (California, Colorado, and Oklahoma voters also adopted ballot initiatives capping the service of state legislators.) But the broad anti-incumbent sentiment expressed toward Congress in preelection polls did not materialize at the ballot box. (See box, Term limits, p. 170.)

Only one Senate incumbent, Republican Rudy Boschwitz of Minnesota, was defeated. In the House, 96 percent of the incumbents seeking reelection were returned. Total turnover, including retirements, amounted to just 10 percent.

Despite winning more House seats (267) in 1990 than in any other election since the recession-year contest of 1982, the Democrats' share of the total, nationwide congressional vote was their lowest for any midterm election since 1966. In 1990 Democratic candidates drew just 52.9 percent of all House votes. By comparison, when Democrats captured 269 seats in 1982, their share of the nationwide congressional vote was 55.2 percent, more than 2 percentage points higher than in 1990.

The statehouses proved to be the real workshop of democracy in 1990. Anti-incumbent sentiment overtook sitting Republican governors in four states and Democratic governors in two. Eight other statehouses also changed hands, with four going to Republicans, three to Democrats, and one (Alaska) to the Alaska Independence Party. All told, fourteen governorships switched from one party to another and more incumbent governors were toppled than in any other year since 1970.

Six of twenty-three gubernatorial incumbents who sought reelection lost their jobs. Two of the losses—Democrats James J. Blanchard of Michigan and Rudy Perpich of Minnesota—came as surprises.

In Connecticut, former GOP senator Lowell P. Weicker Jr. won the seat vacated by Democrat William A. O'Neill. Weicker, a maverick liberal Republican who lost a 1988 Senate reelection bid, chose to run on his own ticket instead of competing for the GOP nomination.

Alaska voters were similarly unfettered by convention, electing former Republican governor Walter J. Hickel. Hickel had thrown the race into disarray by jumping in on the Alaska Independence Party ticket only six weeks before the election. Republicans had nominated state senator Arliss Sturgulewski, but some were uncomfortable with her abortion rights stance, and even her running mate abandoned the ticket to run with Hickel.

Significant changes occurred in the off-years as well. In Virginia in 1989, the state that billed itself as the “cradle of the Confederacy,” Democratic lieutenant governor L. Douglas Wilder had become the nation's first elected black governor, succeeding another Democrat. In addition, the Democrats had won the New Jersey statehouse from the Republicans in the only other governorship up that year. The GOP picked up Arizona's governorship in February 1991, when Republican candidate Fife Symington won a runoff election. The Republicans gained another statehouse in March 1991 when Louisiana governor Buddy Roemer, elected as a Democrat in 1987, switched parties. That left the lineup at twenty-seven Democrats, twenty-one Republicans, and two independents.

1991–1993: The 102nd Congress

Hobbled by partisanship and purse strings, the 102nd Congress produced one of the shortest lists of legislative accomplishments in recent memory. Congress and the president enacted some notable measures, including the first overhaul of energy regulations in a decade, new regulation of the

TERM LIMITS

The president of the United States, the governors of most states, and an increasing number of state legislators are limited to a fixed number of terms in office. But efforts in the 1990s to limit the tenure of members of Congress proved unsuccessful. The Supreme Court found state attempts to limit congressional terms to be unconstitutional and a congressional push to adopt a constitutional amendment limiting terms failed to attract the requisite number of votes. The departure of scores of senior lawmakers through retirement and electoral defeat tempered the movement as well.

BACKGROUND

The issue of term limits has been around since the nation's beginning. The original states' suspicion of a strong executive caused several to limit their governors' tenure. The Articles of Confederation had limited the terms of delegates to the Continental Congress. An early draft of the Constitution also included a tenure limitation for members of what was to become the House of Representatives, but the provision was dropped without dissent or debate. Alexander Hamilton also persuaded the delegates to the Constitutional Convention not to require rotation for the presidency. Anti-Federalists complained about the lack of a rotation provision in their unsuccessful effort to prevent ratification of the Constitution.

Despite the lack of mandatory limits, voluntary retirement from federal office was common through the nineteenth century. George Washington unintentionally established a precedent by stepping down from the presidency after completing his second four-year term. The two-term tradition held until Franklin D. Roosevelt won a third term in 1940 and a fourth in 1944. After Roosevelt's death in 1945, Republicans began advocating a constitutional amendment to limit the president to two four-year terms. The Twenty-second Amendment setting the mandatory limits was approved by Congress in 1947 and ratified by the required number of states in 1951.

A proposal to include in the Twenty-second Amendment a limit on congressional terms failed miserably. The issue surfaced from time to time over the years, but it did not gain in importance until late in the century. Popular resentment against Congress as an institution had been building for some time. Members were increasingly viewed as being primarily responsive to large donors whose contributions, combined with the other built-in advantages of incumbency, seemed to be making incumbents impossible to remove in an election. Republicans took up the issue in the 1980s, in part out of frustration with the Democrats' dominance of Congress since the 1950s.

The case for limits was helped along by a series of nagging scandals in the 1980s and early 1990s. The decade began with "Abscam," the exposure of bribetaking by several members of Congress that resulted in the first expulsion of a member since the Civil War. The trend continued with the resignation of the Speaker of the House in 1989 under an ethics cloud and ended with the 1991 exposure of routine overdrafts by more than a hundred representatives at the House's bank for members.

TERM LIMITS MOMENTUM

The terms limits movement came onto the national political scene in the early 1990s, with supporters winning ballot initiatives or gaining terms limit laws in twenty-three states within five years.

Supporters argued that mandatory retirement requirements were necessary to bring new people and viewpoints into Congress, to reduce the constant pressure to get reelected, and to control federal spending, which they said resulted from career politicians getting too close to special interest groups seeking federal funds. Opponents countered that term limits would strip Congress of experienced legislators, diminish the political power of less-populated states that were helped by their members gaining seniority, and would merely speed up, not solve, the problem of legislators getting too friendly with special interest groups. Depriving citizens of the right to vote for an incumbent would be undemocratic, opponents added.

In 1994 Republicans made term limits an integral part of their "Contract with America," a platform of ten promises that helped them take control of the House after forty years of Democratic rule. But opponents of term limits pointed to the GOP takeover as proof that voters could express their dissatisfaction at the ballot box and that Congress did not need institutionalized term limits.

MOVEMENT STALLS

The Supreme Court weighed in on the issue in a 1995 case challenging an Arkansas term limits law. In a 5–4 decision in U.S. Term Limits Inc. v. Thornton, the Court held that the states had no power to change the qualifications for serving in Congress. Those qualifications are minimum age (twenty-five for the House and thirty for the Senate); minimum length of citizenship (seven years for the House and nine years for the Senate); and residence in the state choosing its representation in Congress. The ruling did not affect laws limiting the terms of state officeholders.

The decision left supporters of congressional term limits only one solution: a constitutional amendment. But the outlook was not promising given the fact that just two months before the Thornton decision a proposed constitutional amendment had failed in the House for lack of the two-thirds majority needed to pass it.

An attempt in the Senate in 1996 to call up a term limits amendment for a vote was blocked by a filibuster. In 1997 another attempt in the House again failed to attract the number of votes needed for passage. In 2001, meanwhile, in Cook v. Gralik, the Supreme Court ruled that Missouri could not include information on congressional candidates' opposition to term limits on election ballots.

cable television industry, and aid to the former Soviet republics. But the number of achievements paled in comparison with the number of bills that were considered but never enacted.

The 102nd Congress had hardly begun when its signal event arrived on Capitol Hill. After three days of somber but passionate debate, Congress on January 12, 1991, gave President Bush authorization to use force if needed to oust Iraqi invading forces from Kuwait. The vote was the closest Congress had come to declaring war since December 8, 1941. Indeed, many considered the Persian Gulf resolution to be the functional equivalent of a declaration of war.

Less than two months later, a triumphant Bush ascended the dais in the House of Representatives to tell the assembled Congress—and the nation—“Aggression is defeated; the war is over.”

The end of the shooting war abroad, however, marked the beginning of a shouting war at home, as lawmakers turned their attention from the victory overseas to the sagging economy and other domestic concerns. But the budget deal that the White House and Congress wrote in 1990, combined with partisan politics in 1991, made significant progress on domestic issues nearly impossible. The Republican president used his veto, real and threatened, to stall Democratic measures he did not like, such as civil rights and extended unemployment benefits legislation. Compromises were forged only after Bush’s standing in the public opinion polls began to fall.

Once the war was successfully concluded, Operation Desert Storm receded from preeminence on the national agenda with startling speed. By late August, in what was likely to be a far more momentous development, the Soviet Union was falling apart.

While the war debate was Congress’s finest hour in 1991, considerable competition existed for its low point. Two leading contenders were the confirmation hearings of Clarence Thomas to be an associate justice of the Supreme Court and the revelation that House members routinely wrote checks on the House bank without having the funds to cover them.

Thomas, a federal court of appeals judge, had been named to succeed Justice Thurgood Marshall, who was retiring. Thomas’s conservative credentials had already made his confirmation as the second black to sit on the Court a subject of great controversy, but the hearings turned into a national soap opera in October after law school professor Anita F. Hill alleged that Thomas had sexually harassed her, and lurid details poured out of the hearing room. Thomas was confirmed, but the Senate’s handling of the situation left women outraged and led many senators to call the confirmation process flawed.

The two-year Keating Five investigation also came to a conclusion in 1991. The Senate Ethics Committee reprimanded Alan Cranston, D-Calif., and it criticized in writing the four other senators—Democrats Dennis DeConcini of Arizona, John Glenn of Ohio, and Donald W. Riegle Jr. of Michigan, and Republican John McCain of Arizona—for their poor judgment in acting in behalf of Charles Keating, who owned a savings and loan that went bankrupt at a $2 billion cost to federal taxpayers.

Perhaps nothing symbolized the gridlock in Washington so much as the debate over urban aid in the wake of the Los Angeles riots in April 1992—the worst incident of domestic violence in twenty years. Congress and President Bush could not agree either on the amount and kind of aid or on how that aid should be funded. Democrats had to settle for $500 million in aid, a third of what they had proposed.

Congress’s internal strife complicated matters. Along with the members’ bank overdrafts problem, House leaders had to deal with a scandal at the House Post Office involving allegations that legislators had converted public funds into cash and that patronage employees sold drugs at the federal facility. Several employees pleaded guilty to various charges and a federal grand jury subpoenaed expense account records of three House members, including Ways and Means Chair Dan Rostenkowski of Illinois.

The 1992 Campaigns

A year before the 1992 presidential campaign began, President Bush seemed poised for one of the smoothest reelections in White House history. After he led the nation to victory in the brief Persian Gulf War, the president’s popularity soared. Yet when he formally launched his candidacy in Washington on February 12, 1992, Bush faced the prospect of spirited competition not only in the fall from the Democrats but also in the Republican primaries.

In the intervening eleven months, the economy had gone into what even the president called a “free fall.” So, too, had Bush’s popularity. The president had dropped from a peak of 89 percent approval in the Gallup Poll in March 1991 to 44 percent in February 1992. Not much that the White House did before or during the campaign helped revitalize either the economy or the president’s political standing.

On the Democratic side, the nomination of Arkansas governor Bill Clinton seemed the most likely outcome as the campaign got under way. His campaign was well positioned on all major fronts—organization, message development, fund-raising, and endorsements. Clinton’s early primary wins put him far ahead of the other Democratic contenders, but continuing doubts about Clinton’s character raised questions about the governor’s electability.

In addition to Clinton, just four other Democrats actively sought the nomination as the primary season began: former Massachusetts senator Paul E. Tsongas, former California governor Edmund G. “Jerry” Brown Jr., and senators Tom Harkin of Iowa and Bob Kerrey of Nebraska. None of the four had much following beyond their regions, and all of them were long shots for the nomination. Brown, however, ran an innovative campaign, placing a $100 limit on contributions, which could be pledged by dialing a toll-free 800 number.

On the eve of the New Hampshire primary in February, renewed controversies surfaced about Clinton’s draft status during the Vietnam War and allegations of marital infidelity. Calls went out for new candidates to enter the race. Some prominent Democrats considered but then dropped the idea because the nominating system seriously handicapped any late entry into the race.

As a result, voters in most states did not have a wide choice. In only five primaries could Democrats choose from a full field of active candidates. Clinton, Brown, and Tsongas were the only candidates in another ten primaries. As Har-kin, Kerrey, and then Tsongas dropped out, Clinton's main competition in the last two dozen primaries came from Brown.

Although he lost in New Hampshire, Clinton became the first Democrat to win primary victories in each of the ten largest states. He scored more primary victories (thirty-two) than any other Democratic candidate ever had. His nearly 10.5 million primary votes were more than any previous candidate, Democrat or Republican, had ever won in the history of the presidential primaries.

Bush's nomination for a second term was never in jeopardy, despite his sagging popularity. His only real challenge came from the party's conservative wing, which had been suspicious of Bush since at least 1980 when he ran for the nomination against Ronald Reagan, the conservatives' hero. Seizing what he saw as an opportunity, conservative commentator Patrick J. Buchanan, a former speechwriter for President Richard Nixon and one-time communications director for the Reagan White House, entered the race.

Although he collected fewer than one hundred delegates, Buchanan found some support in his attacks on Bush. Bush won every primary, but he wound up with less than three-fourths of the Republican primary ballots, a far lower share than the last three elected Republican presidents (Reagan, Nixon, and Eisenhower) had received on their road to reelection.

Former Louisiana state representative David Duke also ran a limited campaign for the presidency. But the former Ku Klux Klan member won little support among Republicans and ended his campaign on April 22.

After the conventions, Bush continued to try to focus voter attention on Clinton's character. But Clinton began the final phase of the campaign as the front-runner, and nothing Bush did ever dislodged the Democrat from that position. By the time of the presidential debates in mid-October, the political community had reached virtually unanimous agreement that without a major news development or a Clinton misstep Bush was likely to lose his bid for a second term.

Results of the 1992 Elections

A plurality of American voters listened to Democratic presidential candidate Clinton's call for change in 1992 and turned President Bush out of office after only one term.

Clinton carried thirty-two states and the District of Columbia, won 370 of 538 electoral votes, and outscored Bush by 5 percentage points—43 percent to 38 percent.

Clinton's was the most sweeping triumph for any Democrat since President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964 and the best showing for any Democratic challenger since Franklin D. Roosevelt ousted Republican Herbert Hoover from the White House in 1932. In placing Clinton, 46, and his running mate, Sen. Albert "Al" Gore Jr. of Tennessee, 44, at the head of the government, Americans for the first time elected a president and vice president both born after World War II.

The widespread desire for a change in government also benefited independent candidate H. Ross Perot, a Texas billionaire who spoke bluntly of the need to reduce the federal budget deficit. Perot won 19 percent of the popular vote, the largest vote total for an independent candidate in presidential election history and the biggest vote share since 1912, when Theodore Roosevelt ran under the Progressive Party banner. However, Perot won no electoral votes.

Change also reached Congress, where voters added record numbers of women, African Americans, and Hispanics. The new Senate would be the most diverse up to that time, with the addition of four women, including Carol Moseley Braun, the first black woman ever elected to the body. More than one-fourth of the House members in 1993 would be freshmen, a result of retirements and redistricting as well as voter rejection of incumbents.

Overall, however, the partisan lineup in Congress was virtually the same, with the Democrats firmly in control of both chambers. The lineup in the Senate remained at fifty-seven Democrats and forty-three Republicans. At the beginning of the 103rd Congress, the House had 258 Democrats, 176 Republicans, and one independent. The Republicans had gained ten seats.

Anti-incumbency and "Year of the Woman" themes may have worked well in some Senate and House elections, but they had little effect in the twelve gubernatorial races in 1992. Voters seemed more concerned about economics and ethics. The four incumbent governors running for reelection—all Democrats—were returned to office. A former Democratic governor also won back his job after an eight-year absence. The three women running for governor in Montana, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island all lost. Women held the governorships in Kansas, Oregon, and Texas.

Altogether, Democrats won three seats formerly held by Republicans, while the GOP picked up one seat held by a Democrat, for a net gain of two seats for the Democrats. That gave the Democrats a total of thirty governorships; the Republicans held eighteen. Two governors were Independents.

Voters in fourteen states in 1992 approved limits on the number of terms their representatives and senators in Congress could serve.

A PARTISAN ERA

Enormous political change took place in the remaining years of the twentieth century and the beginning of the twenty-first. Political upheaval became almost commonplace. As power shifted between the two parties and political divisions in Washington and among the American people widened, long-held assumptions no longer seemed to fit.

For decades, voters more often than not had sent a Republican to the White House but chosen Democrats to represent them on Capitol Hill. The Democrats took control of the House in the elections of 1954 and held on to it for forty years. The party controlled the Senate as well for all but six of those years. Republicans won six of the nine presidential elections in that same period.

One theory put forward to explain the split voting was that during the nearly half-century cold war the American people felt more comfortable with Republicans in the White House handling defense and foreign policy. At the same time they liked having the Democrats in charge of domestic programs and constituent services. But this arrangement was no longer so compelling once the cold war ended and taxpayer disenchantment with big government began to mount.

That's when the political pendulum started to swing. Voters turned Republican president George H. W. Bush out of office in the 1992 election. Bush, who had long experience in foreign affairs and had soared in popularity after presiding over the U.S. victory in the Persian Gulf War, fell on the sword of domestic pocketbook issues and lost his reelection bid to a former war protester, Arkansas governor Bill Clinton.

Capitol Hill was also on the brink of historic change as voter dissatisfaction mounted. People resented paying taxes to a federal government they increasingly perceived as wasteful, overreaching, and inefficient. Democrats proved unable to meet the challenge with much creativity or effectiveness, as could be seen in their failed attempts to overhaul the health care system. Almost from its beginning in 1993, the 103rd Congress was afflicted with a creeping case of paralysis. By the final days of the 1994 session, an end-of-era atmosphere had settled over the Capitol, especially in the House of Representatives.

The mood was fitting. In the 1994 midterm elections, voters flocked to GOP congressional candidates in record numbers, while at the same time the Democrats had difficulty motivating their core constituents. As a result, the Republicans won in a landslide, capturing the House and Senate and promising to enact the conservative "Contract with America" legislative proposals on which they had run.

At first, the GOP and its contract agenda seemed unstoppable, especially in the House. Roused from decades-old routines by the new Republican majority, Congress became an institution more active, more partisan, and more willing to defy a president than ever before in the post-World War II period. But in the end the conservatives' confrontational style backfired and voters started to blame the GOP for gridlock in Washington. The Republicans lost control of the debate and their message just as the White House and the once passive congressional Democrats found new self-assurance and grew more confident about attacking GOP priorities. Realizing that they were taking a beating in the public opinion polls, the Republicans softened their rhetoric and abandoned their hard-charging tactics to ensure GOP majority control in the next Congress.

They succeeded in holding on to Congress in the 1996 elections but the White House was Clinton's. Although he had looked like a one-term president after the 1994 elections, Clinton instead became the first Democratic president since Franklin D. Roosevelt to be reelected. The result was the continuation of the historically unusual political arrangement in Washington of a Democratic president and a Republican Congress. But it was even more unusual to have that arrangement ratified by the voters in a presidential election. Never before had voters reelected a Democratic president and simultaneously entrusted both chambers of Congress to the GOP.

Just how deep the divisions were in Washington became all too apparent in the next few years. House Republicans in 1998 launched an inquiry into a White House sex scandal that culminated in the impeachment of Clinton on charges that included lying to a federal grand jury about his affair with a White House intern. It was only the second presidential impeachment in U.S. history. The GOP went ahead with the impeachment proceedings despite heavy losses in the 1998 midterm elections that many interpreted as voter disapproval of the impeachment inquiry. Many in the party instead had placed the blame for the election losses on House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia, who in the aftermath gave up his leadership position and resigned his House seat. Although Clinton was acquitted in the Senate, his impeachment ordeal left a deep reservoir of acrimony and bitterness in Washington.

It was hard to imagine that anything could surpass the tumult of 1998. But then came the 2000 election. It was the presidential election that provided the real drama and proof of the deep political divisions in the country. Democrat Albert "Al" Gore Jr. won the nationwide popular vote by more than a half million votes, but the vote in the electoral college remained uncertain for five weeks after the election as the two parties fought over the electoral votes of Florida, which would put one of them over the top. Republican George W. Bush had a razor-thin edge in Florida's popular vote, but the Democrats, charging that there had been problems with voting machines, demanded manual recounts. The battle was fought in county, state, and federal court-houses. In the end, a decision by a very divided U.S. Supreme Court halted the Democrats' push for further recounts and allowed the Florida votes, and thus the election, to go to Bush.

In the 2000 congressional elections the GOP won a fourth term in the majority, but it was also the third straight election in which the Republicans lost House seats. The election resulted in a 221–212 party split in the House, with two independents. The nine-seat difference was the closest after a House election since 1952. The Senate was even closer—a 50–50 tie for the first time in more than a century. Bush's victory meant that Richard B. Cheney, the incoming vice president and presiding Senate officer, would have the tie-breaking vote in the Senate, thus assuring continued GOP control of that chamber. This rare arrangement was short-lived, however, as moderate Republican James Jeffords of Vermont left the GOP to become an independent in June 2001, giving majority control of the Senate to the Democrats for the first time since 1994.

President Bush came into office not acting like someone who had won the White House in such a narrow and unusual fashion; instead, he opted to project an image of political strength. Slim margins in both houses of Congress throughout Bush's first term led to a good deal of political gridlock and high levels of partisanship, but some major pieces of domestic legislation were approved, including tax cuts, an education bill, campaign finance reform, and Medicare reform. The Republicans regained control of the Senate in the 2002 elections. For only the third time in a century, and the first time since 1934, the party in control of the White House won seats in a midterm election. The GOP regained the Senate by winning two seats and expanded its majority in the House by picking up six seats.

But the biggest change during Bush's first presidential term occurred on September 11, 2001, when terrorists attacked the United States, altering the nation's focus and changing the administration's priorities. The Bush administration launched wars in Afghanistan, and later Iraq, and created the Department of Homeland Security. For only the third time in a century, and the first time since 1934, the party in control of the White House won seats in a midterm election. Bush ran a reelection campaign in 2004 based primarily on his role as a wartime leader, defeating Democratic Massachusetts senator John F. Kerry, himself a hero of the Vietnam War. In 2004 the Republicans held onto the White House while picking up seats in both houses of Congress. In the Senate the GOP gained four seats to widen their majority to fifty-five versus forty-four Democrats and one Independent. In the House the GOP added three seats to increase their majority to 232 versus 202 Democrats and one Independent.

That year was the high-water mark for the GOP. Increasing public disapproval of the Iraq war, combined with a series of congressional scandals, almost all involving Republicans, gave Democrats the opening they needed. In the 2006 midterm elections they won back control of both chambers, setting the stage for a final two-year showdown with Bush leading up to the 2008 elections.

The momentum that started in 2006 gained strength over the following two years as the president's popularity plummeted. Democrats were helped in 2008 by signs the economy was heading into serious trouble, highlighted by a bursting of the housing bubble that had sent nominal home value to heights that seemed impossible to maintain. When the bubble burst in 2007 it revealed a huge swath of subprime mortgages involving individuals and families who had inadequate income and assets to be homeowners. Their plight was exacerbated by job losses as the economy headed toward recession. Soon hundreds of thousands of these homes were in foreclosure.

The growing economic storm, which broke most seriously in September 2008 with the failure of a venerable Wall Street firm, Lehman Brothers, combined with the continued unpopularity of the war in Iraq, propelled the Democratic Party to full control of the national agenda. Voters elected Illinois senator Barack Obama president by a popular vote margin of 53–46 percent and gave increased margins to Democrats in both the House and Senate.

1993–1995: The 103rd Congress

The Democrats had won the presidency and retained Congress in 1992 with a promise of moderate, constructive change. Clinton ran as a “New Democrat” who would have government do fewer things but do them better. Clinton said he would restrain “big nanny” government and reduce the federal budget deficit—an issue forced to the top of the national agenda in part by the independent candidacy of billionaire H. Ross Perot (who received 19 percent of the popular vote). At the same time, the Clinton who campaigned in 1992 was brilliant in addressing the concerns of middle-class voters. He promised to get serious about public finances, but partly as a way to guarantee the financial future of such programs as health care, old-age pensions, and education.

This broad mix of somewhat contradictory expectations went largely unmet. Congress waited for President Clinton to send a reform program with specific measures for it to pass. But when the new president—distracted, unfocused, and inexperienced—had difficulty getting his program started, Congress failed to take the initiative in major areas until it was too late to build a record to defend in the 1994 elections. When the 103rd adjourned in the fall of 1994, the Washington Post called it the worst Congress in living memory, and the Baltimore Sun called it simply “dysfunctional.”

Clinton was distracted in the early going by symbolic issues of importance to certain Democratic constituencies: such as the acknowledgment of gays in the military and the promotion of more women to the highest ranks of government. Clinton also sacrificed much of his time and energy to foreign crises in Somalia and Haiti, which were of little interest to most Americans. These issues did little to build momentum for Clinton’s legislative program. On the gay issue, he buckled under to opposition from Congress and the military establishment. He succeeded in finding a woman to be attorney general, but only after two highly publicized and embarrassing misfires. While Clinton sent ideas to Congress on many issues, there was no effective follow-up.

Eventually, the Clinton administration and the Democratic leadership in Congress did agree to go to the voters in 1994 with accomplishments in three key areas—health care, crime, and reducing the deficit. The goal was to lend plausibility to the idea that the Democrats could still deliver on the issues they had raised—and voters had responded to—in 1992.

The 103rd Congress managed to pass a deficit-reduction package in 1993, but without attracting a single Republican vote in either chamber. That left the majority open to the GOP’s charge that the bill was more surely a tax-and-spend package than a reduction in the deficit or in unnecessary spending. During the 1994 and 1996 campaigns, Republicans would call the deficit reduction package “the largest peacetime tax increase in American history.” The same could have been said of the last two tax increases enacted by Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush in 1982 and 1990, respectively, which in constant dollars (adjusted for inflation) were even larger. But the charge stuck, in part because neither Clinton nor congressional Democrats did much to convince the nation that higher taxes were necessary. They argued that only the wealthiest Americans were really paying higher income taxes under the 1993 law, but Republicans replied by noting that the gasoline tax had been raised for everyone.

The Omnibus Crime Bill of 1994 was another disappointment in political terms. The Democratic leadership tried to cobble together three bills in one: a tough anticrime bill to please conservatives; a gun-control bill to please liberals; and a facilities construction and jobs creation bill to please voters in the communities affected. When the Republicans attacked the bill as bloated with pork and violating Second Amendment rights, the House Democratic leaders had trouble keeping their troops in line (the Congressional Black Caucus defected, in part to protest the bill’s provisions expanding use of the death penalty). The majority party could not muster the votes to bring the bill to the floor for official consideration in August 1994, a rare and humiliating event.

The leadership had to go humbly to the Republicans, led by then Minority Whip Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., and rewrite parts of the bill to get the votes for floor consideration. Some observers considered this a watershed in the forty-year history of Democratic control, and it took place less than three months before the midterm elections.

But an even greater debacle overtook the Democratic leadership in both chambers in their effort to enact an overhaul of the nation’s health care system. Clinton placed First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton at the head of a special panel on the issue. Her panel held hearings that were closed to the public before presenting a complex and unwieldy bill to Congress, where various individuals, committees, and factions were already working on their versions. In the end, no bill had enough support to emerge from the pivotal House committee, and an eleventh-hour effort to fashion a viable bill in the Senate collapsed in the face of Republican opposition.

These major failures more than offset the 103rd Congress’s legislative successes, which included enactment of the “Brady Bill” to require a waiting period for handgun purchases and ratification of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA)—and NAFTA was passed mostly with Republican votes.

The 1994 Midterm Elections

If the congressional Democrats ended the 103rd Congress in disarray, the House Republicans were on the march. A younger and more combative generation, led by Gingrich, completed their takeover of the party in the House when Minority Leader Robert Michel of Illinois announced he would retire. Gingrich and his cohorts then drew up a ten-plank “Contract with America” that was signed by virtually every Republican running for the House in fall 1994—incumbents and challengers alike. It promised a more responsive institution in which issues would be debated in the light of day and brought to an up-or-down vote. On substantive matters, the Republicans continued to promise lower taxes; a balanced budget; smaller, less intrusive government; and the promotion of morality, ethics, and “family values” in society and government.

Gingrich accused the Democrats of breaking faith with the American people by promising a “New Democrat” administration but governing as free-spending and arrogant “Old Democrats” out of touch with the people. He predicted that the Republicans would regain the House after four decades of Democratic rule.

Although that seemed a bold prediction, there had been signs that the voters were pulling back from the Democrats almost as soon as they had installed them in power. In December 1992, within weeks of Clinton's election, a special runoff election in Georgia brought the defeat of an incumbent Democrat, Sen. Wyche Fowler. The runoff had been forced by the state's majority-vote requirement, which was repealed in time to elect another Democrat to the state's other Senate seat by a plurality in 1996. In June Kay Bailey Hutchison gained another Senate seat for the GOP in a special election to replace Sen. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas, who had resigned to become secretary of the Treasury. In November 1993 Republicans won both of the gubernatorial elections held (Christine Todd Whitman in New Jersey and George F. Allen in Virginia) and claimed the mayor's office in New York City as well.

But neither Gingrich's brash self-confidence, nor the election results leading up to November 1994, quite prepared Washington for what happened.

Results of the 1994 Elections

The nation's verdict on the first two years of the Clinton administration—and on the 103rd Congress—could not have been clearer: the Republicans made a net gain of fifty-two House seats—their biggest gain since 1946—and seized control of that chamber for the first time in forty years. They stormed into the majority in the Senate for the first time in eight years with a net gain of eight seats.

Six prominent national Democratic leaders were among the thirty-four incumbent representatives, two incumbent senators, and four incumbent governors defeated for reelection. Thomas S. Foley of Washington was the first Speaker of the House to be unseated since the political turmoil leading into the Civil War. Rep. Dan Rostenkowski of Illinois, chair of Ways and Means and an architect of the tax overhaul of 1986 and the budget agreements of 1990 and 1993, and Rep. Jack Brooks of Texas, chair of the House Judiciary Committee and an author of the Omnibus Crime Bill, both lost. (At the time of his defeat, Rostenkowski was under federal indictment on embezzlement, fraud, and cover-up charges.) Sen. Jim Sasser of Tennessee, chair of the Senate Budget Committee and another author of the 1990 and 1993 budget agreements, was defeated by a Republican doctor, Bill Frist. Had Sasser won, he was expected to be elected the new Democratic leader of the Senate.

Governors Mario Cuomo of New York and Ann Richards of Texas, traditional liberals who had made stirring speeches to Democratic national conventions in 1984 and 1988 respectively, were also defeated. Their loss put GOP governors at the helm in all but one (Florida) of the nation's largest states. Republicans also unseated incumbent Democratic governors in Alabama and New Mexico and gained open gubernatorial offices in Connecticut, Idaho, Kansas, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Tennessee, and Wyoming. They lost open seats in Alaska and Maine (to an Independent), leaving themselves with a 30–19 lead in governors—their first such advantage since 1970. The GOP also made substantial gains in state legislatures.

For the first time since 1920, not a single incumbent Republican representative, senator, or governor was defeated for reelection. The Senate got its first freshman class with no Democrats since the Constitution was amended in 1913 to provide for popular election of senators. Democrats gained just four open seats in the House and the open governorship of Alaska.

The new Republicans in the Senate were Jon Kyl of Arizona, Olympia J. Snowe of Maine, Spencer Abraham of Michigan, Rod Grams of Minnesota, John Ashcroft of Missouri, Mike DeWine of Ohio, James Inhofe of Oklahoma, Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, Bill Frist and Fred Thompson of Tennessee, and Craig Thomas of Wyoming.

Several incumbent Democrats won closely contested Senate races: Dianne Feinstein was reelected in California, Edward Kennedy in Massachusetts, Frank Lautenberg in New Jersey, Jeff Bingaman in New Mexico, and Charles S. Robb in Virginia. The Democrats also won close governorship races in Florida and Georgia. Otherwise the GOP victory was their most complete since the 1920 landslide that followed World War I.

1995–1997: The 104th Congress

The Republicans seemed to misread the nation almost as soon as the election celebrations were over. Just as the Democrats had spoiled their post–1992 opportunity to become the dominant party of the post–cold war era, the GOP set itself up for a backlash in the 1996 elections that would give Clinton a second term and bring the Democrats back to life, if not to the majority, in the House.

But before the Republicans overreached themselves, and alienated the American voter by their combative style and uncompromising assault on government, they succeeded in restoring the House of Representatives as a functioning, open, and responsive institution of government.

Elected Speaker without opposition in his party, Gingrich held his Republican majority to the “Contract with America” that virtually all had signed. In the first one hundred days of the 104th Congress, the GOP kept its promise of reform. The House voted on all elements of the Contract, passing all but the congressional term limit (which needed two-thirds to amend the Constitution).

Among other things, the Contract items required Congress to appropriate money to pay for federally mandated programs and required that workplace regulations that Congress long ago imposed on private businesses also apply to Congress itself (including employee safety and equal employment opportunities). Congress also gave the president a line-item veto with which to strike out “pork-barrel” spending (the Supreme Court, however, would strike it down as unconstitutional in 1998). The House also passed a balanced-budget amendment to the Constitution, which failed the two-thirds majority test in the Senate by one vote.

Moreover, the new Republican majority streamlined the House, eliminating committees and sharply reducing staff and budget. It passed rules requiring open debate and public voting on issues. Sensing the public mood, the Democrats went along with most of these reforms. But the more important political question was to what ends these procedural reforms would be used. It was on these substantive issues that the GOP may have misinterpreted its mandate.

Speaker Gingrich, like President Clinton two years earlier, wanted to do everything he heard his voters calling for and do it right away. He called the GOP victory “a revolution.” The centerpiece of his revolution was a proposed budget he said would cut taxes and move toward a balanced budget while protecting Social Security and Medicare. The voters did not believe him, and the Democrats worked as hard to demonize the Republican budget as the GOP had worked to defeat health care and other initiatives in the 103rd Congress. There were warning signs of voter unease as early as the summer of 1995, but the new House Republicans were determined to push for their agenda.

Their aggressiveness on the budget issue gave President Clinton a major opportunity to revive his fortunes. Gingrich and other Republican leaders were convinced Clinton would not dare veto their budget and appear to be blocking tax cuts and a balanced budget on the eve of his reelection campaign.

However Clinton vetoed their budget, gambling that the public had turned suspicious of the GOP leadership. In the showdown that followed, the federal government went through two partial shutdowns in late 1995 and 1996. To the horror of congressional Republicans, polls showed the public siding with Clinton and blaming the shutdowns on Congress. It was the media-savvy president who appeared reasonable and interested in serious negotiations. The Republicans lost much of their momentum, goodwill, and sense of direction. They did not accomplish as much as they might have, and in 1998 they found themselves maneuvered into enacting a largely Democratic agenda that included raising the minimum wage.

Their strongly ideological approach to sensitive issues such as immigration, English-only language requirements, and affirmative action cost them votes among Hispanic and Asian Americans while gaining few votes within their base. Similarly, they energized opposition by threatening to repeal a popular ban on semi-automatic assault weapons and by attacking popular restrictions on mining and logging on public lands.

Still the 104th Congress was able, with bipartisan support, to enact the most comprehensive social welfare legislation in sixty years. The 1996 welfare reform act ended the federal guarantee of a handout and attempted to move welfare recipients back into the job market. Congress also passed legislation extending a worker’s right to retain current health insurance coverage after leaving a job.

The 1996 Campaigns

Starting in mid-1995, Clinton began a recovery as remarkable as Bush’s decline four years earlier. The 1994 election freed Clinton to ignore the Democratic left—except on such symbolic issues as race relations, equal opportunities for women, and improved educational opportunities. He moved quickly to the command positions at the center, promising to protect the American people from the “radical right.”

Objections from the Democratic left were muted—even when Clinton signed the welfare reform bill—and Clinton ran unopposed for renomination in 1996. In the meantime, the Republicans were unable to rally behind a single champion who could unify the party, present a cogent alternative to Clinton, and plausibly propose to govern the country.

The Republicans, dominated by Main Street economic conservatives, rallied behind Sen. Robert J. “Bob” Dole of Kansas, the majority leader in the Senate. Dole was next in line in the GOP hierarchy, and he had many powerful friends. But he was also the choice of the establishment for want of a better candidate. Some supply-side Reagan Republicans, preaching tax cuts as the key to economic growth and a balanced budget, supported Sen. Phil Gramm of Texas. Others preferred Malcolm S. “Steve” Forbes, a political neophyte who was heir to a publishing fortune and willing to spend freely.

Most of the social conservatives and economic nationalists were led once again by Patrick J. Buchanan, who had made a long-shot run for the nomination in 1992. After some rough early going (he lost in New Hampshire), Dole pulled ahead and clinched the Republican nomination by the end of March. He fell behind Clinton in the polls early in 1996, however, and he was never able to convince voters that he had a unifying view that would help him control his party and govern the country. Moreover, the quintessential “man of the Senate” did not appear to enjoy campaigning. Clinton, whose ebullient optimism and love of people were genuine, again proved himself a superb campaigner regardless of his limited success on the substantive issues.

Results of the 1996 Elections

On November 5, Clinton became the first Democrat since Franklin Roosevelt to win more than one presidential election. The results were strikingly similar to the voting of 1992. Only five states voted differently from four years earlier: Florida and Arizona switched to Clinton, in part because Hispanics moved toward the Democrats and in part because older voters were distrustful of the GOP on Social Security and Medicare. Georgia, Montana, and Colorado switched to the GOP. Clinton won with 49 percent of the vote to Dole's 41 percent. It was an improvement on the 43 percent Clinton had taken in 1992, but it fell shy of a majority. Perot, campaigning under the Reform Party banner, garnered less than half of the 19 percent he had won four years earlier as an independent. Clinton enjoyed a huge 16 percent margin among women voters and even larger majorities among single women and among blacks and Hispanics of both sexes.

Unlike 1992, Clinton claimed no broad mandate for reform. The total vote cast was eight million less than in 1992; and the percentage of eligible voters who turned out at the polls (49 percent) was the lowest since 1924.

Remarkably, the voters chose at the same time to return a Republican Congress, in a distant echo of the results of 1956 and 1848. Considering the presidential result, the congressional results were strikingly similar to 1994. The Republicans had a net loss of only nine seats in the House, and a net gain of two in the Senate, for a 227–207 edge in the House (with one Independent), and a 55–45 margin in the Senate.

The nine new Republican senators were Jeff Sessions of Alabama, Tim Hutchinson of Arkansas, Wayne Allard of Colorado, Sam Brownback and Pat Roberts of Kansas, Susan Collins of Maine, Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Gordon Smith of Oregon, and Mike Enzi of Wyoming. New Democratic senators were Max Cleland of Georgia, Richard J. Durbin of Illinois, Mary L. Landrieu of Louisiana, Robert G. Torricelli of New Jersey, Jack Reed of Rhode Island, and Tim Johnson of South Dakota.

Unlike the bloodbath of 1994, only three Democratic House incumbents were defeated in 1996, along with eighteen Republicans. Only one incumbent senator, Republican Larry Pressler of South Dakota, and no incumbent governor was defeated. Democratic House gains in the Northeast and the West Coast were partly offset by GOP gains in the Mountain West, and by further Republican gains in the South.

Since the 1994 election, the GOP had gained the governorship of Louisiana in late 1995, and West Virginia in 1996, while losing New Hampshire. Clinton's successor as governor of Arkansas resigned after conviction of a felony and was succeeded by a Republican lieutenant governor, leaving the nation with thirty-two Republican governors, seventeen Democrats, and one Independent (in Maine). The new governor of West Virginia, Cecil Underwood, had been the youngest in the nation when he was first elected in 1956. After winning a second term, forty years later, he was now the oldest at seventy-two.

1997–1999: The 105th Congress

The 105th Congress started off fairly low-key. The partisan confrontation and inflexibility of the preceding Congress seemed to give way to a spirit of moderation and compromise characteristic of earlier times. Together the two parties began to compile a modest record of legislative accomplishments.

As congressional leaders and White House officials watch, President Bill Clinton signs the balanced budget agreement of 1997—one of the few issues Republicans and Democrats could agree on.

But by the end of the Congress things were anything but low-key, bipartisan, or moderate. The 105th Congress went into the history books, when, for only the second time ever, the House voted to impeach a president.

At the outset of the Congress, members of both parties agreed that the November 1996 elections had sent a message that encouraged cautious legislating. Republican leaders worked through the committee system to build majority coalitions—many of them bipartisan—to pass bills. Lawmakers looked more often for common ground with their adversaries rather than sticking to ideological purity. The profile of controversial leaders such as House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., receded into the background.

This more traditional style of legislation won Republicans what the bravado of the last Congress had not. The most notable example was a landmark, bipartisan agreement to balance the budget by 2002 while providing the biggest tax cut since the Reagan administration. GOP leaders also got all thirteen regular appropriations bills enacted, abandoning the take-it-or-leave-it strategy that had triggered two government shutdowns and hurt Republicans during their first two years in power. When the Republican congressional leaders did attempt to force President Clinton to accept several controversial policy riders attached to a must-pass disaster relief bill, their ill-conceived plan backfired—Clinton vetoed the bill and the Republicans were forced to retreat.

Both parties had to contend with infighting. The debacle over the disaster relief bill accelerated a revolt against Gingrich that had been brewing secretly for months.

Ultimately the coup was unsuccessful, but it illuminated growing discontent with his leadership and forced Gingrich to assume a more traditional role as Speaker by becoming more involved in the day-to-day operations of the House. Gingrich had been only narrowly reelected Speaker at the beginning of the Congress and just weeks later, because of ethics infractions, had become the first Speaker in history to be formally reprimanded by the House.

On the Democratic side, Clinton suffered his biggest defeat in the first session when House Democrats refused to support the renewal of “fast-track” authority, which guaranteed expedited votes, with no amendments allowed, on trade agreements the president submitted to Congress.

Despite their cooperation on certain issues, fighting between the parties still went on outside the legislative arena. GOP hearings into campaign finance excesses in the 1996 election made for some embarrassing moments for the Democrats—and a few for the Republicans as well.

But this battle paled in comparison to the partisan warfare that broke out in the second session. Revelations about a Clinton sex scandal emerged early in the session, casting a shadow over the 105th Congress until its final hours when the House voted to impeach the president.

Clinton’s impeachment arose out of the findings of an independent counsel, Kenneth W. Starr, who had been appointed in 1994 to investigate a tangled web of political and financial relationships involving an Arkansas land investment—known as Whitewater—by the Clintons in the 1970s and 1980s. Over the years Starr’s investigation widened and in January 1998 the independent counsel began looking into allegations that Clinton had had an extramarital affair with White House intern Monica S. Lewinsky, lied about it under oath, and urged her to lie about it under oath. Clinton had denied having a sexual relationship with Lewinsky in a civil deposition in a sexual harassment lawsuit brought against him by former Arkansas state employee Paula Corbin Jones. Lewinsky had signed an affidavit in that case, also denying a sexual relationship with Clinton.

When the allegations became public just days after Clinton’s testimony in the Jones case, the president quickly and vehemently denied all charges. But in August, during testimony before the Starr grand jury videotaped at the White House, Clinton admitted having had a relationship with Lewinsky that was “not appropriate” and that he had “misled” the public about it. He insisted that his testimony in the Jones case had been “legally accurate” because of the definition the lawyers used for “sexual relations.”

In September, Starr reported the findings of his investigation to Congress, leveling eleven specific charges of wrongdoing against Clinton. After the House voted to release Starr’s report, lurid details of the affair were quickly and widely disseminated in the media and over the Internet. Polls indicated that though the public was embarrassed and shocked, people were loath to drag it out further in public proceedings.

But in October the House authorized an impeachment inquiry and on December 11 and 12, the House Judiciary Committee voted along strict party lines to recommend four articles of impeachment. On December 19, despite public opposition and with the concurrence of only a handful of Democrats, the full House adopted, by a vote of 228–206, an article accusing the president of perjury in his August 1998 testimony before the Starr grand jury, and, by a vote of 221–212, a second article accusing the president of obstruction of justice. The House rejected, by a vote of 205–229, an article accusing him of perjury in his deposition in the Jones case, and, by a vote of 148–285, an article alleging abuse of power. Before the vote, Democrats staged a brief protest by walking out of the House chamber en masse. They were upset because the Republican majority would not allow a floor vote on an alternative presidential censure resolution.

Because many Republican leaders believed that voter support for Clinton would eventually wane as the scandal unfolded and that the GOP would reap the benefits at election time, they did not push a legislative agenda in the second session as strongly as in previous years. Although some consequential measures cleared in 1998, none approached the magnitude of the 1997 budget agreement.

The 1998 Midterm Elections

The 1998 election year opened in January with the disclosure of Clinton’s affair with Lewinsky. It closed with Congress preparing to hold impeachment hearings. The impending inquiry into Clinton’s behavior undoubtedly was the biggest cloud hanging over the congressional elections. But no one was certain of the outcome.

Democrats hoped they could turn the scandal against Republicans, attacking the impeachment hearings as a partisan witch hunt. Republicans generally refrained from making the scandal a major issue in the elections, choosing to ride the tide rather than make waves. They feared a voter backlash if they overplayed their hand. Party leaders said the scandal’s greatest impact would be on voter turnout. Both parties realized their fates hinged on motivating their voter base.

Results of the 1998 Elections

With the economy healthy and the nation at peace, Clinton’s popularity remained high through the midterm elections despite the scandal. In an apparent backlash against impeachment, voters sent five more Democrats to the House, handing Republicans the slimmest majority in the House since 1955. The embarrassing setback prompted Gingrich to resign as Speaker and leave the House. It also reinforced the Republican majority’s resolve to impeach Clinton.

In the final analysis, the election brought little turn-over in either the House or Senate. The incoming House would contain 223 Republicans, 211 Democrats, and one Independent. In the Senate, the breakdown remained the same at fifty-five Republicans and forty-five Democrats. As usual, incumbents were the overwhelming favorites. All but seven of the 401 House members seeking reelection won. Just three of the thirty-four senators up in 1998 were defeated—Alfonse M. D’Amato, R-N.Y., Lauch Faircloth, R-N.C., and Carol Moseley Braun, D-Ill.

Despite these status quo results, Gingrich initially touted the election as the “first time in seventy years that Republicans kept control of the House for a third term.” Democrats gloated that it was the first time since 1934 that the party controlling the White House gained seats in an off-year election—and the first time since James Monroe in 1822 that the president’s party picked up House seats in his sixth year in office.

Democrats defied history and conventional wisdom in putting back together much of their old New Deal coalition. Outreach efforts by the party and its allies to encourage blacks, Hispanics, union members, gays, women, and Jews to get out and vote succeeded in the low-turnout midterm environment. The party even restored some of its luster in the eyes of white men in certain races by nominating conservative or centrist candidates.

Republicans were left arguing whether appeals to their conservative base had been too weak, or had been so strong as to drive away potential voters. GOP base turnout had been taken almost as a given, with conservatives expected to cast votes in anger over Clinton’s behavior. Instead, many conservatives had grown dispirited as they saw Clinton appearing to survive yet another scandal. They also were angry at congressional Republicans for a less-than-frugal end-of-session budget deal.

Gingrich had strengthened his hand in 1998, after surviving the previous year’s overthrow attempt. But ill will and nagging doubts about his ability to lead Republicans in the majority returned in the wake of the unwieldy budget deal and a failed, last-ditch attempt by GOP leaders to improve their electoral standing by running television commercials that focused on Clinton’s marital affair. Gingrich’s decision to resign came three days after the November 3 election and just hours after he drew a challenge from a candidate who appeared to have the stature and connections to beat him—Appropriations Committee Chair Robert L. Livingston, R-La. House Republicans endorsed Livingston to succeed Gingrich, but shortly before the House voted to impeach Clinton the Speaker-designate announced that he would resign from Congress in response to a sex scandal of his own. Republicans quickly turned to J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois to be the next Speaker.

Senate Republicans fared far better at the polls than their House counterparts, managing to retain their comfortable ten-seat edge. But just a few months earlier, Republicans had dared to dream of sixty seats, enough to overcome a partisan filibuster. Instead, they preserved the numerical status quo, prompting some rumbles of discontent.

Overall, eight new senators were elected—four Republicans and four Democrats. The Republicans were: Michael D. Crapo of Idaho, Peter Fitzgerald of Illinois, Jim Bunning of Kentucky, and George V. Voinovich of Ohio. Democrats included Blanche Lincoln of Arkansas, Evan Bayh of Indiana, Charles E. Schumer of New York, and John Edwards of North Carolina.

Republicans managed to hold on to the lion’s share of the nation’s governorships, with sixteen incumbents reelected and two defeated, and seven freshmen elected. Democrats had six incumbents reelected, none defeated, and five freshmen elected. This translated into a net loss of one governorship for the GOP, taking the party down to thirty-one. Democrats, who had controlled thirty-one governorships when Clinton entered the White House in 1993, remained well behind at seventeen. The remaining two governorships were won by independents—one incumbent and one freshman.

Republicans watched the Bush brothers, George W. and Jeb, coast to victories in Texas (reelection for George W.) and Florida (first term for Jeb). Sons of former President George H.W. Bush, they would be the first brothers to simultaneously preside over two states since Nelson and Winthrop Rockefeller held sway over New York and Arkansas in the late 1960s. With control of two of the biggest prizes in electoral votes, the Bush brothers were assured a decidedly prominent place on the political landscape.

But the GOP lost the biggest prize—California—when Democrat Gray Davis, California’s lieutenant governor, soundly defeated his Republican opponent. California was expected to gain as many as five congressional seats after the 2000 census. With Democrats also controlling the California legislature, the party had high hopes of drawing congressional lines to maximize its strength.

The Minnesota race provided one of the biggest surprises of the 1998 state elections when Reform Party candidate Jesse “The Body” Ventura, a former professional wrestler, was elected governor.

The 106th Congress would have been seen as historic for its timing alone, spanning the end of one millennium and the beginning of another. But it was what went on between the opening and closing gavels that made it another Congress for the history books.

At the beginning, the Senate, for only the second time ever, conducted a trial of impeachment charges against a president. Although President Clinton was acquitted and Congress attempted to go about its business, partisan warfare was never far from the surface. Two years of feuding and open distrust left the 106th Congress unable to complete its business on time. The two sides agreed to call a truce and return for a lame-duck session after the 2000 election. The idea was to let the voters decide which party, and which philosophy, they preferred to see lead. But the message the American voters sent could not have been murkier.

The outcome of the presidential race hung in the balance for five weeks after election day, as the Democratic candidate, Vice President Albert “Al” Gore Jr., and his Republican opponent, Texas governor George W. Bush, fought over Florida’s electoral votes. Although the Republicans managed to retain control of Congress, they saw their already thin margin narrowed even more. For many, the end of partisan strife was not in sight. Even the Clinton era was not going to end, thanks to the election of Hillary Rodham Clinton to the Senate from New York—a first for a first lady.

The Senate impeachment trial had opened on January 7, 1999—just one day after the 106th Congress convened—amid pomp, solemnity, and pledges to avoid the acrimony that had permeated the House impeachment proceedings. At the outset few believed that the Senate would muster the two-thirds supermajority needed to convict and remove Clinton from office, especially with the president’s popularity high and the public seemingly weary of the scandal. Acquittal seemed all but certain when only fifty-six senators voted to keep the case alive in a January 27 vote.

The Senate deliberated behind closed doors for three days before rendering its verdict of acquittal on February 12, when Supreme Court chief justice William H. Rehnquist posed the final question of the trial: “Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, William Jefferson Clinton, guilty or not guilty?” By that point the only real suspense centered on whether either article would garner a simple majority of Senate support. That would have provided a legally meaningless but symbolically important victory for the Republicans who pushed the House to impeach Clinton. But the House prosecutors, who had chafed under limitations imposed by senators during the trial, failed to achieve even that modest goal.

Article I, alleging Clinton committed perjury before a federal grand jury, steadily lost support as the trial progressed and was defeated, 45–55. Ten Republicans joined with all forty-five Democrats in rejecting the charge. Article II, which alleged a scheme by the president to obstruct justice, was regarded by most senators as the far stronger count. But it was defeated on a vote of 50–50. Five Republicans, all of them moderates from the Northeast, joined unanimous Democrats in rejecting the charge.

Technically, it was over, but the fallout would be felt for some time. Nonelection years are often when Congress gets its best work done, but chances for a productive 1999 legislative season were undermined by the bitter partisanship left over from impeachment. Clinton used his veto to stop any GOP-backed legislation he opposed. Republicans returned the favor by stalling Democratic legislation. The Senate majority dealt Clinton a stinging defeat by rejecting a treaty to expand restrictions on nuclear testing.

The 106th Congress was sidetracked by other events besides impeachment. Just six weeks after Clinton’s acquittal, NATO launched an aerial bombing campaign against Serbia to halt the Serbs’ drive to “ethnically cleanse” in Kosovo. That overshadowed Washington’s domestic policy debate and submerged the agendas of both parties. Shootings in April at a high school in Littleton, Colorado, also shocked the nation and prompted renewed debate on gun control.

By the end of the first session, the list of work left in progress outstripped the session’s accomplishments. Democrats made their familiar “do-nothing-Congress” complaint, and indeed there were weeks when the House considered little substantive legislation and the Senate slogged through long lists of amendments. One major accomplishment was enactment of a law allowing banks, securities firms, and insurance companies to compete on one another’s traditional turf.

Things did not improve in the second session. Presidential politics were partly to blame, but there were other factors as well. House and Senate Republicans could not agree on how to proceed on politically difficult measures such as broader federal regulation of managed health care plans, which died in a House-Senate conference. While House Republicans pushed legislation they knew could pass with their razor-thin majority, Senate Republicans were less eager to engage in the procedural wrangling necessary to move their priorities. Senate Democrats mastered the art of the filibuster and used it well, slowing the Senate to a crawl when they disagreed with the GOP leadership.

Perhaps the year’s most impressive accomplishment was passage of legislation to give China permanent normal trade status. Other successes included legislation to restore Florida’s Everglades and the first change, albeit a narrow one, in federal campaign finance law in two decades.

Republicans and Democrats both wanted to add a prescription drug benefit to Medicare but disagreed on the best way to accomplish it. Both chambers passed bills to increase the minimum wage but were unable to iron out their differences. Republicans got two important pieces of their tax strategy—repeal of the estate tax and the so-called marriage tax penalty—through both chambers but failed to override Clinton vetoes. Both sides did agree on a bill to allow more senior citizens to earn as much as they wanted without losing Social Security benefits.

As the scheduled adjournment neared, Republicans decided to reverse the pattern of earlier years when they basically gave in to Clinton’s spending demands. The two sides fought bitterly over the final appropriations measures and a lame-duck session became inevitable. After the presidential contest was finally settled in Bush's favor, an emboldened GOP leadership insisted on more concessions from Clinton than he had made in the past.

The 2000 Campaigns

The impeachment of President Clinton left Democratic candidates in 2000 in a difficult position: How could they capitalize on the Clinton administration's stellar economic performance while distancing themselves from the scandals that tainted his presidency? No one had a tougher time wrestling with this dilemma than Vice President Al Gore.

Gore's position as the presumptive Democratic party nominee for president initially looked as if it would go unchallenged, as prominent Democrats declined to run. Among them were House minority leader Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri, civil rights activist and two-time presidential hopeful Jesse Jackson, and senators Bob Kerrey of Nebraska, John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, and Paul Wellstone of Minnesota. But then Bill Bradley, a former New York Knicks basketball star and former three-term senator from New Jersey, jumped into the contest.

Both Gore and Bradley were considered centrist "New Democrats" because of their free-market and free-trade credentials and their views on foreign policy. Bradley hoped that weariness with the scandals of the Clinton presidency would attract support. He was especially critical of the Clinton-Gore campaign's fund-raising in the 1996 presidential race and campaigned on a platform of reforming the campaign finance system. But Bradley failed to excite the Democratic faithful and, despite a strong showing in New Hampshire—garnering nearly 46 percent of the vote compared to Gore's nearly 50 percent—did not win a single primary. Bradley dropped out of the race March 9, just two days after the Super Tuesday primaries in eleven states.

The GOP presidential nomination race began with a crowded field. Early dropouts included former cabinet secretary Elizabeth Dole, former vice president James Danforth "Dan" Quayle, Ohio representative John R. Kasich, former Tennessee governor Lamar Alexander, and conservative commentator Patrick J. Buchanan, who switched to the Reform Party. Those still in the race at the beginning of 2000 were Bush, Arizona senator John McCain, Utah senator Orrin G. Hatch, publisher Malcolm S. "Steve" Forbes, and former Reagan administration officials Gary Bauer and Alan Keyes. Of the six, only Bush, McCain, and Forbes were said to be in contention. Forbes, after spending more than $38 million of his fortune, dropped out shortly after finishing third in the February 8 Delaware primary.

Bush, son of President George H.W. Bush and the presumed front-runner for the Republican nomination, faced an aggressive challenge from McCain. The Arizona senator had a solidly conservative record but still won support from independents and Democrats, who were attracted by his anti-establishment message, compelling personal story as a prisoner of war during the Vietnam conflict, and platform that called for reforming the campaign finance system and fighting pork-barrel government spending. McCain's eighteen-point win in New Hampshire stunned the Bush campaign. The Texas governor bounced back in South Carolina, but McCain regained footing with victories in Michigan and his home state of Arizona. Next Bush won the Virginia and Washington primaries. McCain's crusade came to an end on Super Tuesday, when Bush defeated him in seven of the eleven contests, including those in California, New York, Ohio, and Missouri.

The presidential primary season continued into June, but, with their respective nominations sown up by early March, Gore and Bush quickly focused on their general election campaigns. Both men, mindful of perceived weaknesses in their candidacies, made shrewd choices for running mates. Bush, seen by some critics as lacking the experience, especially foreign policy, and even the intellect needed for the Oval Office, chose Richard B. Cheney, who had served as a U.S. representative from Wyoming, White House chief of staff under President Gerald R. Ford, and secretary of defense under Bush's father. Cheney's selection had the desired affect of reassuring potential supporters. Gore needed to deflect public dissatisfaction with Clinton's behavior and with his role as vice president in the 1996 campaign finance scandal. To do this, he turned to Joseph I. Lieberman, a Connecticut senator who had won praise for publicly condemning Clinton for the Lewinsky scandal, sharply criticizing the White House for the 1996 fund-raising scandal, and attacking Hollywood for placing profits over moral values. Lieberman was the first person of Jewish descent ever to run on a national ticket.

The Reform Party, which won nearly 19 percent of the vote in 1992 and 8 percent in 1996, all but self-destructed in 2000. Its presidential ticket was eligible to receive $12.6 million in public funding available for the 2000 campaign because of the party's performance in the last presidential election. When Patrick J. Buchanan left the Republican Party and sought the Reform Party nomination, his candidacy split the party and turned its convention into a shouting match between rival factions. In the end, Buchanan got the nomination of one of the factions and ultimately the federal money.

Consumer advocate Ralph Nader emerged as the nominee of the Green Party. Not much attention was paid to Nader until it dawned on Democrats that if Nader took votes away from Gore in closely contested states, Bush could win their electoral votes. The Gore campaign tried in the closing days of the race to win over Nader supporters, but nearly three million cast their votes for Nader.

Bush and Gore waged a close and costly battle for the White House. The two fought over everything from the pocketbook issues of taxes and gasoline prices to their competing visions for education, the health care system, Social Security, and Medicare. Bush, hoping to capitalize on the Clinton scandals, promised to restore dignity and respect to the presidency. Gore tried to distance himself from Clinton's troubles by emphasizing that he was his own man, while still taking some credit for the prosperity the nation enjoyed during the Clinton era.

The polls showed Gore and Bush moving up and down in the polls during the campaign, but as the election approached they were basically running neck and neck. The election was expected to go down to the wire, but no one could have anticipated the tumult that lay ahead.

Results of the 2000 Elections

Gore and Bush had appeared to be locked in a virtual dead heat—and rightfully so. American voters were almost evenly divided over their choice for the next president, as evidenced by the near-tie vote cast for president on November 7. The deep political divide in the country was reflected in the congressional races as well, resulting after several recounts in a 50–50 split in the Senate and another razor thin edge for the GOP in the House. Not since the Eighty-third Congress (1953–1955) had the margins been nearly this close in both chambers. The last time the Senate had been evenly split was in the Forty-seventh Congress (1881–1883).

Gore clearly led Bush in the popular vote nationwide. But the electoral college count was anything but clear. Florida emerged as the make-or-break state—whoever won Florida's twenty-five electoral votes would win the White House. Election night gave a vivid preview of the chaos that was to come: the television networks first declared Gore the winner in Florida, then Bush, and finally said it was too close to call. Gore at one point called Bush to concede the election but retracted his concession about an hour later.

In the days that followed, Bush at first was said to have won by almost 1,800 votes, but an automatic recount triggered by that slim margin cut the difference to a little more than 300 out of nearly six million votes cast. Bush's attempts to claim victory set off a firestorm. Absentee ballots were still arriving and Gore forces requested hand counts in several heavily Democratic counties. Both sides traded accusations and lawsuits were filed in local, state, and federal court. Manual recounts led to a debate over whether examiners could properly discern the intent of voters who had not punched their ballots all the way through and whether such votes should count.

The atmosphere was bitterly partisan. For starters, the election hinged on the outcome in a state where Bush's brother, Jeb Bush, was governor, although he did initially recuse himself. The secretary of state who under state law had the discretion to certify the results was a Republican who had campaigned for Bush in New Hampshire during the primary race. All the judges on the Florida Supreme Court had been appointed by Democratic governors (one with the concurrence of a Republican governor). Vote counts by Democratic election boards were closely watched by official GOP observers who could challenge their actions. Both sides brought out their party elders and held dueling press conferences. Demonstrators held noisy protests. The Republican-controlled Florida legislature threatened to intervene and choose its slate of electors if things were not resolved by the time the winning electors were to meet in the state capital to cast their votes. Members of the U.S. Congress championed their party's candidates. In the midst of all the confusion, GOP vice-presidential candidate Cheney suffered a mild heart attack and was sidelined for several days.

The Bush campaign failed to get a federal court in Atlanta to stop the recounts. After the Florida Supreme Court permitted the manual recounts to continue and set a new deadline for certification of the results, the Bush campaign claimed that the state court had overstepped its bounds and appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court. When the court-set deadline of November 26 arrived, the recounts had not been completed, but Bush was certified the winner by 537 votes. Democrats contested the certified results in court and pushed for completion of the recounts.

After hearing arguments on Bush's appeal of the state court decision, the U.S. Supreme Court on December 1 vacated that decision and sent the case back to the Florida Supreme Court for clarification. On December 8, the Florida Supreme Court, by a 4–3 vote, ordered manual recounts of thousands of disputed ballots and added votes discovered in recounts to Gore’s total. The Bush campaign appealed the decision and the next day the U.S. Supreme Court ruled 5–4 to halt the recounts and set a date for arguments in the case.

On December 12 the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that Florida’s hand counting of votes violated the Constitution because it did not treat all votes equally. The Court’s holding that the recount violated the Constitution was 7–2, but a narrow 5–4 majority on the Court also found that it was too late to improve the hand counting and stopped any further action in Florida. That decision cemented the vote total certified on November 26, which had Bush ahead.

Although Gore said he disagreed with the Court’s finding, he acknowledged the finality of the decision and the authority of the Court by formally conceding the election to Bush on December 13. Bush would be the first president since Benjamin Harrison in 1888 to win the electoral college vote but lose the popular vote.

Although overshadowed by the presidential election, the congressional elections provided drama as well. Republicans went into the 2000 election with a 54–46 edge in the Senate but came out locked in a 50–50 tie with the Democrats. The party breakdown had remained uncertain for some time after the election. A close race in Washington state between Republican incumbent Slade Gorton and Democratic former representative Maria Cantwell went to Cantwell after a recount. But it was not until the presidential contest was settled that the final Senate breakdown was known. Lieberman, Gore’s running mate, had not only run on the Democratic Party’s national ticket but had also sought reelection to his Senate seat. If Lieberman had become vice president, the Republican governor of Connecticut likely would have appointed a Republican as Lieberman’s successor. Lieberman’s return to the Senate resulted in the first tie in more than a century.

The Democrats lost one incumbent senator—Charles S. Robb of Virginia—and the open seat of retiring Democrat Richard H. Bryan in Nevada. Four GOP Senate incumbents were defeated in addition to Gorton—Spencer Abraham of Michigan, John Ashcroft of Missouri, Rod Grams of Minnesota, and William V. Roth Jr. of Delaware. Of these, the most stunning upset came in the Missouri contest, where the late Gov. Mel Carnahan—who died in a plane crash four weeks before the election—won by nearly 50,000 votes, or 50 percent to Ashcroft’s 48 percent. Interim governor Roger Wilson had promised to appoint Carnahan’s widow, Jean, to the seat for two years. Ashcroft declined to challenge the results. Republicans also lost the sole open GOP-held seat of retiring Sen. Connie Mack.

New York’s historic Senate race between Democratic first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and Republican representative Rick A. Lazio was the biggest political story through much of the election year, until overtaken by the closeness of the presidential contest and Missouri’s bizarre Senate race. Clinton became the first first lady ever elected to public office when she prevailed over Lazio to take the seat left open by retiring Democratic senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan.

On the House side, Republicans knew right after the election that they had retained control. But here again it was more than five weeks before they knew by what margin. After the completion of several recounts, the final breakdown was 221 Republicans, 212 Democrats, two Independents. The 221–212 split meant a two-vote gain for the Democrats.

With congressional districts due to be redrawn with the 2000 census data, there was heightened interest in state elections. After the November 7 elections, the GOP held twenty-nine governorships, while Democrats held nineteen, with independents in Maine and Minnesota. Of the eleven gubernatorial races in 2000, the Democrats won eight and the GOP, three. The only Democratic gain—and the only seat where party control changed—came in West Virginia, where Democratic representative Bob Wise defeated Republican governor Cecil H. Underwood. The elections also resulted in the election of five woman governors, a record number.

As a result of the election, Republicans controlled eighteen state legislatures and Democrats, sixteen. In fifteen states, control was divided. Nebraska’s unicameral legislature was nonpartisan. Eight Democratic governors led Democrat-controlled legislatures, and thirteen Republicans governed GOP-controlled legislatures.

2001–2003: The 107th Congress

The 107th Congress started out amidst confusion and partisanship. The presidential election had taken more than a month to resolve, involving judicial intervention by the U.S. Supreme Court, and the legislature itself was divided. The House was under narrow Republican control—a continuation of the pattern that had been in place since the watershed 1994 elections. But the Senate faced a fifty-fifty split, with Republicans in control because of the vice president’s tie-breaking vote. This unusual situation resulted in a historic power-sharing agreement under which each party would have equal representation on committees although Republicans would chair the panels.

This unique arrangement came to an abrupt halt several months later, when Sen. James Jeffords, a centrist Republican from Vermont, announced that he was leaving the GOP, giving majority control to the Democrats. In June, he became an Independent who caucused with the Democrats. Senate majority leader Trent Lott, a Mississippi Republican, switched roles with Senate minority leader Tom Daschle, a Democrat from South Dakota—another historic event for the 107th Congress. Democrats took over committee chairmanships, and a new agreement gave Democrats a one-seat majority on committees.

On the House side, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, an Illinois Republican, continued in his position, as did Majority Leader Richard Armey and Majority Whip Thomas DeLay, both of Texas. The Democrats retained Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri as their leader. David Bonior of Michigan continued to hold the number-two Democratic post, but he stepped down in January 2002 and was succeeded by Nancy Pelosi of California, the first woman to hold such a high-ranking post.

Bush's first year in office—indeed, his entire first term—was dramatically affected by the events of September 11, 2001, when al Qaeda terrorists hijacked four U.S. planes and flew two into New York City's World Trade Center towers and one into the Pentagon outside Washington, D.C., killing thousands. The fourth crashed in rural Pennsylvania, killing all on board.

Before the terrorist attacks, the country had been focused more on issues closer to home, including the economy, which, after the boom years of the late 1990s, had dipped into recession. In addition, with the cold war at an end, many Americans had not spent as much time worrying about other parts of the world, including the Middle East, the hijackers' home ground. The attacks changed everything, putting the country on a wartime footing with new government agencies coordinating terrorist-fighting activities and the United States engaged in combat in Afghanistan and then Iraq.

In the days immediately following the attacks, the president's popularity skyrocketed. His ratings had been languishing, standing at 51 percent just before the attacks and cresting at 90 percent later in September as the country rallied behind him. Congress, previously fractious, also gathered behind Bush and his agenda for fighting terrorism. It passed a $40 billion emergency spending bill and a resolution that authorized using force against terrorist groups and nations that back them. In addition, it passed the controversial USA PATRIOT Act, which gave the attorney general more power to go after suspected terrorists. Capitol Hill itself faced the threat of terrorism when an anthrax scare resulted in the closure of some congressional office buildings beginning in October 2001.

The terrorist attacks also sparked the largest federal government reorganization in decades, when Bush signed legislation in late 2002 creating a new Department of Homeland Security. At first, the president had resisted the idea of a new federal department, preferring instead to house the homeland security bureaucracy within the White House under former Pennsylvania governor Tom Ridge. But Bush eventually threw his support behind the creation of a new department, and Congress, after a debate that stretched over several months, approved legislation in November 2002. The department, which officially came into existence on March 1, 2003, brought together various functions—including the U.S. Customs Service, the recently created Transportation Security Administration, and the Immigration and Naturalization Service—that had been part of other agencies.

Bush, meanwhile, had acted quickly on his resolve to track down terrorists, quickly launching military action in Afghanistan that resulted in the toppling of that country's Taliban regime, which had allowed the al Qaeda network behind the September 11 attacks to operate there.

Next, the president turned his sights on Iraq and its leader, Saddam Hussein. In September 2002, Bush went to the United Nations to make his case for U.S. military action against Iraq. The administration sought to link Hussein—Bush's father's nemesis from the 1991 Gulf War—to Osama bin Laden, the leader of the al Qaeda terrorists who struck the United States. The administration also made the case that Hussein had restarted developing weapons of mass destruction, a program that had been curtailed after Iraq's defeat in the Gulf War. Later in fall 2002, following a lengthy debate, Congress approved a special resolution giving the president authority to launch military action against Iraq.

On the domestic side, Bush acted quickly after his 2001 inauguration to push for one of his key campaign pledges: a massive tax cut. Congress approved a $1.35 billion cut, the first of several large tax cuts during Bush's first term. The president also succeeded in winning congressional backing for a bipartisan education reform bill known as No Child Left Behind; Congress passed the education bill in late 2001 and Bush signed it into law in January 2002.

Congress also addressed the problems with the nation's election system in the wake of the 2000 Florida crisis, passing the Help America Vote Act, which Bush signed just before election day 2002. The act provided federal money to help states update voting equipment and foster better voter education, among other provisions. In another attempt at political reform, Congress approved and Bush signed the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002, also known by the names of its chief Senate sponsors, Republican John McCain of Arizona and Democrat Russell Feingold of Wisconsin. The act's provisions included a ban on federal candidates' and national parties' spending and raising of "soft money."

A lame-duck session after the 2002 elections ended without agreement on most of the fiscal year 2003 spending bills.

Meanwhile, in the 2001 off-year elections, New York City had selected Michael Bloomberg, a Republican, as mayor, succeeding another Republican, Rudolph Giuliani, who had made a national name for himself in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks. Democrats fared well in the New Jersey and Virginia gubernatorial races, however. Democrat James McGreevey won in New Jersey and Democrat Mark Warner won in Virginia, marking gains for the party in both states, which had been governed by Republicans.

The 2002 Midterm Elections

Generally, midterm elections spell trouble for the party of an incumbent president. But Bush broke that pattern in 2002, as his vigorous campaigning for Republican candidates in the months before election day apparently helped the GOP pick up seats in both the House and Senate. Just in the final week before the elections, for example, Bush visited fifteen states.

The 2002 midterm campaigns were held against the backdrop of the 2001 terrorist attacks and the congressional battles over authorizing war in Iraq and, earlier, creating the Department of Homeland Security. The focus on national security and defense played to the strengths of the Republican Party, which for decades has been perceived in the polls as stronger on such issues than the Democrats. The minority party failed to make a strong overall case for change, despite troubles with the nation's economy and the federal budget, which had plunged back into deficit after the boom years of the late 1990s when the Clinton era had produced budgetary surpluses.

Results of the 2002 Elections

In what seemed to be vindication for Bush and his wartime policies, in 2002 Republicans won back the Senate and maintained control of the House, giving the GOP control of both the executive and legislative branches. The GOP regained the Senate by winning two seats and expanded its majority in the House by picking up six seats.

In the Senate, Republicans picked up seats in Georgia, Minnesota, and Missouri. In Georgia, GOP representative Saxby Chambliss upset Democratic senator Max Cleland, in a vicious race featuring an ad that sought to paint Cleland, who had lost both legs and an arm in Vietnam, as being weak on homeland security issues. In Minnesota, Democrat Walter Mondale—the former vice president who had stepped in late in the campaign to replace Democratic senator Paul Wellstone, who had been killed in a plane crash—lost to the former Republican mayor of St. Paul, Norm Coleman. In Missouri, former Republican representative Jim Talent defeated incumbent Democrat Jean Carnahan, who had been appointed two years earlier to fill the seat of her late husband. The GOP won five open seats: Rep. John Sununu won in New Hampshire; former cabinet secretary Elizabeth Dole in North Carolina; Rep. Lindsey Graham in South Carolina; former governor Lamar Alexander in Tennessee; and state attorney general John Cornyn in Texas.

The Democrats picked up a Senate seat in Arkansas, where state attorney general Mark Pryor defeated incumbent Republican Tim Hutchinson. Democrat Frank Lautenberg, a longtime former senator, held the New Jersey Senate seat being vacated by scandal-plagued Democratic senator Robert Torricelli. The results gave Republicans a two-seat pickup in the Senate for a total of fifty-one Republicans, forty-eight Democrats, and Independent James Jeffords of Vermont.

Republicans also fared well in the House, thanks in part to redistricting after the 2000 census, in which Republican areas in the South and West won seats at the expense of Democratic-leaning areas of the North and East. In addition, when drawing new boundary lines, both parties managed to protect their incumbents. Congressional Quarterly ranked only forty-five seats as highly competitive as the election approached, and in the end, 96 percent of House members were successful in their reelection bids—an unusual situation for the first House elections after a census.

Several House races featured two incumbents battling each other in a redistricted seat; of those contests, Republicans won most of them. In Mississippi, Republican Chip Pickering defeated Democrat Ronnie Shows; in Illinois, Republican John Shimkus was victorious over Democrat David Phelps; in Connecticut, veteran Republican Nancy Johnson won over Democrat Jim Maloney; but in Pennsylvania, Democrat Tim Holden defeated Republican George Gekas.

On the gubernatorial front, Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, the president's brother and a prominent figure in the 2000 presidential controversy in the Sunshine State, won reelection. Overall, volatility was common, as twenty governorships switched from one party to the other with the Democrats gaining seats. The new governorship totals were twenty-six Republicans to twenty-four Democrats.

2003–2005: The 108th Congress

The 108th Congress, perhaps even more than its predecessor, was noted for its partisan gridlock. With both the Senate and the House under narrow Republican control and Democrats itching to win either the Senate, the House, or—most temptingly—the White House in 2004, many legislative items died without being resolved.

The 108th saw some new faces amidst its top leadership. Sen. Bill Frist of Tennessee was selected as the new Senate majority leader, after his predecessor, Trent Lott of Mississippi, faced a storm of criticism for making controversial remarks about South Carolina senator J. Strom Thurmond's segregationist past. Kentucky's Mitch McConnell was the new majority whip, the number-two post. Tom Daschle of South Dakota and Harry Reid of Nevada continued in their positions for the Democrats.

On the House side, Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois retained his post, while Thomas DeLay of Texas moved up to the number-two Republican post of majority leader and Roy Blunt of Missouri succeeded DeLay as majority whip. Ohio's Deborah Pryce became chair of the House Republican Conference. Meanwhile, Nancy Pelosi of California made history by becoming the first woman to head a political party in Congress, when she was selected as Democratic minority leader. She replaced Richard A. Gephardt, who had stepped down. Maryland's Steny Hoyer replaced Pelosi as minority whip, and New Jersey's Robert Menendez became chairman of the Democratic Caucus, the first Hispanic to hold such a high post.

The war against Iraq, and its aftermath, dominated much of the 108th Congress. On March 19, 2003, a "coalition of the willing," led by the United States and the United Kingdom, attacked Iraq. Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein's government soon toppled, and on May 1, Bush stood on the U.S.S. Abraham Lincoln, a sign behind him reading "Mission Accomplished," to announce that large-scale combat operations in Iraq were over. However, hostilities continued and U.S. casualties mounted, leading to growing opposition, especially among Democrats, and widespread anti-American sentiment throughout the world. The financial costs of the war increased as well; Congress approved a $78 billion supplemental spending measure for fiscal 2003, followed by an $87 billion supplemental for fiscal 2004.

Domestically, the 108th Congress's modest successes included a sweeping Medicare reform bill. Among its provisions was a prescription-drug benefit for seniors. But even the passage of that legislation, in November 2003, faced charges of partisanship, after Republican leaders held the vote on the House-Senate conference version of the bill open for almost three hours (instead of the usual fifteen minutes) as they sought a few more supporters for the legislation; it passed the House on a close 220–215 vote.

Another issue sparking partisanship, which also had been a factor in the 107th Congress and continued into the 108th (and beyond) was Bush's judicial nominees. In such a narrowly divided Senate, Democrats succeeded in blocking several of the nominees, whom they considered too conservative, and Frist was unable to line up the sixty votes needed to force a vote. Republicans, for their part, staged a lengthy debate in November 2003, accusing Democrats of being "obstructionist." Democrats countered that Republicans used similar tactics to stall many of President Clinton's judicial nominees in the 1990s.

The 2003 off-year elections, meanwhile, saw a surprising special gubernatorial race in California, where Republican movie star Arnold Schwarzenegger won election to succeed Democrat Gray Davis, who was removed after an unusual recall campaign. Republicans also picked up governorships in Mississippi—where Haley Barbour, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, defeated incumbent Democrat Ronnie Musgrove—and in Kentucky, where Rep. Ernie Fletcher, a Republican, defeated Democrat Ben Chandler. Democrats picked up Louisiana, where Democrat Kathleen Blanco defeated Republican Bobby Jindal.

The 2004 Campaigns

With the midterm contests over, political attention quickly moved on to the 2004 presidential battle, where Bush planned to seek reelection as a wartime president fighting global terrorism. The president, with an unchallenged ride to his party's nomination, focused on this central message.

One question facing the president was whether he would retain Vice President Cheney on his 2004 ticket. Cheney's poll ratings were low, and he had been out of public view for much of the time after September 11. The vice president suffered from heart trouble, and his former company, Halliburton, was under investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission, eventually agreeing to pay a $7.5 million penalty in a settlement. But Bush opted to keep Cheney on the ticket, and the vice president played an important role on the campaign trail, attacking the Democrats for being what he considered soft on terrorism.

The Democratic field, meanwhile, was wide open. During 2001 and into 2002, speculation had centered on Al Gore, who, after all, had won the popular vote in 2000. Many assumed the former vice president would seek a rematch with Bush in 2004. However, Gore decided in December 2002 against a run, and a large group of Democrats plunged into the contest.

Several of the candidates were senators, including Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, who had been Gore's running mate in 2000; John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, a long-serving member of the Senate who first became known in the early 1970s when, as a decorated Vietnam veteran, he opted to oppose the war; and John Edwards, a freshman from North Carolina who had made his money as a trial lawyer. Bob Graham of Florida also entered the race, only to drop out before the first contest.

Other candidates included Richard A. Gephardt of Missouri, the former House minority leader, who had strong backing from labor unions; and Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, whose strong position against the Iraq war won him support from some on the Democratic left. Former Vermont governor Howard Dean also took a strong antiwar position and attracted support from many voters, including young people, by his use of innovative Internet campaign strategies. Also running were retired general Wesley Clark, former Illinois senator and ambassador Carol Moseley Braun, and the Reverend Al Sharpton.

While the faltering economy at home was one focus of Democratic attacks on the Bush administration, the ongoing conflict in Iraq soon came to dominate much of the news. Bush had declared an end to major combat activities, but violence continued and U.S. casualties mounted. Dean's antiwar focus soon launched him into the front-runner position in the Democratic nomination contest.

But with the January 19 Iowa caucuses approaching, Kerry began to rise in the polls, assisted by the surprise appearance in Iowa on Kerry's behalf of Jim Rassmann, a Green Beret whose life Kerry had saved in Vietnam. Kerry's wartime experience gave him a boost among Iowa voters, and he won the contest. Edwards came in a surprising second, and the once front-runner Dean dropped to third. Gephardt, who had hoped for stronger support from his labor allies, placed fourth and pulled out of the contest.

Kerry, who called himself the "comeback Kerry," saw his momentum continue into the all-important New Hampshire primary on January 27. After Kerry's victory in New Hampshire, he won most of the other contests, and gradually his competition dropped out. Kucinich stayed in the race for months, appealing to more activist members of the party although he did not manage to raise large amounts of money.

Kerry selected Edwards as his vice-presidential running mate, a choice that was almost expected. The North Carolinian had attracted much positive attention in the primaries, although he won only South Carolina, the state where he was born. Edwards, the son of a millworker, played up his working-class southern roots and was seen as a good contrast to the more patrician-appearing Kerry. In addition, Edwards's youthful appearance contrasted with the vice president's elder-statesman qualities.

The race between Bush and Kerry was close through much of the summer. But a group called Swift Boat Veterans for Truth started airing attack ads against Kerry, criticizing his service in Vietnam. Kerry had used his Vietnam experience as a key theme in his campaign, and this negative ad began to hurt him in the polls. In addition, the Bush team had success in portraying the Democrat as a "flip-flopper," using his votes on the Iraq war as one example; Kerry had voted for the congressional authorization for the use of force in Iraq but later voted against an $87 billion supplemental spending bill. Kerry managed to turn the race back into a neck-and-neck contest after the first presidential debate September 30, a forum in which he came through as a serious, intelligent candidate while the president seemed to scowl and grimace as Kerry spoke.

As election day, November 2, approached, attention focused on about a dozen competitive states that were neither Democratic "blue" nor Republican "red." These so-called purple states were where the candidates spent much of their time and television advertising money. They included Florida, the site of the 2000 controversy; several midwestern states—Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio, and Wisconsin; New Hampshire; and New Mexico.

Results of the 2004 Elections

As expected, turnout was high in the 2004 elections, especially in the battleground states, as both parties sought to mobilize their base voters and register new ones. The race between Bush and Kerry came down to the wire, and Democrats had hopes of winning seats in the Senate and perhaps the House as well. With the 2000 election as a backdrop, lawyers had mobilized on both sides, and some observers were predicting another drawn-out fight over the White House.

In the end, most of the states followed their 2000 pattern, supporting the same party for president that they had four years earlier. Bush carried Florida more easily than he had in 2000; it was Ohio that kept people in suspense overnight this time around. Kerry conceded the election the morning after the election, on November 3, unable to overcome Bush's margin in Ohio. Republicans solidified their control over the capital, winning a second White House term for Bush and padding their majorities in both the Senate and House.

Bush succeeded this time in winning both the popular vote—51 percent to Kerry's 48—and the electoral vote—286–252. Ralph Nader, the third-party candidate whom many Democrats had blamed for Gore's loss in 2000, was a negligible factor in 2004. The only states to switch sides from 2000 to 2004 were Iowa and New Mexico, which went Republican, and New Hampshire, which went Democratic.

In the Senate, Republicans scored a net gain of four, ending up with fifty-five seats. Democrats faced their biggest losses in the South, where five of their incumbents—Bob Graham of Florida, John Edwards of North Carolina, Ernest Hollings of South Carolina, Zell Miller of Georgia, and John Breaux of Louisiana—retired. Republicans swept all five seats, and a crop of new GOP senators was elected: Mel Martinez, former Bush secretary of Housing and Urban Development, in Florida; Rep. Richard Burr in North Carolina; Rep. Jim DeMint in South Carolina; Rep. Johnny Isakson in Georgia; and Rep. David Vitter in Louisiana. Republicans also held an open seat in Oklahoma, where former representative Tom Coburn was elected. But the GOP's biggest victory came in South Dakota, where former representative John Thune knocked off Senate minority leader Tom Daschle, whom Republicans had labeled an "obstructionist."

Democrats managed to pick up two GOP-held open seats, in Colorado and Illinois, where Sens. Ben Nighthorse Campbell and Peter Fitzgerald, respectively, were retiring. Ken Salazar, the Colorado state attorney general, and rising political star Barack Obama, an Illinois state senator, won election.

In the House, too, Republicans picked up seats, scoring a net gain of three. Most of those GOP gains were the result of a controversial Republican-backed redistricting plan in Texas, the second since the 2000 census. Republicans picked up five seats in Texas; among those defeated were longtime Democratic representatives Martin Frost and Charles Stenholm. Republicans also won a seat in Indiana, where Democratic representative Baron Hill lost to Republican Mike Sodrel, and picked up an open Democratic seat in Kentucky, where Republican Geoff Davis was elected.

Democrats picked up two GOP-held open seats; Ken Salazar's brother, John, won election to a Colorado House seat and Brian Higgins won an open seat in New York state. In addition, Democrat Melissa Bean defeated longtime Republican incumbent Phil Crane in Illinois, and Democrat John Barrow defeated freshman Republican representative Max Burns in Georgia. Overall, though, with the exception of the turmoil in Texas, few House seats changed hands in 2004.

Governors' races saw more volatility, although the party breakdown remained at twenty-eight Republicans and twenty-two Democrats. Republicans picked up governorships in Indiana and Missouri, while Democrats picked up Montana and New Hampshire. The most controversial gubernatorial contest came in Washington State, in a battle that echoed the 2000 presidential race. Democrat Christine Gregoire took office after apparently narrowly defeating Republican Dino Rossi; the results were challenged in the state's court in 2005, where Gregoire prevailed.

At the start of 2005, Republicans were in the majority in both houses of the state legislature in twenty states and Democrats in nineteen states, with ten states split (Nebraska's legislature is unicameral and nonpartisan). At the federal level, although Republicans retained command of all branches of government after the 2004 elections, their control was narrow, and continued partisanship seemed likely as Bush was sworn in for a second term and the 109th Congress set to work.

Historians may see the two-year period of 2005 to 2007 as the closing bookend of President George W. Bush's time in the White House, even though he would remain there for an additional twenty-four months. The 109th Congress, the period of these two years, remained firmly in Republican control, as it had for all of Bush's years since his presidency began in 2001, except for the Senate between 2001 and 2003 when Democrats held a one-vote edge.

The strains that grew from an activist and aggressive period of governing by a unified and ideologically conservative political party were increasingly visible by the time the 109th Congress had adjourned, and the voters' judgment on the GOP was stark. In the November 2006 midterm elections, Democrats recaptured control of both houses of Congress—the House of Representatives by a comfortable margin that granted full control of the chamber and the Senate by a narrow margin that required—and allowed—constant maneuvering, even compromising, by both parties in the 110th Congress, the final two years of the Bush presidency.

Still, with the Republicans firmly in control of the 109th Congress, the GOP pushed through much new legislation favored by the party and the political, economic, and social interests that undergird its base of supporters. But the strains were evident as party discipline, especially in the House, began an inelegant unraveling while the Democrats developed an unaccustomed order in their ranks. These two unexpected changes in the political dynamics in Congress left House Republicans and to a lesser extent the Senate GOP challenged to muster majority votes on bills entirely from their caucuses. It often was not possible. Even though legislation did get to the president's desk, much of the 109th Congress was devoted to political posturing leading up to the fall elections that commentators and candidates alike sensed might be a Democratic year.

Some part of the GOP's problems were of its own making, reflecting an increasingly unpopular presidency, and part stemmed from events over which there was no control.

The most significant uncontrollable events were two massive hurricanes that swept through the Gulf of Mexico, devastating much of the coastal region. The first, and more damaging, was Hurricane Katrina, which hit Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi on August 29, 2005, flooding 80 percent of New Orleans and creating vast swaths of destruction throughout the area. The second was Hurricane Rita, which hit the gulf region a month later, coming on land at the Texas-Louisiana border. The political fallout grew out of a bungled relief effort by federal government emergency agencies following Katrina. Americans watched endless television coverage showing thousands of people waiting for help that did not come until much later. The government's slow and mismanaged response to the human and economic damage colored national perception of the Bush administration for months afterward.

Public shock over the government's response to the hurricanes fed into a growing voter dismay over the continuing war in Iraq that Bush had launched in 2003. American casualties continued to rise and bloody sectarian violence among Iraqi groups, plus a growing body of terrorists drawn to the unstable nation, projected an image of administrative incompetence in carrying out the war that had begun with success in toppling the regime of Saddam Hussein.

Not all of the Republicans' woes came from natural disasters. Throughout the 109th Congress they were plagued with ethical issues that the Democrats later were to gleefully portray as a “culture of corruption.” The most serious was an indictment in September 2005 in Texas of GOP majority leader Tom DeLay in an alleged fund-raising scandal. DeLay stepped aside, replaced by Majority Whip Roy Blunt, Mo., but pledged to return to power after clearing his name. He never did. In January 2006 DeLay said he would not try to regain his leadership job, and in June he resigned from the House. His downfall was closely related to his ties to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who that same January agreed to cooperate with prosecutors looking into favors he traded for political help from members of Congress. DeLay’s departure meant the House GOP had lost its most effective leader in decades, a person famous for lining up and delivering the votes his party needed to enact much of President Bush’s agenda after 2001. DeLay’s successors simply did not have the capacity to replicate his talents.

Abramoff’s downfall led to other House Republican scandals. Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio, who had already be tied into the Abramoff investigation, stepped down as a committee chair, while maintaining his innocence of wrongdoing, before—in fall 2006—pleading guilty to two federal counts of conspiracy and false statements in the influence-peddling scandal. Randy “Duke” Cunningham of California, resigned his seat in December 2005 after pleading guilty to bribery and tax evasion. Cunningham was an influential voice on defense issues. He admitted accepting at least $2.4 million in bribes to use his position on the House Appropriations Committee to steer funds to defense contractors. In late 2006 Mark Foley of Florida resigned following revelation of inappropriate e-mails and instant messages sent over several years to both serving and former teenage male pages. The episode haunted the Republicans because of the impression that the GOP leadership, from the Speaker on down, knew of Foley’s conduct for some time and had done nothing to deter it.

Viewed from the Democratic perspective, the 109th Congress was a disaster for the Republicans, and more than a few Republicans agreed. Much went wrong. The annual budget process all but broke down in 2006, although key defense measures—including for the Iraq war—did get through. Nine of eleven appropriations bills were left for 2007, with Congress merely passing continuing resolutions to keep the government operating. Republicans also failed to enact legislation to make a substantial dent in the cost of entitlement programs.

An effort to rewrite immigration policy failed, despite an unexpected collaboration by Bush and some Democrats to find middle ground. The legislation failed in the face of a fundamental split in Republican ranks between its business-oriented wing, which wanted to find ways to keep and even expand the illegal immigrant labor force, and cultural and social conservatives of the party focused on border security and tough measures to expel the same people. They argued illegal immigrants stole jobs from U.S. citizens and threatened to erode the nation’s predominant culture.

Nevertheless, the two sessions did not make for a completely do-nothing Congress as the Democrats alleged. Coming off the highly successful 2004 election, the GOP-dominated Congress moved quickly to revise the bankruptcy code, enact a substantial energy program, authorize a massive highway and mass transit program, limit class-action suits, set national standards for drivers’ licenses, and deal with methods of handling enemy detainees caught in the wars following the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. In 2006 Congress rewrote pension law to give more protection to workers, cut taxes by $70 billion over five years and extended previous tax cuts, and completed a five-year package aimed at cutting $38.8 billion from programs including student loans, Medicaid, and Medicare. Congress also reauthorized the landmark Voting Rights Act.

Perhaps the most important legacy of the period for Bush and his GOP allies in Congress was the nomination and confirmation of two new, youthful, and conservative Supreme Court justices. These new members held out renewed hope to conservatives that their long-sought goal of moving the Court further to the political right was now within their grasp. The first change was the confirmation of John G. Roberts Jr. as chief justice, the first change in that position since 1986. His long-time predecessor, William H. Rehnquist had died September 3, 2005. Roberts was easily confirmed and sworn in September 29. Roberts had spent just two years on the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. But because both Rehnquist and Roberts were conservatives, the change did not immediately affect the Court's alignment. The second appointment held out the promise of doing just that.

On July 1, 2005, Sandra Day O'Connor, the first woman on the Court, announced her retirement. Although appointed by Ronald Reagan, O'Connor had become the key swing vote on the Court, siding with neither the liberal nor the conservative wing—much to the frustration of conservatives nationwide. (Originally, Roberts was nominated to replace her; when Rehnquist died, Bush changed his nomination to chief justice.) Bush later settled on Samuel A. Alito Jr., a judge on the Third Circuit Court of Appeals who, like Roberts, had a strong conservative record. Democrats and liberals aggressively opposed him, saying he was hostile to abortion rights, civil rights, and workers' rights, and that he favored government and big business over individual rights. But the effort fizzled in the face of Alito's indisputable legal credentials for the job and the GOP's determined majority to get him on the court. Although a Senate filibuster was attempted, it was easily put down in January 2006 by a 72–25 vote, and Alito was confirmed the following day, 58–42.

The 2006 Midterm Elections

The Republican Party's ascendancy in Washington stalled in the 2006 elections. In a national sweep that resembled the Republican takeover of Congress in 1994, Democrats regained control of both chambers by picking up a net of thirty seats in the House and six in the Senate. The Democrats gained seats in each of the four national regions including eleven House seats—the largest number—in the Northeast. Only one Republican survived in that part of the country, making the once rock-solid GOP region more like a Democratic bastion. In the Midwest, Democrats picked up nine House seats, reducing the Republican majority there to a near dead heat, 49–51. Even in the South, which by the first decade of the new century had become the core of Republican strength, the Democrats picked up six House seats, although they still trailed the GOP by a substantial margin, 57–85.

Moreover, Democrats won twenty of the year's thirty-six gubernatorial contests and had control of eight more state legislatures than the GOP.

The turnaround was astonishing in light of the increasingly solid hold on Washington that the GOP had built since 2002. In 2004 the Republicans held onto the White House while picking up seats in both houses of Congress. In the Senate the GOP gained four seats to widen their majority to fifty-five versus forty-four Democrats and one independent. In the House the GOP added three seats to increase their majority to 232 versus 202 Democrats and one independent. The success prompted House Majority Leader DeLay to declare that the foundations were in place for a "permanent" Republican majority in Congress.

President Bush's declining popularity, reflected most significantly in widespread disapproval of the war in Iraq and buffeted by the government's inept response to Hurricane Katrina in 2005, was seen in Democratic 2006 gains in districts carried by Bush in the 2004 presidential elections: two-thirds of Democratic gains came in states or districts that had favored Bush just two years earlier.

The defeat of GOP incumbents accounted for all the Senate Republican losses. In the House, Democrats picked up twenty-two Republican seats in which incumbents were running in the general election. The other eight Democratic wins were in open-seat contests.

Nevertheless, incumbency remained an important bulwark for both parties. All Democratic incumbents who ran for reelection won, and all open seats previously held by a Democrat were retained by the party. On the Republican side only one in ten GOP incumbents running lost in the general election. Overall 94 percent of House incumbents won; in Senate races the figure was almost 79 percent.

Election analysts noted that most defeated Republican House candidates did not have close races in 2004 and were veteran members with at least eight years in the chamber. To achieve their victory, Democrats expanded the playing field that had become smaller in recent years. In 1994, when the GOP won control of Congress, there were nearly 100 competitive House races (those with a winning margin of under 55 percent of the total vote), according to elections expert Rhodes Cook. The number was fewer than fifty in 2002 and just thirty-six in 2004. But in 2006 the number of competitive races rose to sixty-eight. Most of those seats were held by Republicans, and Democrats won many of them.

Although many of the GOP problems were of their own making, or were uncontrollable such as the Iraqi war and Hurricane Katrina, Republicans also were faced with a better organized and more determined Democratic campaign structure.

For the first time in many years the notoriously disorganized Democrats had in place congressional and campaign leaders who made their party competitive. The Senate and House leaders, Harry Reid of Nevada, and Nancy Pelosi of California, maintained unusual party unity among rank-and-file members, allowing them to thwart much of the Republican agenda.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., brought a mastery of campaign fund-raising to the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee. Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., proved an able head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee by significantly expanding the number of districts that had competitive races in 2006. Both men aggressively sought out attractive Democratic candidates to challenge GOP incumbents.

The 110th Congress was the first since 1993 controlled by Democrats. But unlike 1992, when Bill Clinton was in the White House, Democrats in 2007 faced Republican president George W. Bush, who threatened and exercised robust use of his veto. Moreover, Democrats controlled the Senate by a single vote, giving the GOP ample room to block Democratic proposals.

The two-year span of the Congress proceeded—until its last several months—largely along the lines that observers had expected of a government divided between the White House of one party and legislators of the other: funding of programs was approved, some significant legislation was passed, and compromises—and political posturing—were in vogue. But the 110th Congress was different because of events near its end that few persons anticipated, or even thought possible: a near meltdown of the financial system of the nation and most of the world. By the beginning of 2009 the United States had been in an officially declared recession for more than a year and nearly every other nation faced economic declines as serious as any since the Great Depression of the 1930s.

In the United States, Congress, the White House, and every federal agency with financial and economic authority, from the Federal Reserve and the Treasury to bank and security regulators, acted to prevent a wholesale collapse of the economy. The starting point of the crisis was debated, but its spread involved the collapse of a housing market boom that had vastly expanded the nominal value of homes in most parts of the nation, a condition that economists and others—many in retrospect—recognized as a classic bubble. Underlying it was the existence of a vast subprime mortgage crisis characterized by reckless lending to persons with inadequate assets and income to be homeowners. These home buyers began to default in ever larger numbers as the economy contracted and unemployment rose. Eventually the foreclosure tsunami spread to many better qualified borrowers who also found themselves overextended as housing prices fell, the stock market swooned, and their personal financial worth shrunk. Increasing numbers of owners found their mortgages greater than the value of their homes.

The housing crises spread to the entire financial system, through the ever-increasing number of loans in default or near default that were packaged in opaque securities sold to investors who had little ability to know what was toxic in their holdings and what was not. That in turn led to a lack of confidence in which banks were unwilling to lend even to other banks for fear that the loans were at risk. Eventually, this lack of confidence led to a widespread credit crunch, where even borrowers with good credit ratings were unable to secure loans at reasonable prices.

By September 2008 the federal government had seized control of the two huge housing agencies—Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae—that owned or guaranteed about $5 trillion worth of the $12 trillion in mortgages issued on U.S. houses. More bad economic news followed as the venerable Wall Street investment bank Lehman Brothers filed for bankruptcy and the Federal Reserve injected $85 billion into the insurance giant American International Group (AIG) in exchange for almost 80 percent of its stock, essentially nationalizing the company. Other Wall Street firms disappeared in their traditional form as they converted to regular banking status, subjecting themselves to federal oversight.

During this period the government, particularly the Federal Reserve, pumped billions of dollars into the economy and cut interest rates to historically low levels. Meanwhile the stock market continued a wild ride up and down, but mainly down. By the end of the year investors had lost about $7 trillion in value, according to one calculation. Others said the worldwide losses of all types probably went to at least $25 trillion.

Congress was drawn deeply into the crises in September, but earlier in 2008 it had passed two other pieces of legislation as economic conditions deteriorated. In February it cleared a $151.7 billion economic stimulus bill that focused on tax rebates for families and individuals. In July Congress approved a bill that started out to provide foreclosure relief to homeowners. But at the urging of Bush Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., legislators added an open-ended authority to the department to shore up Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Then on September 18, Paulson, with Federal Reserve chairman Ben S. Bernanke, went to congressional leaders with a plea for a $700 billion program to acquire presumably worthless mortgage-based assets from financial companies and buy stock in threatened institutions to contain a serious rupture from increasing foreclosure and plummeting house prices. Congress approved the program, called the Troubled Asset Relief Program (TARP), with unusual speed, but only after the House at first rejected it, sending the stock market plunging, amid unexpected constituent anger over bailing out huge financial firms. Paulson later began using some of the money to capitalize banks rather than just buy up toxic assets. The banks, however, proved reluctant through the remainder of the year to accelerated lending. With unknown amounts of toxic assets still in the hands of thousands of investors, the credit crunch worsened.

Later in the year Congress balked at approving a multibillion assistance package for the nation's three main auto manufacturers, General Motors (GM), Ford, and Chrysler. GM and Chrysler were on the verge of bankruptcy by the end of the year from plummeting car sales caused by the recession and drastically reduced availability of credit for consumer to purchase cars. Car sales had already declined as gas prices neared $5.00 a gallon in some locations. Ford was slightly better off but it too faced bankruptcy if GM went down, taking with it dozens of suppliers from which Ford also bought parts.

The assistance, $25 billion, was blocked in the Senate by Republicans. With the threat of a massive economic collapse in manufacturing, and tens of potential thousands of job losses, the Bush White House pledged $17.4 billion to the auto firms from the TARP program but with requirements that each company by February come up with detailed plans to turn around their business. Included was a demand that union wages be reduced to the level paid by nonunion foreign manufacturers with U.S. plants, although the difference in hourly rates was not large for active employees. The American companies, however, were burdened by substantial costs—legacy costs, as they were known, to many thousands of retirees in medical care and retirement benefits.

The 2008 Campaigns

When the 2008 votes were tallied, America had elected Barack Obama, an Illinois senator, as the first African American president, an outcome that most observers thought inconceivable a quarter century earlier. Although Obama's election made 2008 "one for the books," in the words of many political commentators, by the time the primaries and caucuses ended and candidates were anointed at the conventions, the "firsts" of the 2008 cycle had become an impressive list.

- Most remarkable of all was Obama's capturing the nomination of a major political party.
- For the first time ever, both candidates had been born outside the continental United States, Obama in Hawaii on August 4, 1961, to a white woman from Kansas and a black man from Kenya, and his opponent, Sen. John McCain, an Arizona Republican, at a U.S. naval base in Panama's U.S. Canal Zone on August 29, 1936.

- Two sitting members of the Senate were the major party candidates, the first time this had ever occurred. It also was the first time since 1960 that a sitting senator was elected. That year Sen. John F. Kennedy, D-Mass., defeated incumbent vice president Richard M. Nixon, who also was a former senator.
- For only the second time in U.S. history a woman was selected to run on a major party ticket as the vice-presidential candidate. McCain selected then-Alaska governor Sarah Palin as his running mate. In 1984 Geraldine A. Ferraro had been the Democratic vice-presidential candidate, but she was on the losing ticket headed by former senator and Vice President Walter Mondale.
- The 2008 race was the first since 1928 that no incumbent president or vice president sought the nomination, and was the first since 1952 that neither the incumbent president nor vice president was running on the final ticket.
- The Democratic contest featured an African American male and a woman as the two most prominent candidates, a match-up that virtually no one could have imagined in previous national elections.
- The initial Democratic front-runner was a woman, the first time in American history that a woman ran a competitive race for the nomination.
- The election cost vastly more than any previous contest.
- The use of the Internet, cell phones, and other electronic devices entered the mainstream for the first time, helping candidates to raise funds and mobilize and energize grassroots supporters.
- Obama's ability to raise vast sums allowed him to reject public financing for the primary and general election campaigns, the first time this had occurred since the system was created in 1976. Although his opponent, Sen. John McCain, accepted public funding for his general election campaign, Obama's success at raising private funds lend campaign finance experts to speculate that the public financing system may have been dealt a fatal blow.

Obama and McCain were not the early favorites of journalists and others who handicap the political races. The early-on favorite for the Democratic nod was Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former first lady during Bill Clinton's presidency, and a New York senator after leaving the White House. She had long been expected to run and formally announced on January 20, 2007. Obama, who had received an unexpected boost from Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., announced on February 10, 2007. McCain announced his candidacy on April 25, 2007.

Both parties fielded a lengthy list of candidates. On the Democratic side, John Edwards, a former senator from North Carolina and the 2004 vice-presidential candidate, was widely admired and thought to have a meaningful chance in the race. Bill Richardson, the governor of New Mexico, was an early candidate along with several other figures less well known on the national scene, including Sen. Joe Biden of Delaware who eventually was picked by Obama as his running mate.

But the Democratic contest quickly settled into one between Obama and Clinton, with the latter continuing to be seen as the hands-on favorite to win. Obama, however, laid out a systematic nationwide campaign to contest not only the smaller states with primaries but also most of the caucus states; the Clinton campaign did not follow this strategy, relying more on the big-state primaries. In addition, the Clinton campaign struggled with disorganization and internal rivalries that hurt its focus.

Unexpectedly, the Democratic campaign continued from the earliest voting in caucuses and primaries in January 2008 until the final contests on June 3. Most observers believed the decision would be so clear by March that the primaries scheduled after that would be of little significance. As it turned out, Obama all but won the nomination in the February primaries, starting with Super Tuesday, February 5, and continuing through the rest of the month. On February 5, he won seven primaries and Clinton won eight. But the rest of the month he won six and Clinton won none. In these six wins, he garnered almost 60 percent of the aggregate vote.

Both candidates aggressively contested the primaries that came after, starting on March 4, known as Critical Tuesday. But as this period emerged, it became clear that Clinton—absent a major collapse of the Obama campaign—could never assemble enough delegates to top Obama.

Depending on the method of counting the actual votes cast in the primaries, Clinton won a narrow majority, with a little more than 17,700,000 to Obama's 17,400,000. (Edwards, who had closed his campaign on January 30, won just a little more than one million votes.) The Clinton numbers, however, were skewed by events in Michigan and Florida in January. Both states, in violation of party rules moved their primaries into that month, several weeks before the party allowed voting except for a few states, such as New Hampshire, that had historically held voting earlier. The party initially said those states delegates would not be seated at the convention, although it later changed its mind. Obama's name did not appear on the primary ballot in Michigan, while Clinton's did. Neither candidate campaigned in those states. But without the vote that Clinton won in Michigan, Obama would have had the lead in the nationwide Democratic primary total.

On the Republican side, McCain—to the surprise of many handicappers—started strongly, winning the New Hampshire primary On January 18 by nearly six percentage points over his most formidable competitor, Mitt Romney, the former governor of neighboring Massachusetts.

Romney won his boyhood state, Michigan, on January 15 and was competitive in Florida on January 29. But after that, Romney began to fade as McCain piled up more wins with strong margins. On February 5, Super Tuesday, McCain won nine primaries to Romney's two. Romney quite the race on February 7.

McCain had other challengers who stayed in the race longer, including Mike Huckabee, the governor of Arkansas, Rudolph Giuliani, the former New York mayor, and Fred Thompson, a former senator from Tennessee. Huckabee formally continued until March 3, and his name and others appeared on ballots after that. But only the quixotic campaign of Ron Paul, a conservative representative from Texas who ran as the Libertarian candidate for president in 1988, continued on to be the last to drop out. In the end, he amassed more than 1,600,000 votes, the fourth highest in the GOP primaries, although still only 5.6 percent of all votes cast.

Once Obama and McCain had secured their nominations, the fall campaign was a relatively standard election contest, although punctuated by several memorable events. Obama led comfortably in the polls through much of the period, gaining strength as the campaign wore on and the national and world economy continued its plunge into deeper recession. Economic conditions became the defining issue, significantly overshadowing the Iraq war, which earlier was expected to be the defining controversy for voters.

McCain, on September 24, in an unexpected move that surprised even GOP stalwarts, announced he was suspending his campaign to return to Washington to participate in congressional negotiations on the economic crisis. He also called for a postponement of the televised debate with Obama that was scheduled later in the week in Mississippi. His move was praised by supporters as statesmanlike but derided by opponents as a political ploy. Both candidates returned to Washington that week but their presence made little difference in thrashing out legislation. Obama insisted that the Mississippi debate go on as scheduled, which McCain ultimately agreed to. The debate was one of three held by the presidential candidates; one debate was held between the vice presidential nominees. All of them, the presidential ones in particular, were seen as useful and often informative, but none appeared to change many voter minds. Neither Obama nor McCain made serious mistakes or gaffs during the sessions.

Obama's ability to draw large and enthusiastic crowds continued throughout the campaign as he went both to strong Democratic states and into areas normally considered Republican territory. Analysts noted he was continuing his fifty-state strategy of the primary campaign by spending much time in such states as Virginia, North Carolina, and Florida that had been beyond the reach of Democrats in previous presidential elections. McCain, by contrast, while drawing respectable crowds, did not approach the extent of Obama's campaign.

An unexpected wrinkle in the campaign, and a notable distraction for McCain, was his running mate, Alaska governor Sarah Palin. Little was known of her, or her credentials to be on a national ticket, before she was plucked out of relative obscurity by seventy-two-year-old McCain. Once on the ticket, however, she was subject to withering examination by both journalists and by others—many of them Democratic partisans—who questioned whether she had had sufficient exposure to national and international issues to become president, should that need arise. Her campaign, and by extension McCain's, was hurt by several fumbling interviews she agreed to on national television conducted by network anchors. Nevertheless, Palin's presence as the running mate, as expected, drew enthusiastic approval from the Republican base of conservatives, especially Christian conservatives, which had been suspicious of McCain from the start.

The cost of national elections continued its inexorable rise in 2008, reaching into the trillions of dollars. Expenditures under the direct control of candidates' campaigns for president and Congress in primary and general elections that year totaled more than $3.1 trillion dollars. For president alone it was almost $1.7 trillion. In addition, spending by parties and outside groups, which are difficult to track accurately, added many millions to the sum. (See Table 3-2, p. 80.)

Results of the 2008 Elections

It was a Democratic year, giving the party a platform to potentially rewrite the political alignment in the nation for years into the future, depending on how well the new president and the dominant Democratic Congress handled the economic, security, environmental, and other issues facing the nation and the world.

With a masterful nationwide plan and the support of an army of enthusiastic supporters not seen in decades, Obama won the presidency and helped his party increase the congressional majorities. He captured nearly 53 percent of the popular vote and 365 electoral votes to 173 for his opponent McCain. Although not of the magnitude of a landslide, Obama's victory was legitimately seen as a mandate for a different approach to national and international issues than had prevailed under his predecessor.

Throughout the latter decades of the twentieth century and into the early years of the next, Republicans had typically won the presidency and Democrats controlled Congress. Except for Jimmy Carter from 1977 to 1981 and Bill Clinton from 1993 to 2001, Republicans held the White House from 1969 to 2009. Democrats had less success in Congress, losing it to the GOP in 1994 and not regaining it until 2007, except for a brief period in the Senate between 2001 and 2003. The national distribution of party allegiances was based on Democratic strength on the coasts and in most Midwest and New England areas with the GOP controlling an “L” shaped area from the Rockies to the Southwest and across the South. The 2008 elections suggested a weakening of this pattern that portended Democratic strengths in the future.

Although fundamental features of this partisan division continued, Obama’s success increased the likelihood of more competitive states in future elections. Obama won the popular vote by a margin of 7 percentage points, less than a half dozen other presidents, but still a clear-cut victory. He won by 9.5 million votes, the widest of any nonincumbent presidential candidate in history. This was possible because Democrats dominated the coastal states outside the “L,” allowing Obama to seriously contest states that the party previously conceded to the GOP. With this effort, Obama won all the nineteen states that John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic candidate, had won plus nine others that had supported Bush including Florida, North Carolina, and Virginia (all historically GOP southern states), Indiana, Iowa, and Ohio (in the Midwest), and Colorado, Nevada, and New Mexico (in the West). Essentially, the Obama effort flipped the earlier “L” pattern that allowed Bush, secure in that area, to contest Democratic states.

The Democratic victory brought into Congress an enlarged majority (a gain of eight Senate seats and a net gain of twenty-one House seats) that probably was well attuned to the national Democratic Party. In the Northeast, a single-remaining Republican was defeated. The Democrats’ southern wing was a shadow of its former self. By 2008 southern Democrats were greatly reduced in numbers, removing from the political picture an array of politicians, many in powerful congressional positions, who joined Republicans in a “conservative coalition” against Democratic proposals. By 2008 that coalition was extinct. Southern Democrats still in office in 2008 were only 12 percent of the party’s Senate membership and under a quarter in the House. When Bill Clinton won his first term as president in 1992, more than a quarter of all Senate Democrat’s and nearly a third of House Democrats hailed from the South. This diminution of the southern influence presented the prospect of a more united party behind the new president.

Political Party Development

POLITICAL PARTIES are organizations that seek to gain control of government to further their members' social, economic, ideological, or personal goals. The United States has usually had a two-party system, dominated since 1860 by the Democratic and Republican parties. Yet hundreds of political parties have formed since the 1790s, and "third parties" have occasionally had a strong impact on presidential elections.

The United States did not start out with a two-party system—or any parties at all. This central aspect of American politics was unplanned and had no formal constitutional or legal status. Indeed, having seen the ill effects of overzealous parties in monarchical England and in premodern times, the Framers hoped to avoid similar problems with what they called factions. Thus, in Federalist No. 10 James Madison bragged that one of the Constitution's great virtues was that it would control "the mischiefs of faction." In 1789 Thomas Jefferson declared: "If I could not go to heaven but with a party, I would not go there at all." Similarly, in his farewell address in 1796 George Washington warned that, in elective popular governments, the dangers of excess in the "spirit of party" demanded "a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame."

By the time Washington issued his warning, however, he was the perceived head of the Federalist Party, which faded after 1800 and, except for some local officeholders, was dead by 1821. Meanwhile, since 1794 Madison and Jefferson had been the leaders of another party, variously called the Democratic-Republicans, the Jeffersonian Democrats, and the Jeffersonian Republicans, but today understood as the kernel of the world's first mass-based political party, the modern Democratic Party.

POLITICAL ISSUES AND THE EMERGENCE OF PARTIES

The debate over ratification of the Constitution led to the organization of factions but not parties. Future Democratic-Republicans and Federalists, such as Madison and Alexander Hamilton, worked together for ratification, just as future Democratic-Republicans and Federalists, such as James Monroe and Eldridge Gerry, worked against it.

Ratification brought about a new national government: presidential electors unanimously elected Washington as the first president, and nearly half of them supported John Adams, who was easily elected vice president. Washington's cabinet included future leaders of the nation's first two parties: the future Federalist leader Hamilton and the future leader of the Democratic-Republicans, Jefferson.

By the end of Washington's administration, the two parties had emerged in full battle gear. The parties differed over the nature of public policy and the interpretation of the Constitution. The Federalists, led by Hamilton, Adams, and John Jay, favored a national government vigorously involved in economic development. Key to the Federalist program was the establishment of a national bank, federal funding at face value of all state and national bonds issued during the Revolution, and a flexible interpretation of the Constitution. The Federalists also wanted to strengthen diplomatic and commercial ties with England.

Jefferson's followers, called Democratic-Republicans at this time, opposed funding the war debts at par because many of the original bond holders had sold their bonds at depreciated values to speculators. Their hostility to commerce and business also led them to oppose the establishment of a national bank. Unsuccessful on these issues, the Democratic-Republicans were nonetheless able to thwart Hamilton's plan to use high tariffs to stimulate commerce and manufacturing in the new country. Jefferson and his followers wanted a strict interpretation of the Constitution, favored states' rights over national power, and in foreign policy supported France in its wars with England.

Presidents, Parties, and Policies, 1800–1860

By the time of Jefferson's election in 1800, ending the period of Federalist control, the party concept was entrenched in U.S. politics. Despite his previous denunciation of parties, Jefferson justified his party leadership as a necessary opposition to the "Monocrats of our country." Jefferson's election by the House, after a tied electoral vote between him and

PARTY SYSTEMS

Historians and political scientists often use the concept of “party systems” to refer to eras that seem to hang together in terms of major party alignment. Although some scholars dispute the concept, many divide U.S. electoral history into six periods of party development, with each period covering about thirty to thirty-five years. Each era typically begins with one or more “critical elections” that transform the parties’ voter bases. The first period, from 1789 to approximately 1824, marked the emergence of a two-party system. It lasted from George Washington’s presidency through the end of the “Virginia Dynasty,” including the two terms of Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, and James Monroe, all from Virginia. During this period, suffrage was gradually extended to most white men. Party organizations were not very developed and emerged only during presidential elections.

The second party system, from 1828 until the late 1850s, marked the years from Andrew Jackson’s first election through the demise of the Whig Party. This period of close national party competition saw the development of continuing party organizations, exemplified by the creation of party nominating conventions and the adoption of formal party platforms.

The third era, beginning with Abraham Lincoln’s election in 1860, continued until the twilight of the nineteenth century. The Republican Party won all but two presidential elections in this period—Democrat Grover Cleveland won two nonconsecutive terms. Still, the races were closely contested, including victory by a single disputed electoral vote in 1876 and thin popular margins in battleground states such as Ohio and New York in later elections.

The 1896 election, won convincingly by William McKinley, marked a transition to a fourth period of clear Republican dominance, built on Republican control in the Northeast and Midwest. At the same time, the South became solidly Democratic. Progressives also represented an important movement during this era, which persisted through World War I and the 1920s. Running for a third term as a Progressive in 1912, Theodore Roosevelt ran far ahead of incumbent Republican President William Howard Taft.

The election of Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932 marked another great electoral realignment. Roosevelt was swept into the office on the coming-of-age of previous waves of immigrants and the economic dislocations of the Great Depression. Through Lyndon B. Johnson’s landslide election in 1964, the Democrats won seven of nine presidential elections—the other two went to Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower—and held control of Congress in all but four years.

Although different from previous eras, a sixth party system appeared to develop from 1968 to 2004, one less stable than previous periods. Republicans, most notably Ronald Reagan, won most presidential elections, but Democrats held control of Congress until 1995. Massive voter realignments saw historic shifts to a Republican South and a Democratic Northeast and Pacific Coast. Independent candidates had some impact during this time, but by 2004 voters were firmly attached, in almost equal proportions, to the two major parties, with the Republicans holding majorities in the Senate and House. The national parties were now fully developed as fund-raisers and campaigners and had built centralized, efficient and technologically advanced organizations.

The election of Barack Obama opened the prospect of a new party alignment, dominated by the Democratic Party. Aided by the severe economic conditions and the historic unpopularity of President George W. Bush, Obama extended the party’s sway to parts of the South, Midwest, and Mountain states, and drew large support from African Americans, Latinos, and young voters. Democrats also increased the congressional majorities they had won in the previous midterm election and drew ahead in voters’ partisan identifications. Future party alignments would depend on the record of the new Obama administration.

Aaron Burr, led to adoption of the Twelfth Amendment to the Constitution in 1804. That amendment, which required electors to vote separately for president and vice president, further buried the likelihood of “partyless” U.S. elections.

Despite his philosophical support for limited government, Jefferson in practice expanded the national government’s reach. He used presidential power without constitutional warrant to purchase the Louisiana Territory from France, doubling the size of the nation, and imposed an embargo on commerce during the Napoleonic wars. He became a vigorous party leader as well, using the disciplinary clout of the party caucus in Congress and encouraging the development of a favorable partisan press. Presidential nominations came to be centralized in the congressional caucus, aiding a string of election victories by Jefferson’s party that lasted through the first two decades of the nineteenth century.

Federalists nearly won the presidency back in 1800 and 1812, but the party quickly withered after the War of 1812, when many party leaders opposed the war and flirted with secession, most notably at the Hartford Convention of 1814–1815. The party was effectively dead by the end of 1820, when Democratic-Republican Monroe ran unopposed for reelection.

A system with only one party was less stable than a system with two or more parties. In 1824 four Democratic-Republican candidates competed for the presidency, with none getting a majority of the popular or the electoral vote. The House of Representatives chose John Quincy Adams, who ran second in both categories. Andrew Jackson, who had led in popular and electoral votes, immediately began his successful campaign for the next presidential election in 1828. In 1832 the Anti-Masonic Party made its brief appearance, winning seven electoral votes, while Jackson was easily reelected. Jackson inherited the mantle of Jefferson and his party, while his political and personal opponents, such as Daniel Webster, Henry Clay, and John Quincy Adams, migrated in the 1830s to the newly formed Whig Party. In 1836 four Whigs, representing different regions of the country, competed for the presidency unsuccessfully against Jackson's heir, Martin Van Buren.

The Whigs won the presidency in 1840 and 1848; the Jacksonian Democrats won in 1836, 1844, 1852, and 1856. The Whigs favored a national bank, federal support for economic development such as canals and railroads, national bankruptcy laws, protective tariffs, and a relatively humane policy toward Native Americans. The Democrats disagreed with all these positions. Whigs opposed territorial acquisition, especially by force. Democrats, proclaiming that it was the "manifest destiny" of the United States to control the continent, annexed Texas, eventually pushed the United States into a war with Mexico to gain new territory in the Southwest, and peacefully incorporated the northwestern Oregon territories into the Union.

The Democrats pushed for universal adult white male suffrage throughout the country, but at the same time worked to take the vote away from free blacks and to strengthen slavery at the national and local level. Jackson's presidency is most remembered for his veto of the rechartering of the Second Bank of the United States, his successful opposition to internal improvements, and his policy of Indian removal, which pushed almost all Native Americans in the east into the Indian Territory (present-day Oklahoma). On an important issue that seemed to transcend party politics, Jackson vigorously opposed extreme states' rights ideology when South Carolina attempted to nullify a federal tariff. However, following the nullification crisis, the Democrats became increasingly solicitous of states' rights and southern demands for protections for slavery.

The nation had close competition between two major parties in the 1840s, but third parties influenced some elections. The Whigs won their first presidential election in 1840, portraying Gen. William Henry Harrison as the embodiment of populist values. Democrats returned to power four years later with the victory of a "dark horse," James K. Polk, over the Whig leader, Clay. In 1848, however, the Free Soil candidate, former president Van Buren, won more than 290,000 votes, many of which would have otherwise gone to the Democratic candidate. As a result, the Whig candidate, Gen. Zachary Taylor, won the election. Yet the victorious Whigs of 1848 managed to carry only four states in 1852, and the party disappeared two years later. The 1856 election saw two new parties emerge: the Know Nothing (American) Party—a single-issue party opposed to immigration—and the Republican Party.

The Republicans adopted many Whig policies while centering their program on opposition to the extension of slavery into the western territories. Many Republican leaders were former Whigs, including Abraham Lincoln and his future secretary of state, William H. Seward. Others came from the antislavery wing of the Democratic Party, among them Lincoln's first vice president, Hannibal Hamlin, and his future secretary of the Treasury, Salmon P. Chase. In 1856 the Republican candidate, John C. Fremont, and the Know Nothing candidate, former president Millard Fillmore, together won about 400,000 more popular votes than Democrat James Buchanan, but Buchanan had the plurality of popular votes and, more important, carried nineteen states to win the election. Buchanan was the first "sectional" president since 1824, as fourteen of the states he carried were in the South. This election underscored that the Democrats had become the party of slavery and the South.

The proslavery southerners who controlled the Democratic Party insisted on fidelity to their program to expand slavery into the territories. This arrangement unraveled in 1860, as the Democrats split into two parties—regular Democrats nominating Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois and southern Democrats nominating John C. Breckinridge of Kentucky. Moderates in the North and the South supported the Constitutional Union Party, which hoped to hold the Union together by not discussing any of the key issues. The two Democratic parties and the Constitutional Unionists together received more popular votes than the Republican candidate, Lincoln (who was not even on the ballot in many southern states), who won less than 40 percent of the popular vote. But Lincoln carried every northern state, and eighteen states overall, easily winning a majority of the electoral college.

Parties in U.S. Politics Since 1860

Lincoln's election and the Union victory in the Civil War set the stage for a period of intense party competition for the rest of the nineteenth century. Republicans won most presidential victories, including the disputed election of 1876, but the margins of victory were narrow after Reconstruction ended in the South, and Democrats frequently held majorities in the House of Representatives.

During this period the Republican programs included vigorous military action to preserve the Union, constitutional amendments to abolish slavery and guarantee the civil rights of African Americans, homestead laws to facilitate western settlement, federal support for a transcontinental railroad, protective tariffs, and the suppression of Mormon polygamists in the West. Democrats favored lower tariffs; opposed emancipation and civil rights; and championed white immigrants (but not immigrants from Asia), labor unions, and (at the end of the century) small farmers in the South and West. In international affairs, the late-nineteenth-century Republicans favored expansion, ultimately leading to war with Spain and the acquisition of an overseas empire, while Democrats opposed these trends, with Grover Cleveland (the only Democratic president in this period) refusing to annex Hawaii. From 1868 to 1908 various third parties ran candidates. With the exception of the Populists in 1892, however, none ever won any electoral votes.

Republicans became the dominant national party in the election of 1896, winning a decisive victory for William McKinley, and continuing to hold the White House for all but eight years of the next generation. The Republican dominance was based on a sectional coalition of the northern states, combining support from business owners, industrial workers, smaller communities, Civil War veterans, and the few African Americans allowed to vote. Democrats absorbed the Populist program of relief to farmers through the free coinage of silver, but the party found its support largely confined to the South, the sparsely populated areas of the Rocky Mountain states, and the immigrant communities of large cities.

The Democrats won their only two presidential elections in this period with New Jersey governor Woodrow Wilson as their candidate. In 1912 a third party determined the outcome of the presidential race. The Republicans split as former president Theodore Roosevelt tried, and failed, to gain renomination after a term out of the White House. Roosevelt thought that his successor, William Howard Taft, had abandoned the progressive goals of the party. Running on the Progressive (“Bull Moose”) ticket, Roosevelt carried six states and won about half a million more popular votes than Taft. Together they outpolled Wilson, but Wilson carried forty states and won the election. Various third parties ran presidential candidates in the 1920s and 1930s, but only Robert M. La Follette, running as the Progressive Party presidential candidate in 1924, won any electoral votes.

Party fortunes changed with the Great Depression of the 1930s, making the Democrats the majority party. New York governor Franklin D. Roosevelt won an overwhelming victory in 1932, and his New Deal policies created a new majority coalition of immigrant descendants, big city voters, labor union members, racial minorities, and white southern party loyalists. Beginning with Roosevelt’s four terms, this coalition would win all but two presidential elections, and congressional majorities in most years, for the next thirty-six years, interrupted only by the two-term Republican administration of Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Between the 1910s and the 1940s, Democrats became increasingly internationalist, while Republicans opposed U.S. entrance into the League of Nations after World War I and were isolationist in the 1930s as the world moved toward a second world war. By the 1930s blacks began to leave the Republican Party, forced out by “lily white” Republicans in the South and welcomed into the emerging New Deal coalition. The Republicans by this time had become the party of conservative business interests, white Protestants (outside the South), small town and rural northerners, and owners of small businesses.

In 1948 southern “Dixiecrats,” who abandoned the Democratic Party to protest President Harry S. Truman’s support for civil rights and racial equality, took four Deep South states. Some other Democrats supported former vice president Henry A. Wallace, running on the Progressive ticket that year. Despite these defections, Truman won.

By the 1960s Republicans and Democrats had swapped their historic approaches to the issue of African American civil rights. In 1964 large numbers of white southerners left the Democratic Party over President Lyndon B. Johnson’s support for civil rights. Although Johnson that year won the most overwhelming victory since FDR, he lost five southern states to Republican Sen. Barry Goldwater. These results presaged a total reversal of past voting patterns: the “Solid South” eventually became the base of a conservative Republican coalition, while the Democrats gained predominance in the Northeast and the Pacific coast.

Since the 1960s the Democratic constituency has generally included urban, northern, and western liberals; a diminishing plurality of Catholics and a predominance of Jews; African Americans, Hispanics, Asian Americans, and ethnic minorities; blue-collar workers; and the underprivileged, with increasing support from professionals, women and those with postcollege education. Republicans are more popular with conservatives, southerners, white Protestants, men, small-town residents, and the affluent in business.

Changing party alignments began to appear in 1968. For the next generation, continuing to the 2004 election, Republicans won the White House most frequently—seven of ten times. But the period also evidenced considerable shifting of voter preferences and close contests.

Republicans returned to power in 1968 under former vice president Richard Nixon, but with only a slim plurality of the popular vote. George C. Wallace, running in 1968 as the presidential candidate of the segregationist American Independent Party, captured five states in the South. Most of his supporters voted Republican in subsequent elections. In the aftermath of the Watergate scandal, Democrat Jimmy Carter won one term in 1976, followed by Republicans Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush.

Strong minor parties developed in this period. In 1980 Rep. John B. Anderson ran on the National Unity Party ticket and carried more than 5 million popular votes, but he did not affect the outcome of the election won by Reagan. In 1992 H. Ross Perot ran as an independent and won almost 20 million votes. Perot highlighted the importance of the national debt and perhaps nudged a change in policy toward balanced budgets. When he ran again in 1996 on the Reform Party ticket, he only received less than half of his previous support. Although Perot never won any electoral votes, his presence in the two races meant that Democrat Bill Clinton won the presidency twice without gaining a majority of the total popular vote.

The lack of a popular mandate became more serious in 2000, when Texas governor George W. Bush trailed Democratic vice president Albert “Al” Gore Jr. by half a million votes. Bush still gained a slim electoral majority of 271–267, but only after a month of contentious court disputes and a controversial decision of the U.S. Supreme Court. Amid the anxieties of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the country and the U.S. war in Iraq, Bush then won reelection in 2004, defeating Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts. Bush’s plurality of 3 million gave him 51 percent of the popular vote to Kerry’s 48 percent. Partisanship rose, both in the halls of Congress and in the mass electorate, making politics more bitter and complicating compromise on policy issues.

The election of 2008 portended major changes in party fortunes, as Democratic senator Barack Obama of Illinois won decisively, with a plurality of 9 million popular votes and a strong electoral majority of 365–173 over Republican senator John McCain of Arizona. Obama’s victory was a historic breakthrough as he became the first African American president and was only the fourth Democratic candidate in history to achieve a winning margin of at least 53 percent of the popular vote. New Democratic strength in the South, Midwest, and Mountain states, and large support among African Americans, Latinos, and young voters raised the possibility of long-term realignment.

INTERNAL PARTY POLITICS

American political parties have mirrored the development of the larger society. They have broadened from small coterries of elite leaders to mass organizations, and from factions conducting limited campaigns to elaborate, well-financed, vote-seeking organizations.

Presidential Nominations

Nominating methods reflect this evolution. Presidential nominations were originally made in secret meetings of party legislators in Congress, which came to be derided as “King Caucus.” But these meetings were too confined and did not represent the breadth of the emerging parties. The 1824 election of John Quincy Adams, nominated by the Massachusetts Legislature, showed that the caucus had lost its sway. The House of Representatives decided the election when none of the four candidates, all Democratic-Republicans, failed to win the required electoral vote majority. In the 1828 election, the opposing candidates, Adams and Andrew Jackson, were nominated by state legislatures, a brief transition to the convention system.

The first national nominating convention was held by the Anti-Masonic Party in 1831, and was soon imitated in 1832 by Jackson’s Democratic Party. Although the opposition Whigs did not follow suit immediately, the conventions were fully established as the party nominating method by 1840, a year that also saw the adoption of the first party platforms. Each party soon created a national committee to coordinate campaign efforts—the Democrats in 1848, the Republicans at their first national convention in 1856.

For the rest of the nineteenth century and the first half of the twentieth century, the conventions stood as the parties’ ultimate authority. Nominations were made through alliances of the state parties represented there, often involving a long series of ballots, negotiations among party leaders or “bosses” in fabled “smoke-filled rooms,” and the emergence of dark horses in the late stages of the party conclaves. The results of the negotiations ranged widely in quality. The nation benefited when Abraham Lincoln won nomination after three ballots by the Republicans in 1860 and Franklin D. Roosevelt after four Democratic ballots in 1932. However the conventions also chose Republican Warren G. Harding after ten ballots in 1920 and Democrat John Davis after a record-setting 103 ballots in 1924.

The presidential nominating process began to change with the initiation of state primary elections in the first decade of the twentieth century. National nominating conventions have remained a staple of the political party system, but in the age of primaries and television they have become more show than substance. With the presumptive nominee known well in advance, the convention nomination is a ritualistic formality, although the convention still has the important duty of writing a party platform and establishing rules for party government. Vice-presidents, once selected after convention negotiations to promote party unity, are now in fact selected by the presidential candidate even before the conventions meet.

The Democratic convention of 1952, which chose Adlai Stevenson to oppose Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower, was the most recent to require more than one ballot to select a nominee. Multiple ballots were common earlier, particularly at Democratic conventions because of the party’s rule requiring a two-thirds majority for nomination. Democrats dropped the rule, never used by Republicans, in 1936.

The primary system was a creation of the Progressive era of the early twentieth century. After Progressive governor Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin pushed through a state primary law in 1905, other states followed, but the primaries did not become widespread until 1972. Primary elections and state caucuses became the de facto presidential nominating mechanisms after the tumultuous 1968 Democratic convention, won by Hubert H. Humphrey without entering any primaries.

As the Democrats strengthened their primary rules in the 1970s and 1980s, primaries proliferated in both parties, and they came earlier and earlier in the election year. By 2000 the two parties held a record forty-four primaries—including ones in the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico—with most of them occurring before April. In 2004

WHY TWO PARTIES?

The two-party system in the United States is unique. Every other democratic country has at least three significant parties, and often considerably more. In Great Britain, for example, the vote is divided among the New Labour, Conservative, and Liberal Democratic parties. While U.S. history has included important third parties, they have generally (except for the modern Republican party) had short lives.

Analysts offer various explanations for the persistence of the U.S. two-party system. Some attribute it to the lack of social conflicts that have fueled politics in other nations, particularly in Europe. For example, being committed to a republican form of government from the beginning, monarchist factions have not survived within the U.S. constitutional system. The separation of church and state has removed another potential conflict, between secular and religious parties. Moreover, no strong socialist movement has developed in America; the nation, including its labor unions, has accepted capitalism as the basic economic structure. In the absence of these cleavages, the ideological range of American parties has been relatively narrow, and electoral competition could be expressed by only two parties.

A related explanation emphasizes the open and nondiscriminatory character of American parties. When protest movements and third parties have arisen, the major parties have acted quickly to appeal to these sentiments, as the Democrats in 1896 responded to the Populists of 1892, and the Republicans absorbed much of the movement of George Wallace after 1968. Because of the loose structure of the major parties, and the near-universal use of primary elections to choose candidates, dissidents have found it simpler to seek power within a major party than to maintain an independent organization.

the Republicans dropped many primaries as unnecessary for Bush's uncontested renomination, but primaries remained decisive in the Democratic race won by Sen. John F. Kerry.

Primaries took on new forms in the unique election of 2008. Republicans concluded their nominating contest early, when McCain won decisive victories over a diverse set of challengers in New Hampshire and Florida. Democrats engaged in a six-month contest that eventually took on the quality of a national primary, since voters in every state (and territory) had the opportunity to participate before the nomination was foreclosed. Eventually, after 37 million cast ballots, Sen. Obama won a narrow victory over Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York.

Party Organization

For much of their history, American parties have had little formal national organization, constituting little more than alliances of state parties, briefly uniting every four years to wage the presidential campaign. Because elections and parties are regulated primarily through state legislation, the national parties had no inherent connection to the electoral process, and their national committees could be accurately described as locales of "politics without power."

The U.S. electoral system provides a further institutional incentive. The two major parties are given automatic access to the ballot, while other groups must prove their eligibility, for example by gathering a large number of petition signatures. Moreover, since 1972 Republicans and Democrats have received federal funds for their presidential nominating conventions and election campaigns; other parties receive funds only after the election, and only if they gain at least 5 percent of the national vote.

The presidency is probably the single most important foundation of the American adherence to a two-party system. It is a single office—unlike a parliamentary cabinet—which cannot be shared among many factions and requires a majority vote in the electoral college to win the White House. Both features of the presidential election system encourage politicians to consolidate their efforts into only two alliances, one supporting and one opposing the administration in power. Factional splits, conversely, are discouraged because they will aid the opposition party.

U.S. history provides many examples of these consolidating effects of the presidency. As regional conflicts grew before the Civil War, the Whigs split and was quickly absorbed into the southern Democratic and northern Republican parties. Division among the Republicans elected Democrat Woodrow Wilson in 1912, and the absorption of the American Independent Party by the Republicans contributed to a GOP landslide in 1972. The Reform Party, though winning a fifth of the vote in 1992, soon disappeared, reaffirming the national tradition of two-party competition.

Although the Democrats took a small step toward national party building with creation of a press office in 1928, the parties' structures remained highly decentralized as late as 1972, when each national committee had only thirty employees. Then the parties modernized, reflecting the nationalization of politics, the emergence of new voting groups, the dominant importance of television and other mass media in campaigning, and the recommendations of a series of party reform commissions.

The new significance of national party organizations is evidenced in many ways. The Republicans opened a national headquarters on Capitol Hill in 1970, the Democrats in 1984. Each committee now has a paid permanent staff of about 300 persons, sophisticated media studios, and extensive research, fund-raising, and organizational activities.

The national parties now regulate the composition of state party delegations to the national conventions, requiring gender equality and, among the Democrats, representation of ethnic minorities. The national and state parties collaborate in fund-raising and in campaign spending, and the national parties provide organization and training assistance to state and local party groups.

The nationalization of the American economy and political process has gone hand-in-hand with a change in the basis of party loyalties. These loyalties are now based primarily on policy preferences in regard to the issues of government's role in the economy, foreign policy, race, and lifestyle or morality. Past attachments based on family heritage or local patronage have lesser impact today, providing an additional basis for active national parties.

The parties and the national candidates have incorporated new technology of the mass media and the computer age into their campaign organizations. As the means of communication have developed in the past one hundred years, the parties have shifted successively from the print press to radio, television, cable television, the Internet, e-mail, cell phones, and text messaging, and computer social networks such as blogs, YouTube, and Facebook. The Obama campaign of 2008 set a new standard of electoral mobilization, sending a billion e-mail messages to its supporters and contributors.

Party Finance

The role of the national parties has expanded significantly in campaign finance. In 1976 the six federal party committees (including the congressional and Senate campaign committees as well as the national committees) raised about $60 million. By the election of 2008, these committees had become major players. In races for the House and Senate, the party committees spent $250 million, in addition to candidate expenditures. In contrast to most previous elections, Democrats had far greater treasuries, an advantage of more than double the Republican totals. The national party committees spent an equivalent amount in the presidential race, with Republicans now more well-heeled, by a two-to-one margin. But Democrats still led in overall presidential spending, with Obama raising unprecedented contributions, another quarter-of-a-billion dollars in two months of the fall campaign, mostly in small amounts. Obama could raise these large funds because, by refusing public financing, he was not limited in soliciting private donors. McCain did accept $84 million in federal funds but also was prohibited to raise additional private money. (See "Candidates' Fund-raising and Spending," p. 80.)

Federal and state campaign finance reforms enacted since the 1970s have both helped and hindered political parties. Beginning in 1976 presidential candidates became eligible for public financing of their campaigns, which reduced their reliance on money from large contributors seeking favors. However, the legislation allowed "soft money," contributions given directly to the parties, ostensibly for party building but often diverted to indirect support for the party's candidate. The reform legislation also permitted interest groups and candidates to form political action committees (PACs) to raise and spend money for campaigns. This further reduced candidates' dependence on the political parties, with the result that more campaigns became candidate-centered rather than party-centered.

The parties reasserted their role in the 1990s by accumulating large soft money contributions, which reached half a billion dollars in the 2000 election. The large amount of these funds led to the Bipartisan Campaign Reform Act of 2002 (also known as McCain-Feingold law, for its authors), which abolished soft money. Despite this legislation, outside money continued in the 2004 election, through contributions to independent campaign groups (known as "527s," for the tax code provision legalizing their efforts). Groups such as the pro-Democratic Americans Coming Together and the pro-Republican Swift Boat Veterans for Truth spent $450 million.

Despite fears that their role would be diminished by the new legislation and the independent groups, the parties proved resilient in the 2004 and 2008 elections. Their funds actually surpassed what they had raised earlier, even though they no longer could raise soft money and had to rely on lower individual contributions. Through solicitations on the Internet and other recruiting methods, the parties broadened their financial bases to include millions of new donors of smaller contributions. The financing changes also spurred the parties to a renewed emphasis on grassroots campaigning and to less dependency on media advertisements.

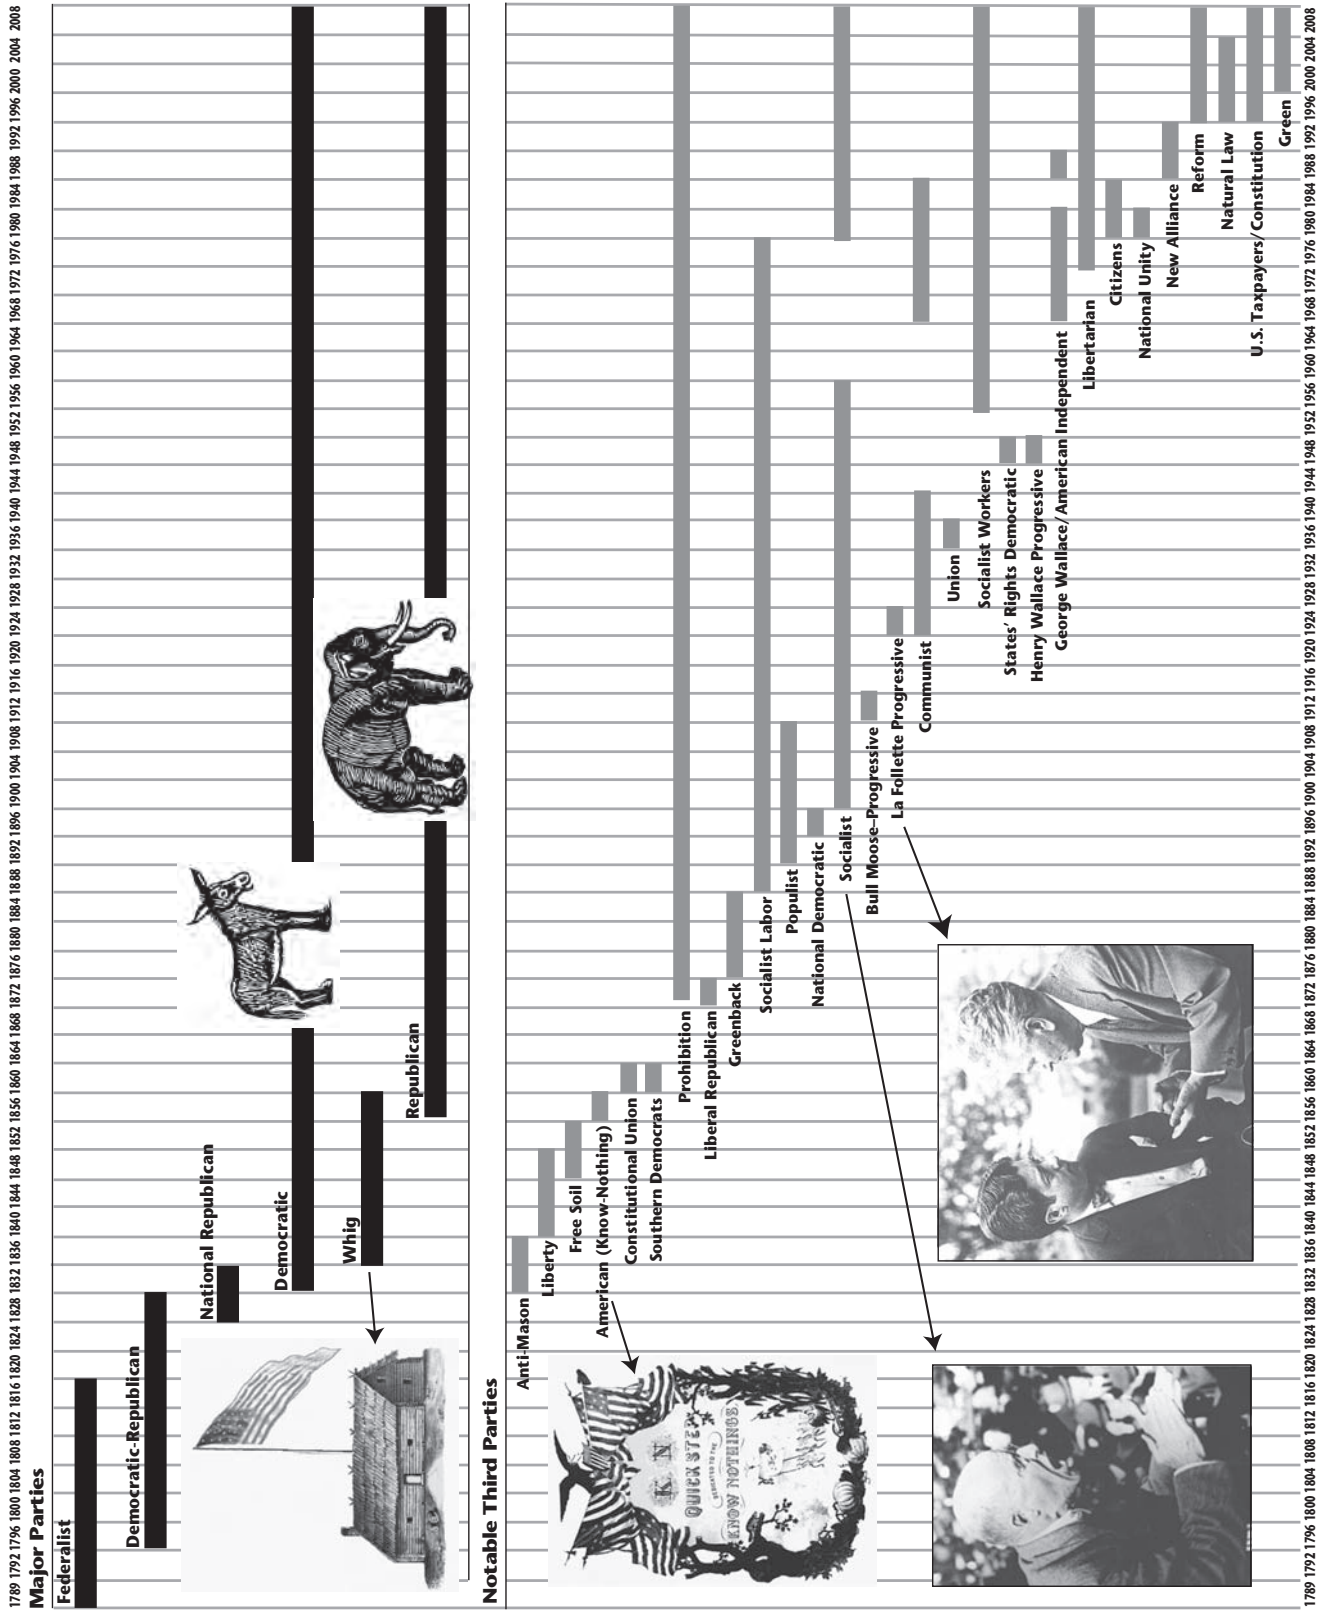

The system of public financing probably collapsed in 2008. Candidates were finding the strictures of the law too confining, and most of the major candidates opted out of the system during the primaries. The Supreme Court narrowed the effect of the law by allowing interest groups to broadcast "issue ads," thinly disguised support for favored candidates. Obama's innovative and hugely productive use of the Internet to gather millions of smaller contributions is likely to set the pattern for future campaigns. In a suggestive combination of old and new campaigning, the Obama organization used much of these contributions to support intensive local voter mobilization, perhaps another foreshadowing of the course of presidential campaigns.

THIRD PARTIES

Although the United States has always had a two-party system, third parties have sometimes played a vital role in the political order. No third-party candidate has ever been elected to the presidency, but many have been elected to other federal, state, and local offices, or affected the balloting results. Moreover, issues spotlighted by minor parties have often been later incorporated into the platforms of the major parties.

But these minor parties have been quite different in their character and effects. Some have been doctrinal parties that have spoken for a particular ideology that has little resonance in the general electorate, such as the perennial Prohibitionists and Socialists, and more recently the Libertarians and Greens.

Another group has included parties of protest that have risen and fallen rapidly. These parties have raised issues of burning concern to substantial numbers; their protests have often prompted a fast response by one or both of the major parties; but these third parties soon thereafter have disappeared.

A third group has constituted parties of secession, efforts to change the direction of the major parties. Typically, they have heralded shifts in the composition and voting constituencies of the major parties. Contemporary examples have been Wallace's American Independent Party, which initiated the movement of southern white conservatives into the Republican Party after 1968 and Anderson's National Unity Party candidacy in 1980, which began the countervailing shift of liberal votes away from the Republicans.

Nineteenth-Century Third Parties

In 1844 the Liberty Party, which opposed slavery, won 2.3 percent of the presidential vote, and it may have affected the outcome of the election. In 1848, the less radical Free Soil Party, which was dedicated to stopping the spread of slavery in the territories, played the role of spoiler. Running former president Martin Van Buren, the party won enough votes, mostly from Democrats, to enable the Whig candidate, Zachary Taylor, to defeat Democrat Lewis Cass. The demise of the party was caused primarily by the rise of the Republican Party, which took up its stance in opposition to slavery in the territories.

In the 1850s the American Party, otherwise known as the Know Nothing Party, reaped large votes in Pennsylvania and New York and even briefly gained control over the Massachusetts government. The party's main goals were excluding Catholics from public office, enacting restrictive immigration laws, and establishing literacy tests for voting.

Parties such as the Greenback Party (1874–1884) and the Prohibition Party, which started in 1869 and has continued ever since, never attracted many votes on the national level, but their success came in convincing one of the major parties to take up their cause. Eventually the Republican Party embraced Prohibition, while the Democratic Party espoused the expansion of the money supply, albeit with the free coinage of silver rather than by printing greenbacks.

The Populist (or People's) Party, which represented the interests of farmers and labor, arose in the South and West in the 1880s. Because it spoke for a perennial debtor class, the party tended to favor the free coinage of silver and backed free trade and the regulation of the railroads. The Populist platform would eventually be adopted by the Democratic Party under its 1896 presidential candidate, William Jennings Bryan.

Third Parties in the Twentieth Century

The Socialist Party came to prominence in the Progressive era, with members winning state and local offices and serving in Congress. The party ran Eugene V. Debs for president four times, the last in 1920, when Debs (campaigning from a federal penitentiary, where he was imprisoned for opposition to World War I) tallied 915,490 votes (3.4 percent). Later, Norman Thomas would serve as the Socialist Party standard bearer in several elections, gaining his largest tally of 884,649 votes (2.2 percent) in 1932.

The Progressive Party had a greater impact. As the Bull Moose Party, it became the vehicle for Theodore Roosevelt's attempt to recapture the White House in 1912, running against Democrat Woodrow Wilson and Republican William Howard Taft. When Taft's people prevented Roosevelt delegates from some states from being seated at the Republican convention, and reiterated support for the incumbent's policies, Roosevelt bolted the party and ran as a Progressive, outpolling Taft. The split of the Republican vote brought victory for Wilson. In 1924 the Progressive Party ran Robert M. La Follette for president, capturing 16.6 percent of the vote and thirteen electoral votes.

In 1948, using the Progressive Party label, Henry A. Wallace, Franklin D. Roosevelt's former vice president and secretary of agriculture, scored 2.4 percent of the vote in a four-way race that saw Harry S. Truman reelected. Wallace ran to the left of Truman on both domestic and foreign affairs, where he pushed for greater cooperation with the Soviet Union. The 1948 election also saw the emergence of another third party, the States' Rights, or Dixiecrat, Party. The Dixiecrats nominated J. Strom Thurmond, the governor of South Carolina, for president, opposing the Democratic Party's adoption of a civil rights plank in its 1948 platform. Thurmond won 2.4 percent of the vote and thirty-nine electoral votes, and he would go on to become a fixture in the Republican Senate.

In the close 1968 presidential race between Richard Nixon and Hubert H. Humphrey, George C. Wallace, the governor of Alabama, captured 13.5 percent of the popular vote and forty-six electoral votes. He ran on the American Independent ticket, pushing a conservative and somewhat racist agenda. He hoped to win sufficient states to bargain his electoral votes for policy concessions from the major candidates.

In 1992 Perot ran for president as an independent, receiving 18.9 percent of the vote but no electoral votes. In 1996 he ran again under the Reform Party banner, receiving only 8.4 percent of the vote, and again no electoral votes. In 2000 the Reform Party seemed destined for oblivion as it split down the middle over the contested nomination of Patrick J. Buchanan for president; by 2004 the party was virtually extinct.

In the 2000 race another third party made a better showing than the Reform Party. Ralph Nader, running on the Green Party ticket, won 2.7 percent of the vote. Some political analysts believed that Nader may have siphoned away enough Democratic votes from Democrat Gore, particularly in Florida, to throw electoral votes and the White House to Republican Bush. However, others point out the counterbalancing effect that Reform Party candidate Buchanan may have had by drawing votes away from Bush in states that barely went to Gore.

In the 2004 and 2008 elections, 112 third parties were on the ballot in one or more states. These included such perennial entries as the Prohibition, Socialist, and Socialist Workers parties, as well as more recent contestants, the Libertarian, Reform, Natural Law, U.S. Taxpayers, and Green parties. However, among this panoply of electoral choices, all of the minor parties together gained only 1 percent of the national vote in either contest. Nader's standing fell precipitously from 2000, and he was hardly noticed in these two elections. Having seen the possible consequences of a "wasted vote," voters returned to the Republicans and Democrats. These elections again demonstrated the historical pattern of dominance by the two major parties.

Historical Profiles of American Political Parties

ALTHOUGH POLITICAL PARTIES are not directly mentioned in the U.S. Constitution, they emerged early in the nation's history to become and remain an integral part of the American system of elected government. Today, as well as when they appeared in the 1790s, they satisfy an important need for U.S. democracy: bringing people with the same beliefs together to govern at the local and national levels. At nearly every moment in the nation's history there have been two major political parties in operation. Since the 1860s, the Democratic and Republican parties have been dominant.

Third parties also have had an important role in history: providing the forum for radical ideas, not accepted by the ruling parties of the day, to take root. Ideas such as the abolition of slavery, women's suffrage, minimum wages, and Social Security were first advocated by third parties before they were eventually adopted by the major parties and accepted by the nation as a whole. This chapter examines the origins, development, and important policy ideas of all major parties and noteworthy third parties in U.S. history.

AMERICAN INDEPENDENT PARTY (1968– ) AND AMERICAN PARTY (1972– )

Both the American Party and the American Independent Party descended from the American Independent Party that served as the vehicle for George C. Wallace's third-party presidential candidacy in 1968. Under either flag, the organization has had a contentious history extending into the twenty-first century and spawning new third-party groups.

Wallace, governor of Alabama (1963–1967; 1971–1979), burst onto the national scene in 1964 as a Democratic presidential candidate opposed to the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Entering three primaries outside his native South—in Wisconsin, Indiana, and Maryland—he surprised political observers by winning between 30 percent and 43 percent of the Democratic primary vote in the three states. His unexpectedly strong showing brought the term “white backlash” into the political vocabulary as a description of the racial undertone of the Wallace vote.

In 1968 Wallace broke with the Democrats and embarked on his second presidential campaign as a third-party candidate under the American Independent Party label. His candidacy capitalized on the bitter reactions of millions of voters, especially white blue-collar workers, to the civil rights activism, urban riots, antiwar demonstrations, and heavy federal spending on Johnson administration “Great Society” programs that marked the mid-1960s. With the help of his Alabama advisers and volunteer groups, Wallace was able to get his party on the ballot in all fifty states.

The former governor did not hold a convention for his party, but in October he announced his vice-presidential running mate (retired air force general Curtis LeMay) and released a platform. In the November election the Wallace-LeMay ticket received 9,906,473 votes (13.5 percent of the popular vote), carried five southern states, and won forty-six electoral votes. The party's showing was the best by a third party since 1924, when Robert M. La Follette collected 16.6 percent of the vote on the Progressive Party ticket.

After his defeat in that election, Wallace returned to the Democratic Party, competing in Democratic presidential primaries in 1972 and 1976. Wallace's American Independent Party began to break into factions after the 1968 election but in 1972 united behind John G. Schmitz, a Republican U.S. representative from southern California (1970–1973), as its presidential nominee. Thomas J. Anderson, a farm magazine and syndicated news features publisher from Tennessee, was the party's vice-presidential candidate. In many states, the party shortened its name to American Party. In the November election, the Schmitz-Anderson ticket won 1,099,482 votes (1.4 percent of the popular vote) but failed to win any electoral votes. The ticket ran best in the West, taking 9 percent of the vote in Idaho, 7 percent in Alaska, and 6 percent in Utah.

In December 1972 a bitter fight occurred for the chairmanship of the American Independent Party between Anderson and William K. Shearer, the chairman of the party in California. Anderson defeated Shearer, retaining control of the party but renaming it the American Party. Shearer, over the following four years, expanded his California-based group into a new national party. He had kept the name American Independent Party in California and made that the name of the new nationwide group.

By 1976 there were two distinct entities: the American Party headed by Anderson and the American Independent Party headed by Shearer.

The 1976 American Party convention was held in Salt Lake City, Utah, in June. Anderson was nominated for president and Rufus Shackleford of Florida for vice president.

The party's nomination of Anderson followed its failure to enlist a prominent conservative to lead the ticket. Both Gov. Meldrim Thomson Jr. of New Hampshire and Sen. Jesse Helms of North Carolina were approached, but both decided to remain in the Republican Party. With well-known conservatives declining the party's overtures, the convention turned to Anderson. He easily won the nomination on the first ballot by defeating six party workers.

Anderson's campaign stressed the "permanent principles" of the party, augmented by the 1976 platform. These principles included opposition to foreign aid, U.S. withdrawal from the United Nations, and an end to trade with or recognition of communist nations. The platform included planks opposing abortion, gun control, the Equal Rights Amendment, and government-sponsored health care and welfare programs. In general, the party favored limits on federal power and was against budget deficits except in wartime.

The American Party was on the ballot in eighteen states, including eight states where the American Independent Party was also listed. In seven of those eight states, Anderson ran ahead of the American Independent Party ticket. Anderson's strength was spread fairly evenly across the country. His best showings were in Utah (2.5 percent of the vote) and Montana (1.8 percent). But Anderson's total of 160,773 popular votes (0.2 percent) placed him almost 10,000 votes behind the American Independent Party candidate nationally.

The American Independent Party convention met in Chicago in August 1976 and chose former Georgia governor Lester Maddox (1967–1971), a Democrat, as its presidential nominee and former Madison, Wisconsin, mayor William Dyke, a Republican, as its vice-presidential candidate. Maddox won a first-ballot nomination over Dallas columnist Robert Morris and former representative John R. Rarick, a Democrat of Louisiana (1967–1975).

At the convention, a group of nationally prominent conservatives made a bid to take over the party and use it as a vehicle to build a new conservative coalition. Richard Viguerie, a fund-raiser for Wallace and a nationally known direct mail expert, was the leader of the group. He was joined at the convention by two leading conservatives—William Rusher, publisher of the National Review, and Howard Phillips, the former head of the Office of Economic Opportunity (1973) and leader of the Conservative Caucus, an activist conservative group. Viguerie, Phillips, and Rusher all argued that the American Independent Party should be overhauled, changed from a fringe group to a philosophical home for believers in free enterprise and traditional moral values. They also hoped they could attract Helms, Thomson, or representative Philip M. Crane, R-Ill. When none of these men agreed to run on the American Independent Party ticket, Viguerie and his allies found themselves unable to successfully promote Morris, a lesser-known substitute.

Many American Independent Party members favored Maddox because they saw him as a colorful personality, one capable of drawing media attention and perhaps of picking up the 5 percent of the national vote needed to qualify the party for federal funding. Maddox never came close to that goal, however, achieving only 0.2 percent of the national vote (170,531). It was his 51,098 votes in California, where American Party nominee Anderson was not on the ballot, that enabled Maddox to run slightly ahead of Anderson nationally.

Despite the power struggle between Anderson and Shearer, there was little difference between their two party platforms. As did the American Party, the American Independent Party opposed abortion, gun control, forced busing, foreign aid, and membership in the United Nations.

By 1980 neither party was much of a force in American politics. Both retained the same basic platforms, but each was on the ballot in only a handful of states. The American Independent Party's nominee, former representative Rarick, ran in only eight states. Economist Percy L. Greaves Jr., the American Party candidate, was listed in just seven.

The American Independent Party did not field a presidential candidate in 1984, while the American Party placed Delmar Dennis, a book publisher from Pigeon Forge, Tennessee, on the ballot in six states.

Dennis also ran under the American Party banner in 1988 and, with his running mate, Earl Jeppson, received 3,475 votes. The American Independent Party fared better with their candidates, presidential nominee James C. Griffin and vice-presidential nominee Charles J. Morsa, receiving 27,818 votes.

By 1992 the fortunes for both parties had dwindled even further. American Party presidential nominee Robert J. Smith and running mate Doris Feimer were on the ballot only in Utah, where they received 292 votes. In 1996 the American Party ticket of Diane Beall Templin and Gary Van Horn made the ballot in two states, Colorado and Utah, and collected a total of 1,847 votes. The American Independent Party did not field a presidential ticket in the 1990s, nor did either party in 2000 or 2004, although persons associated with the parties did run under the banner of the Constitution Party.

In 2008 the American Independent Party broke into factions with different groups claiming leadership. One group continued a relationship with the Constitution Party and supported its candidate for president, Chuck Baldwin. Another group, which also had supported the Constitution Party, backed away from that link and allied with a new party called America's Independent Party, which had as its presidential candidate Alan Keyes of Maryland. Keyes drew little support, winning just 47,674 votes in eleven states. Most of the votes, 40,673, came in California.

ANTI-FEDERALISTS (1789–1796)

Never a formal party, the Anti-Federalists were a loosely organized group opposed to ratification of the Constitution. With the ratification of the Constitution in 1788, the Anti-Federalists served as the opposition to the Federalists in the early years of the Republic.

Anti-Federalists were primarily rural, agrarian men from inland regions who favored individual freedom and states' rights, which they felt would be jeopardized by the new Constitution. After ratification, the efforts of the Anti-Federalists led to adoption of the first ten amendments, the Bill of Rights, which spelled out the major limitations on federal power.

As the opposition faction in Congress during the formative years of the Republic, the Anti-Federalists basically held to a strict interpretation of the Constitution, particularly in regard to the various economic proposals of Treasury Secretary Alexander Hamilton to centralize more power in the federal government.

Although never the majority faction in Congress, the Anti-Federalists were a forerunner of Thomas Jefferson's Democratic-Republican Party, which came into existence in the 1790s and dominated American politics for the first quarter of the nineteenth century.

ANTI-MASONIC PARTY (1828–1836)

Born in the mid-1820s in upstate New York, the Anti-Masonic Party focused the strong, anti-elitist mood of the period on a conspicuous symbol of privilege, the Masons. The Masons were a secret fraternal organization with membership drawn largely from the upper class. Conversely, the appeal of the Anti-Masonic movement was to the common man—poor farmers and laborers especially—who resented the secrecy and privilege of the Masons.

The spark that created the party came in 1826, when William Morgan, a dissident Mason from Batavia, New York, allegedly on the verge of exposing the inner workings of the order, mysteriously disappeared and never was seen again. Refusal of Masonic leaders to cooperate in the inconclusive investigation of Morgan's disappearance led to suspicious that Masons had kidnapped and murdered him and were suppressing the inquiry.

From 1828 through 1831, the new Anti-Masonic Party spread through New England and the Middle Atlantic states, in many places establishing itself as the primary opposition to the Democrats. In addition to its appeal to the working classes, particularly in northern rural areas, and its opposition to Masonry, the Anti-Masons displayed a fervor against immorality, as seen not only in secret societies but also in slavery, intemperance, and urban life.

In September 1831 the party held the first national nominating convention in American history. One hundred and sixteen delegates from thirteen states gathered in Baltimore, Maryland, and nominated former attorney general William Wirt of Maryland for the presidency. In the 1832 elections, Wirt received only 100,715 votes (7.8 percent of the popular vote) and carried just one state, Vermont, but it was the first third party in U.S. politics to win any electoral college votes. The Anti-Masons did reasonably well at other levels, winning the Vermont governorship several years and competing in close elections in a few other states. In the U.S. House they had fifteen members in the Twenty-second Congress (1831–1833) and twenty-four in the Twenty-third Congress (1833–1835).

But the decline of Masonry, especially in New York, where the number of lodges dropped from 507 in 1826 to forty-eight six years later, robbed the Anti-Masons of an emotional issue and hastened their decline. The 1832 election was the high point for the Anti-Masons as a national party. In the 1836 campaign the party endorsed Whig candidate William Henry Harrison. Subsequently, the bulk of the Anti-Masonic constituency moved into the Whig Party. In 1836 the major parties also held their own conventions and wrote their own platforms. Despite its short life, the Anti-Masons were one of the most important American third parties, contributing to the openness of the system and establishing party platforms and conventions as part of modern political practices.

BRECKINRIDGE (SOUTHERN) DEMOCRATS (1860)

Agitation over the slavery issue, building for a generation, reached a climax in 1860 and produced a sectional split in the Democratic Party. Throughout the midnineteenth century the Democrats had remained unified by supporting the various pieces of compromise legislation that both protected slavery in the southern states and endorsed the policy of popular sovereignty in the territories. But in 1860 southern Democrats wanted the Democratic convention (meeting in Charleston, South Carolina) to insert a plank specifically protecting slavery in the territories. When their plank was defeated, delegates from most of the southern states walked out.

The northern wing of the party, after recessing for six weeks, reconvened in Baltimore, Maryland, where Sen. Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois was nominated as its presidential candidate. Most of the southern delegates, plus those from California and Oregon, nominated their own ticket in a rump convention held after Douglas's selection. John C. Breckinridge (1821–1875) of Kentucky, the incumbent vice president under President James Buchanan, accepted the southern wing's nomination. Joseph Lane, a states' rights advocate from Oregon, was selected as his running mate. After the formation of the two sectional tickets, two separate Democratic national committees operated in Washington, D.C., to oversee their campaigns.

The platforms of the Douglas and Breckinridge Democrats agreed that the Fugitive Slave Law must be enforced, but the Breckinridge Democrats also insisted on a federal slave code for the territories and on the right of slaveholders to take their slave property into the western territories, decisions that the Douglas platform said it would leave to the Supreme Court and that the Republican Party and its candidate, Abraham Lincoln, absolutely opposed. The four-way election also included John Bell of the Constitutional Union Party.

The Breckinridge ticket placed third in popular votes behind Lincoln and Douglas, receiving 848,019 votes (18.1 percent of the popular vote) and winning eleven of the fifteen slave states, which placed it second in electoral votes with seventy-two. Although the combined Douglas-Breckinridge vote amounted to a plurality of the ballots cast, the split in Democratic ranks was a boon to the campaign of the Republican candidate, Lincoln, who won with less than 40 percent of the vote. Lincoln's victory in the electoral college, however, did not depend on a divided opposition, for he took an absolute majority to win regardless. Breckinridge's support came mostly from the South, although it did not necessarily reflect the degree of proslavery sentiment in the region, since some voters who later supported secession voted for Douglas or Bell, and many of Breckinridge's supporters were traditional Democrats who did not see themselves as voting on secession. Indeed, Breckinridge saw himself as the only candidate who could prevent secession, since if he won, the South would happily remain in the Union.

Lincoln's election led to secession by seven Deep South states, and four more joined the Confederacy soon after his inauguration. Before Lincoln's inauguration, Vice President Breckinridge worked with other Democrats in Washington to fashion a compromise that might prevent a civil war. On the main point of contention, however, slavery in the territories, Lincoln would not budge, so no settlement could be reached. Breckinridge, while still vice president, had been elected to the U.S. Senate, his term to begin when his vice presidency ended. As a senator in 1861 he defended the right of southern states to secede and opposed Lincoln's efforts to raise an army.

By late 1861 Union and Confederate forces alike had entered Kentucky, and Breckinridge offered his services to the Confederacy. He resigned from the Senate before it expelled him for his pro-Confederate behavior. He served as a major general in the Confederate army and then as Confederate secretary of war. During the war the Southern Democrats provided much of the leadership for the Confederate government, including its president, Jefferson Davis.

When the war ended with the Confederacy's defeat and slavery's abolition, the particular issues that had animated Breckinridge's presidential bid in 1860 no longer mattered. The Southern Democrats made no attempt to continue as a separate sectional entity and rejoined the national Democratic Party.

CITIZENS PARTY (1979–1984)

Organized in 1979 as a coalition of dissident liberals and populists, the first Citizens Party convention chose author and environmental scientist Barry Commoner as its 1980 presidential candidate and La Donna Harris, wife of former Democratic senator Fred R. Harris of Oklahoma, as his running mate. The Citizens Party ticket ran on the central theme that major decisions in America were made to benefit corporations and not the average citizen. The party proposed public control of energy industries and multinational corporations; a halt to the use of nuclear power; a sharp cut in military spending; and price controls on food, fuel, housing, and health care.

Commoner ran in all of the large electoral vote states except Florida and Texas. He made his biggest push in California, Illinois, Michigan, New York, and Pennsylvania, where party leaders believed they could tap a “sophisticated working-class population” and appeal to political activists who had been involved in the environmental and antinuclear movements that sprang up in the late 1970s.

The Commoner-Harris ticket was on the ballot in twenty-nine states and the District of Columbia in 1980. Party leaders asserted that it was the largest number of ballot positions attained by any third party in its first campaign. In addition to its presidential ticket, the Citizens Party also fielded twenty-two candidates for other offices, including two for the U.S. Senate and seven for the House. The Citizens Party won 234,294 votes in the 1980 presidential election, or 0.3 percent of the vote.

As its 1984 presidential nominee, the Citizens Party chose outspoken feminist Sonia Johnson of Virginia. Johnson first attracted national attention in 1979, when the Mormon Church excommunicated her for supporting the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA). In 1982 she staged a thirty-seven-day hunger strike in an unsuccessful effort to pressure the Illinois legislature to approve the ERA. The Citizens Party selected party activist Richard J. Walton of Rhode Island to accompany Johnson on the ticket. Winning 72,200 votes in 1984, the ticket garnered 0.1 percent of the vote. That was the last year that the Citizens Party fielded a national ticket.

COMMUNIST PARTY (1919–)

In 1919, shortly after the Russian Revolution, Soviet communists encouraged American left-wing groups to withdraw from the Socialist Party and to form a communist party in the United States. The party arose at that time as part of the social and economic turmoil that followed World War I and the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. Two major organizations emerged from the American Socialist Party: the larger Communist Party of America and the Communist Labor Party.

But both were aggressively prosecuted by the U.S. government in the period around 1920, causing a drop in their already small membership and forcing them underground.

By the mid-1920s, the Communist Party of the USA was formed to implant the revolutionary aims of the Soviet Union in America. William Z. Foster, a labor organizer, was the party's first presidential candidate, in 1924. National tickets were run every four years through 1940 and from 1968 through 1984, but the party's peak year at the polls was 1932, when Foster received 103,253 votes (0.3 percent of the popular vote).

The Communists have a distinctive place in American political history as the only party to have had international ties. In 1929 a party split brought the formal creation of the Communist Party of the United States, with acknowledged status as a part of the worldwide communist movement (the Communist International).

The Communist International terminated during World War II, and in 1944 the party's leader in America, Earl Browder, dissolved the party and committed the movement to operate within the two-party system. In the 1944 campaign the Communists endorsed President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who repudiated their support.

However, with the breakup of the U.S.–Soviet alliance after World War II, the Communists reconstituted themselves as a political party. They supported Henry Wallace's Progressive Party candidacy in 1948 but were limited during the cold war period of the 1950s by restrictive federal and state legislation that virtually outlawed the party.

With the gradual easing of restrictive measures, the Communist Party resumed electoral activities in the late 1960s. In a policy statement written in 1966, the party described itself as “a revolutionary party whose aim is the fundamental transformation of society.”

The party's success at the polls, however, continued to be minimal. Its presidential candidates in 1968, 1972, 1976, 1980, and 1984—the last year that they appeared on the ballot—each received less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the vote.

CONSERVATIVE PARTY (1962–)

In 1962 the New York State Conservative Party began to take shape under the direction of J. Daniel Mahoney, a New York attorney, and his brother-in-law, Kieran O'Doherty. They were motivated primarily by the belief that real political alternatives were no longer being offered to the state electorate. They saw the three dominant parties in the state—the Liberal Party, the Democratic Party, and the Republican Party under Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and Sen. Jacob K. Javits—as offering a generally liberal agenda.

Although political commentators predicted the early demise of the party—particularly in the aftermath of Barry Goldwater's overwhelming defeat in the 1964 presidential elections—the party continued to grow both in membership and in candidate endorsements. In 1965 the nationally known columnist and intellectual William F. Buckley ran for mayor of New York City, generating national publicity for the party. One year later, the Conservative candidate for governor, Professor Paul Adams, outpolled Liberal Party candidate Franklin D. Roosevelt Jr., obtaining Row C of the ballot for the party. A party's position on the ballot is determined by the number of votes cast for its candidate for governor. Appearing in Row C is significant because the higher the row, the more notice voters are likely to take of the party's candidates. In 1970 James Buckley was elected to the U.S. Senate on Row C alone, winning nearly 2.3 million votes (38.8 percent of the total vote). From the mid-1970s onward few statewide Republican candidates gained office without a Conservative Party cross-endorsement.

Although the Conservative Party suffered some setbacks, such as the loss of Row C to the Independence (Reform) Party in 1996 and the siphoning off of some supporters to the Right to Life Party, it remains a major force in New York State politics. The Conservative Party has opposed abortion since it became a political issue; nonetheless, the party has occasionally backed abortion rights candidates whose conservative credentials were otherwise satisfactory. The Right to Life Party never backs candidates who support abortion.

Even though some members of the Conservative Party are Protestant fundamentalists, a large part of its membership and much of its leadership are traditionalist Roman Catholics. In a real sense, the rise of the party has mirrored the rise of the conservative movement in America—from Goldwater's capture of the 1964 Republican nomination to Ronald Reagan's electoral triumphs in 1980 and 1984. In addition, the party has successfully fought the image of extremism while generally remaining true to its core principles—tax limitation, education reform, and tough anti-crime policies.

CONSTITUTIONAL UNION PARTY (1860)

The short-lived Constitutional Union Party was formed in 1859 to promote national conciliation in the face of rampant sectionalism, which included southern threats of secession. The party appealed to conservative remnants of the American (Know Nothing) and Whig parties, who viewed preservation of the Union as their primary goal.

The Constitutional Union Party held its first and only national convention in Baltimore, Maryland, in May 1860. For president the party nominated John Bell of Tennessee, a former senator and speaker of the House of Representatives, who previously had been both a Democrat and a Whig. The convention adopted a short platform, which intentionally avoided controversial subjects, most notably the divisive slavery issue. Instead, the platform simply urged support for “the Constitution, the Union and the Laws.”

In the fall election, Bell received 590,901 votes (12.6 percent of the popular vote) and won Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia. However, the Bell ticket finished last in the four-way presidential race and, together with the sectional split in the Democratic Party, was a prominent factor in the victory of Republican Abraham Lincoln.

In the months after the 1860 election the Constitutional Union Party continued to urge national conciliation, but with the outbreak of the Civil War the party disappeared.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY (1828–)

The Democratic Party is the oldest political organization in the United States. Indeed, a history of the party is in some ways a political history of the nation. In the first few years of the Republic, political parties did not exist, although factions tied to issues and the personal ambitions of political leaders influenced elections and policies. The Democratic Party traces its roots to this factionalism, beginning with opposition to the Federalist policies of Alexander Hamilton in the first administration of George Washington.

Origins of the Democratic Party

Opposition to Federalist policies, organized by James Madison and Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson, first coalesced around Hamilton's proposal for a national bank, which Congress passed and Washington signed, over the strenuous objections of Jefferson and Madison. The two Virginians were more successful in preventing the adoption of Hamilton's larger plan for federal support for the development of U.S. industry. The Federalists, led by Hamilton and John Adams, favored a strong central government and a flexible interpretation of the Constitution. Key to their program was a national bank, which would facilitate economic growth and strengthen national and international commerce.

Jefferson's Democratic-Republicans advocated “strict construction” of the Constitution and opposed a national bank. Moreover, they favored friendly relations with France, while the Federalists sought to forge friendly diplomatic and commercial relations with England. Both parties had supporters throughout the country, but the Democratic-Republicans were strongest in the South and among slaveowners, and the Federalists were strongest in New England and among men with commercial and manufacturing interests. From the 1790s until the late 1820s various terms—Democratic-Republicans, Jeffersonian Republicans, Jeffersonian Democrats, and National Republicans—were applied to the people and leaders who, opposed to the Federalists, gradually became known as Democrats.

The Democratic-Republicans grew stronger as the Federalists began to fade during the presidency of Adams. A new alliance of agrarian southerners and urban northerners helped Jefferson defeat Adams in 1800 and win reelection in 1804. After Jefferson the presidency went to his friends and allies, Madison (1809–1817) and James Monroe (1817–1825). By 1820 the Federalist Party had all but disappeared, and Monroe won reelection with no opposition.

Indicative of the change in the party of Jefferson was its attitude toward the Bank of the United States. In 1791 Jefferson and Madison had vigorously opposed the creation of this bank, arguing that establishment of such a bank was unconstitutional. It is arguable that the genesis of the modern Democratic Party dates from that bank debate. In 1811 the bank's twenty-year charter expired, and the Democrats who controlled Congress and the presidency did not renew it. By 1816, however, Madison supported the creation of a new bank and renounced his former opposition to it. Congress, controlled by Democrats, passed the bill.

The inherent instability of one-party politics became clear in 1824, as four candidates—Andrew Jackson, John Quincy Adams, William Crawford, and Henry Clay, all claiming to represent the Jeffersonian tradition—ran for president. No candidate received a majority of popular or electoral votes, and the House of Representatives chose John Quincy Adams, although Jackson had received more popular votes and more electoral votes. After 1824 the old Jeffersonian party unraveled. John Quincy Adams had broken with the Federalist Party during the War of 1812 and had served as Monroe's secretary of state, but he was never a true "Jeffersonian." By the end of his administration in 1829 he and supporters such as Clay emerged as members of a faction that eventually became the Whig Party.

The Jackson Legacy

Jackson, hero of the War of 1812, defeated incumbent John Quincy Adams in 1828 and became the first president to represent the "Democratic Party." The party has maintained that name ever since, although it was often divided over issues such as slavery, economic policy, and national unity in the nineteenth century and foreign policy, civil rights, and economic policy in the twentieth.

Jackson, nominated in 1828 by the Tennessee legislature, led the Democrats to adopt a nominating convention as the method for choosing the party's future standard-bearers. The Democrats held their first national convention at Baltimore, Maryland, in 1832, eight months after the Anti-Masons held the first such convention, also in Baltimore. The 1832 Democratic convention adopted two rules that lasted more than a century. The two-thirds rule, requiring a two-thirds majority for nomination, led to numerous floor fights over the choosing of a Democratic presidential candidate. The unit rule allowed convention delegations to override minority objections within the delegation and to vote as a whole for one candidate or position.

From Jackson's election in 1828 through the end of James Buchanan's term in 1861, the Democrats dominated national politics. In this period the Democrats opposed any national bank, high tariffs, internal improvements, and even a uniform bankruptcy law. High points of Jackson's presidency included his veto of bills to support internal improvements and to extend the charter of the Second Bank of the United States. Jackson and other Democrats in this period vigorously supported territorial expansion through Native American removal, the annexation of Texas, and ultimately the Mexican-American War. Their support for territorial gains followed Jefferson's expansionist policies that led to the peaceful acquisition of Louisiana from France in 1803. Most Democrats, and almost all party leaders, supported the demands of the South between 1828 and 1861 on issues involving slavery. Meanwhile, Jackson's opponents—led by Clay, Daniel Webster, and William Henry Harrison—formed the Whig Party. The Whigs—who favored higher tariffs, a national bank, federally funded internal improvements, and a weak presidency—provided the main opposition to the Democrats until the emergence of the Republican Party in 1854.

In the first appearance of the Democratic donkey, this unfavorable 1837 political cartoon shows Martin Van Buren walking behind his predecessor, Andrew Jackson, who rides the donkey.

Jackson's election ushered in an era known as "Jacksonian Democracy," which stressed political equality—for white men. Jacksonians throughout the country made war on black voters, taking away their voting rights in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Tennessee, and North Carolina and opposing their voting rights elsewhere. Jackson himself led the movement to force Native Americans out of the states east of the Mississippi River.

Jefferson, already considered the "father" of the Democratic Party, had been the first president to remove officeholders and replace them with his supporters. Jackson renewed this policy through the "spoils system," a term that stemmed from the phrase "to the victors go the spoils." As the party in power during most of the period from 1829 to 1861, the Democrats controlled the growing bureaucracy and rewarded many supporters with patronage jobs.

Jackson's legacy was a Democratic Party that endured into the twenty-first century. Dominating national politics from its outset, the Democrats lost the presidential election only twice (in 1840 and 1848) between 1828 and 1860. From Jackson's inauguration in 1829 until 2009, the Democrats controlled the House of Representatives for fifty-six two-year sessions and the Senate for forty-seven sessions (plus more than one and one-half years of the 107th Congress from 2001 to 2003). The number of years that the Democrats controlled the House or Senate during this period was more than the combined years of control by the Whig and Republican Parties.

Despite their long-term success, the Democrats barely survived their severest test, over slavery and secession. In 1846 northern Democrats supported the Wilmot Proviso, introduced in the House by Pennsylvania Democrat David Wilmot. The proviso would have prohibited slavery in any territory acquired during the Mexican-American War. Southern Democrats uniformly opposed the proviso. In 1848 many antislavery Democrats from New York, Pennsylvania, and New England voted for former president Martin Van Buren, who was running on the Free Soil Party ticket. These defections led to the election of the Whig candidate, Zachary Taylor. The Democrats regained the presidency in 1852, but slavery soon splintered the party. In 1856 Democrat Franklin Pierce became the first elected president denied renomination by his party. He had alienated fellow northerners by signing legislation that allowed slavery into Kansas Territory, which in turn led it to become a battleground between pro- and antislavery forces. Another northerner, Buchanan, won the nomination but also was a one-term president. By 1860 many northern Democrats, among them Sens. Salmon P. Chase of Ohio and Hannibal Hamlin of Maine, had joined the new Republican Party.

At the 1860 convention in Charleston, South Carolina, northern and southern Democrats were divided over how much support to give slavery in the territories. Northerners, backing Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, favored opening all territories to slavery under a system of popular sovereignty, in which settlers would decide for themselves whether to permit slavery. Most of the southerners bolted after the defeat of platform planks endorsing a federal slave code for the territories and guaranteeing the right of slaveowners to carry their human property into all federal territories. The northern delegates nominated Douglas for president, while the southern Democrats nominated John C. Breckinridge of Kentucky. Even had the Democrats remained united, it is doubtful they could have prevented the Republican candidate, Abraham Lincoln, from winning an electoral majority, as he swept every free state except New Jersey, which he split with Douglas. The split in the Democratic Party presaged the more important split in the nation, which occurred with the secession of eleven southern states in 1860–1861.

Decline and Resurgence

During the Civil War, northern Democrats remained divided. War Democrats generally supported the war effort and Lincoln's initial goal of bringing the South back into the Union, although they objected to Lincoln's emancipation policies and after 1863 were far less enthusiastic about the war or its goals. Throughout the war, by contrast, the Copperhead faction opposed the war effort and sought peace negotiations with the Confederacy.

Democrats came back together after the Civil War, but both their commitment to white supremacy and their image of disloyalty continued. During Reconstruction, Democrats opposed civil rights laws and the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, which were designed to establish citizenship for African Americans, recognize their civil rights, and guarantee their voting rights. As late as the 1880s, the Democrats were termed the party of "rum, romanism, and rebellion," because of the party's opposition to temperance laws, its support among Irish Catholics, and the fact that much of its support came from former Confederates.

In 1876 the Democratic governor of New York, Samuel J. Tilden, won the popular vote against Republican Rutherford B. Hayes, but Tilden lost the election when a congressional compromise awarded Hayes all the disputed electoral votes of three southern states. Election fraud, intimidation, and outright violence by white southern Democrats prevented thousands of African Americans from voting. Had the election been run fairly, it is likely that Hayes would have won outright. As part of the compromise that brought Hayes to the White House, the new president promised to remove federal troops from the South, effectively ending Reconstruction. Their removal led to a gradual disfranchisement of blacks in the South, which soon became solidly Democratic and would remain largely so until the presidential election of 1964. Despite a virtual lock on all southern electoral votes, the Democrats captured the presidency only twice between 1860 and 1912; New York governor Grover Cleveland won in 1884 and 1892.

By the late nineteenth century the Democratic Party's policies had changed somewhat from the antebellum period. Still a "white man's party," it was hostile to African Americans' civil rights and to Chinese immigration. With slavery ended, however, the party had dropped its aggressive expansionism of the earlier period. Cleveland refused to annex Hawaii, and some Democrats opposed the Spanish-American War in 1898. Democrats remained hostile to high tariffs, but they split on the issue of an expansive monetary policy; western Democrats favored the free coinage of silver, and eastern Democrats, among them Cleveland, opposed it. Most southern whites gave their allegiance to the Democrats, but in the North by the 1890s, and especially following the 1893 depression, economic and cultural issues outweighed memories of Civil War enmity in voter choices between the two major parties.

The GOP continued to dominate presidential politics for twelve years into the twentieth century. In 1912 the Republicans split when former president Theodore Roosevelt failed in his attempt to gain his party's nomination over the incumbent, William Howard Taft. Roosevelt ran in the general election anyway, on the Progressive—or Bull Moose—ticket, winning six states and 4.1 million votes. Roosevelt came in second, and Taft a distant third, but Taft and Roosevelt combined for 1.3 million more popular votes than the Democrat, New Jersey governor Woodrow Wilson. Had the Republicans been united, their candidate—either Roosevelt or Taft—would have won. But divided they enabled Wilson to carry forty states and the election, ending the Democrats' long presidential drought. Wilson demonstrated the Democrats' hostility to civil rights and racial equality, as he ordered the segregation of all federal facilities in Washington, D.C. He was a progressive reformer on many issues, however, and brought such innovations as the Federal Reserve System, in contrast to historic Democratic hostility to federal government intervention in the economy.

Wilson also led the Democrats to embrace a more internationally engaged foreign policy. Before the Civil War, the Democrats, in part spurred by the demands of the South for more territory for slavery, had pursued an aggressive policy of land acquisition, ultimately leading to war with Mexico. Pre-Civil War Democrats had had little interest in international affairs beyond the Western Hemisphere, however. In 1917, by contrast, Wilson successfully guided the American entry into World War I, and he continued his internationalist policies after the end of the war, as he vainly attempted to bring the United States into the League of Nations. For the next half-century the Democratic Party stood for intervention and international responsibility, while the Republicans retreated into a large measure of diplomatic isolationism.

After World War I the Republicans took back the White House in 1920, kept it in 1924, and won again with Herbert Hoover's 1928 victory over Democrat Alfred E.

Smith, the first Roman Catholic presidential nominee who was then governor of New York. After the stock market crashed in 1929, however, the Great Depression paved the way for a new Democratic dominance in the White House and an even longer one in Congress.

New Deal to Great Society

The election of Franklin D. Roosevelt—Smith's successor as governor of New York—in 1932 made a dramatic and lasting change in U.S. politics. Democrats sang “Happy Days Are Here Again” as they became the majority party and rallied behind FDR's bold New Deal programs. Democrats, long the party of states' rights and localism, became identified with national initiatives on economic and social issues. During the New Deal, rural electrification brought light and heat to much of the nation; a range of programs helped the poor and the unemployed; the nation's labor policy went through a sea change with the Wagner Labor Relations Act; and massive public works programs, such as the Tennessee Valley Authority, not only created jobs but constructed public buildings, roads, and dams. Once a party opposed to regulation, the Democrats helped create the regulatory state. Social programs, most notably Social Security, set the stage for the modern industrial state that provides a social safety net for citizens.

At Roosevelt's urging, the 1936 Democratic convention abolished the controversial two-thirds rule, which in effect had given the South a veto in choosing the national party ticket. Southern delegates agreed to a compromise, basing the size of future delegations on a state's Democratic voting strength instead of population size.

During the Roosevelt years and after, for the first time in its history, the Democratic Party welcomed African American support and even backed some civil rights legislation, and President Roosevelt and his successor, Harry S. Truman, issued executive orders to combat some types of racial segregation and other discrimination. The “New Deal coalition”—northern blacks, southern whites, farmers, labor unionists, intellectuals, and ethnic urban voters—kept Roosevelt and Truman in office for twenty consecutive years, ending in 1953.

Immediately before and during World War II, Roosevelt pushed an international agenda, building on Wilson's legacy. Here Roosevelt had the support of southern Democrats, who opposed some of his domestic agenda. Opposition came from Republican isolationists, but, unlike Wilson, FDR was able to bring the nation along with him, and the United States took the lead in establishing the United Nations (UN) after the war. Roosevelt died suddenly in 1945, three months into his record fourth term, turning the government abruptly over to his vice president, Truman. The new president continued Roosevelt's internationalist policy, first with the Marshall Plan to help Europe recover from World War II and then with the development of North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and other international defense pacts. In 1950 Truman pushed for UN intervention when North Korea attacked South Korea, and soon the United States was heavily involved in an Asian war.

In domestic politics, Truman pushed an activist agenda that he called the “Fair Deal” and called for expanded enforcement of African Americans' civil rights. Running for another term in 1948, he confronted schisms within his party from two quarters: the South and the left. Displeased with Truman's civil rights plank, conservative southerners bolted the Democratic Party in 1948 and ran J. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina as the States' Rights Democratic (Dixiecrats) nominee. Under the Progressive Party banner, Henry A. Wallace (Roosevelt's vice president before Truman) also challenged the incumbent. Thurmond won four states; Wallace took none. Despite the split, Truman defeated the Republican Party's overconfident candidate Thomas E. Dewey.

After Truman left office in 1953, a Republican, Dwight D. Eisenhower, served the next two terms, but then the Democrats took back the White House in 1960, as Sen. John F. Kennedy of Massachusetts narrowly defeated Eisenhower's vice president, Richard Nixon. Kennedy's slogan, “New Frontier,” mirrored the candidate's youthfulness (he was forty-three years old when elected) as well as traditional Democratic slogans, such as Wilson's “New Freedom,” FDR's “New Deal,” and Truman's “Fair Deal.” A pivotal issue in the 1960 campaign was religion, as Kennedy's Roman Catholic faith stirred strong debate as it did for Smith in 1928. But Kennedy weathered the controversy, in part because of his strong performance in a nationally televised series of presidential debates, the first ever in the nation's history. In office, Kennedy continued the Democratic agenda of internationalism, establishing the Peace Corps and providing aid to the pro-Western regime in South Vietnam, as well as fashioning an active domestic agenda, with a massive tax cut and federal programs in housing. Kennedy made tentative moves toward an expanded role for the national government in civil rights, but he moved cautiously because of the power of southern whites within the Democratic Party.

After Kennedy's assassination in November 1963, President Lyndon B. Johnson completed much of Kennedy's “New Frontier” agenda and called for additional programs in pursuit of the “Great Society,” including a civil rights program that was termed by some a “Second Reconstruction.” Applying all the skills he had learned as Senate majority leader (the position he held before becoming Kennedy's vice president), Johnson pushed through the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Johnson's support for civil rights ended the “solid South” as a Democratic stronghold. In 1964 Johnson won a full term in a landslide. Carrying all but six states, he took 61.1 percent of the popular vote, the largest share of the vote won by any presidential candidate in the nation's history. The Deep South, however, supported the Republican nominee, Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona, who had opposed the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and had flirted with the ultraright John Birch Society and segregationist White Citizens' Councils. Johnson's mandate enabled him to win passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, further solidifying Democratic support among African Americans although further undermining Democratic power among white southerners.

But the first two years of the Johnson presidency proved to be its high-water mark. As the president steadily expanded U.S. involvement in an increasingly unpopular war in Vietnam, the Democratic Party split openly. Johnson decided against running for reelection in 1968, while two antiwar senators, Robert F. Kennedy of New York, brother of the slain president, and Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota, mounted a dramatic duel for the nomination in scattered primaries across the nation that spring. But Kennedy was assassinated the night he won the California primary in early June, and McCarthy lacked the strength among party insiders to make a serious bid for the nomination at the Democratic convention in August. Held in Chicago, it was marred by police violence against antiwar demonstrators in downtown Chicago and turmoil within the convention hall. Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey, who had not entered any primaries, was nominated. But he faced an uphill fight during the fall, complicated by the American Independent candidacy of George C. Wallace, former Democratic governor of Alabama. In the end, Humphrey lost narrowly to Republican Nixon.

Carter and Clinton Presidencies

Still chafing from the dissension and bossism at the 1968 convention and the subsequent loss to Nixon, the Democrats in the 1970s drastically reformed their delegate-selection and nominating rules, encouraging minority representation, dividing delegations equally between men and women, and awarding delegates to candidates in proportion to their primary votes. The party's 1972 candidate, Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota, had initially led the commission that drafted many of the reforms. The changes enhanced the role of primaries in the nominating process, leading to more primaries and fewer state caucuses.

The 1972 election was the last privately financed presidential election until 2008. Nixon raised $61.4 million versus McGovern's $21.2 million. McGovern, running as a peace candidate with a commitment to massive domestic spending, lost to Nixon in a landslide. The election-related Watergate scandal, however, drove Nixon from office two years later and brought Vice President Gerald R. Ford to the presidency. Evidence from the Watergate investigation showed that Nixon's operatives had used "dirty tricks" in the Democratic primaries to sabotage the candidacy of Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, who might have been a more formidable candidate than McGovern.

A fast start in the primaries in 1976, following Ford's unpopular full pardon of President Nixon for his criminal activities in the Watergate cover-up, helped the relatively unknown Jimmy Carter. The former Georgia governor won the Democratic nomination, then defeated incumbent Ford in the general election. Carter's primary strategy also served him in 1980, staving off a renomination challenge from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, brother of the late president. But Carter's inability to curb inflation or obtain the release of American hostages held in Iran for 444 days doomed him to a one-term presidency and to defeat at the hands of Republican Ronald Reagan.

Although the popular Reagan handily won reelection in 1984, his vice president and successor, George H. W. Bush, fell victim in 1992 to Gov. Bill Clinton of Arkansas, as Democrats returned to the White House after twelve Republican years. As a presidential candidate Clinton addressed economic worries. His advisers reminded campaign workers, "It's the economy, stupid," and the strategy worked. He was the first Democrat to win the White House without taking Texas and, with Sen. Albert "Al" Gore Jr. of Tennessee as his running mate, the first president elected on an all-South ticket since 1828.

Clinton won as a moderate, declaring that "the era of big government is over." Behind him was a modified New Deal coalition that included "Reagan Democrats," union members, women, African Americans, Hispanics, Jews, a majority of Roman Catholics, public-sector employees, and intellectuals. But Clinton's presidency got off to a rocky start. In one of his first acts he instituted a controversial "don't ask, don't tell" policy toward homosexuals in the military. His convention call for a "new covenant with the American people" never caught on as a slogan, and he and First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton failed in 1994 in an abortive attempt to reform the nation's health system. That fall, voters broke the Democratic lock on Congress, turning both chambers over to Republican control.

Two years later the electorate opted to continue a divided government, giving Clinton another four-year term in 1996 while leaving Congress in GOP hands. Although he was the first Democrat elected to a second full term since Franklin Roosevelt, Clinton again won with less than a majority of the popular vote. For the moment, Clinton's victories eased doubts that the Democrats' once-solid South had become a Republican bastion. Of the eleven states of the Old Confederacy, the Clinton-Gore ticket won four in 1992 and four in 1996. Unfortunately for the Democrats that success did not hold up four years later.

Democrats made history on various fronts from 1960 through the end of the century. In 1960 the party ran the nation's first successful Catholic presidential candidate in John Kennedy. In 1968 New York voters elected Democrat Shirley Chisholm as the first black woman member of the U.S. House, and in 1992 another Democrat, Carol Moseley Braun of Illinois, became the first black woman U.S. senator. When former vice president Walter F. Mondale chose Geraldine A. Ferraro as his running mate against Reagan in 1984, she became the first woman in U.S. history to run on a major party ticket. In 1989 L. Douglas Wilder of Virginia became the first African American to be elected a state governor. In 2000 the Democratic nominee for president, Vice President Gore, chose Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut as his running mate. This was the first time a candidate of Jewish descent was on a national ticket. Also in 2000, Hillary Rodham Clinton became the first presidential wife to seek a major elective office, a U.S. Senate seat from New York, which she won.

Nevertheless, the 2000 elections were a major disappointment for Democrats. Gore lost a close and disputed election to Republican George W. Bush, son of the former president. Moreover, the Republicans retained control of both houses of Congress, although by the narrowest of margins. Still, it gave the GOP full control of the federal government for the first time in nearly a half century and sent the Democrats to the sidelines as the loyal opposition, but with little leverage to block the GOP program much less advance their own.

In the South, the Republicans reasserted primacy, showing that this region was now the center of their party. Bush won the entire South—the eleven states of the Old Confederacy plus Kentucky and Oklahoma. Bush even won Gore's home state of Tennessee and Clinton's home state of Arkansas. The Democrats' strength was on the West and East coasts, north of Virginia, and into the industrial heartland. The GOP dominated everywhere else—a giant "L"-shaped area from the South through the Plains states and Southwest and into the Mountain states. This pattern continued to dominate in the next two years but showed signs of weakening in 2008.

Democrats gained some solace in June 2001 when Sen. James Jeffords of Vermont left the Republican Party to become an Independent, swinging control of the upper chamber to the Democrats for the rest of the 107th Congress. But the Democrats' success was short-lived, as Republicans recaptured the Senate in 2002 midterm elections and expanded their majorities in both houses of Congress in 2004.

The presidential election in 2004 proved to be a reprise of 2000. The nominating process was short for both parties. President Bush ran unopposed for the Republican nomination. Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts quickly nailed down the Democratic nomination. But in spite of a record turnout of more than 122 million voters in fall 2004—nearly 17 million more than in 2000—only three states switched party hands from four years earlier, two of them going to the Republicans. It provided Bush with a more clear-cut victory than 2000.

Democratic Resurgence: 2006–2008

The GOP successes in 2000, 2002, and 2004, combined with the Republican takeover of Congress in 1994, left analysts thinking the Democrats might become a minority party for many years. The analysis did not foresee the descent into unpopularity that awaited Bush, who had by the middle of his second term become one of the most controversial and divisive presidents in history. Most important to this decline was the continuing war in Iraq, launched in 2003, that showed no sign of ending by 2006. But Bush also continued to push other unpopular initiatives in economic and social policy.

All of this gave the Democrats the opening they needed. In 2006 their party won back control of both chambers of Congress, albeit the Senate by a single vote. That outcome helped set the stage for 2008, when the presidential race would have no incumbent. In that contest Democratic presidential nominee Barack Obama, a junior senator from Illinois, won 53 percent of popular vote to become the first African American to reach the White House. Obama won by 9.5 million votes, more than any other any nonincumbent presidential candidate. The humbled GOP also lost more seats in both houses of Congress, losing the last seat it held in New England, and being relegated largely to its redoubt in the southern states.

In the presidential election Obama won 365 electoral votes to 173 for his opponent, Sen. John McCain of Arizona. In 2008 the "L" on the electoral map remained, but in a battered form as Obama picked up a number of states in the grouping that previously were solidly Republican. Democrats controlled the coasts outside the "L," allowing Obama to campaign seriously in previously solid GOP states. With this effort, Obama won all the nineteen states that Kerry won in 2004 plus nine others that had supported Bush, such as Indiana, North Carolina, Virginia, and Colorado. When the votes were all counted, the nation had moved from a nearly even split between the parties after 2000, to a decidedly Republican leaning posture after 2004, and then to a landscape after the 2006 midterm voting and the 2008 national election that favored the Democrats.

DEMOCRATIC-REPUBLICAN PARTY (1792–1828)

The Democratic-Republican Party developed in the early 1790s as the organized opposition to the incumbent Federalists and successor to the Anti-Federalists, who were a loose alliance of elements initially opposed to the ratification of the Constitution and subsequently to the policies of the George Washington administration, which were designed to centralize power in the federal government.

Thomas Jefferson was the leader of the new party, whose members as early as 1792 referred to themselves as Republicans. This remained their primary name throughout the party's history, although in some states they became known as Democratic-Republicans, the label used frequently by historians to avoid confusing Jefferson's party with the later Republican Party, which began in 1854. Party members were called Jeffersonian Republicans as well.

The Democratic-Republicans favored states' rights, a literal interpretation of the Constitution, and expanded democracy through extension of suffrage and popular control of the government. The party was dominated by rural, agrarian interests, intent on maintaining their dominance over the growing commercial and industrial interests of the Northeast. The principal strength of the party came from states in the South and Middle Atlantic.

The Democratic-Republicans first gained control of the federal government in 1800, when Jefferson was elected president and the party won majorities in both houses of Congress. For the next twenty-four years the party controlled both the White House and Congress, the last eight years virtually without opposition. For all but four years during this twenty-four-year period, there was a Virginia–New York alliance controlling the executive branch, with all three presidents from Virginia—Jefferson, James Madison, and James Monroe—and three of the four vice presidents from New York. Lacking an opposition party, the Democratic-Republicans in the 1820s became increasingly divided. In 1824, when four party leaders ran for president, John Quincy Adams won the election in the House of Representatives, although Andrew Jackson had received more popular votes.

The deep factionalism evident in the 1824 election doomed the Democratic-Republican Party. The two-party system revived shortly thereafter with the emergence of the National Republican Party, an outgrowth of the Adams faction, and the Democratic-Republican Party, the political organization of the Jackson faction. After 1830 the Jacksonians adopted the name Democratic Party.

DIXIECRATS (STATES' RIGHTS PARTY) (1948)

The States' Rights Democratic Party was a conservative southern faction that bolted from the Democrats in 1948. The immediate reason for the new party, popularly known as the Dixiecrats, was dissatisfaction with President Harry S. Truman's civil rights program. But the Dixiecrat effort to maintain a segregated way of life was also an attempt to demonstrate the political power of the twentieth-century southern Democrats and to reestablish their importance in the Democratic Party.

The Mississippi Democratic Party's state executive committee met in Jackson, Mississippi, in May 1948 to lay the groundwork for the Dixiecrat secession. The meeting called for a bolt by southern delegates if the Democratic National Convention endorsed Truman's civil rights program. When the convention did approve a strong civil rights plank, the entire Mississippi delegation and half the Alabama delegation left the convention. Gov. Fielding L. Wright of Mississippi invited all anti-Truman delegates to meet in Birmingham, Alabama, three days after the close of the Democratic convention to select a states' rights ticket.

Most southern Democrats with something at stake—national prominence, seniority in Congress, patronage privileges—shunned the new Dixiecrat Party. The party's leaders came from the ranks of southern governors and other state and local officials. The Birmingham convention chose two governors to lead the party: J. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina for president and Wright of Mississippi for vice president.

Other than the presidential ticket, the Dixiecrats did not run candidates for any office. Rather than try to develop an independent party organization, the Dixiecrats, whenever possible, used existing Democratic Party apparatus.

The party was on the ballot in only one state outside the South and in the November election received only 1,157,326 votes (2.4 percent of the popular vote). The Thurmond ticket carried four Deep South states where it ran under the Democratic Party label, but it failed in its basic objective to prevent the reelection of President Truman.

After the election the party ceased to exist almost as abruptly as it had begun, with most of its members returning to the Democratic Party. In a statement upon reentering the Democratic fold, Thurmond characterized the Dixiecrat episode as “a fight within our family.” (While serving in the U.S. Senate sixteen years later, Thurmond switched to the Republican Party.)

FEDERALISTS (1792–1816)

Two related groups in late-eighteenth-century American politics called themselves Federalists. First were the proponents of ratifying the Constitution as framed in 1787, chief among them Alexander Hamilton and James Madison. They were successful. Next was the group that dominated national politics in the 1790s, as Americans began to form political parties.

The two groups were not identical. Madison, successful in promoting adoption of the new Constitution, led a political opposition that emerged in 1792. He, along with fellow Virginian Thomas Jefferson, argued for strict construction, or a narrow interpretation, of the powers of the new national government and organized a rival political party, the Democratic- (or Jeffersonian) Republicans, which came to power with Jefferson's election in 1800.

The Federalist Party, led by Hamilton as President George Washington's secretary of the Treasury, dominated national politics during the administrations of Washington and John Adams. The Federalists wanted to make the national government stronger by assuming state debts, chartering a national bank, and supporting manufacturing interests. In foreign affairs, they pursued policies that would protect commercial and political harmony with England, goals that led to ratification of Jay's Treaty in 1795. Under the treaty, England withdrew the last of its troops from

The Federalist Party, led by Alexander Hamilton, dominated national politics during the first two presidential administrations of George Washington and John Adams.

American outposts and the United States agreed to honor debts owed to British merchants.

Though committed to a republican form of government, Federalists believed society to be properly hierarchical. Federalists such as William Cooper of New York and Henry Knox of Massachusetts professed that politics was an arena best left to the “natural aristocracy” of wealthy and talented men. Consequently, Federalists generally sought to limit suffrage, tighten naturalization policy, and silence anti-administration opinions. Recent examinations of the Federalists have disclosed a softer side to their conservatism, showing that, as self-proclaimed protectors of society, they sometimes sought to protect the basic rights of minorities. They tended to be more sympathetic than their Jeffersonian opponents to the plight of Native Americans and African Americans and less resistant to the inclusion of women in political processes.

Federalists drew their support primarily from the Northeast, where their procommercial and promanufacturing policies attracted merchants and businesspeople. Although they had some southern strongholds in parts of Virginia and the Carolinas (especially Charleston), Federalists had considerably less success in attracting the support of western farmers and southern planters who opposed their elitism, antislavery bias, and promanufacturing economic policies.

Several factors contributed to the demise of the Federalist Party. Its passage of the highly unpopular Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798 served as a rallying cry for Jeffersonian Republicans. A more important factor may have been the Federalists' sharp division in the 1800 elections over Adams's foreign policy. Second-generation Federalists continued to mobilize regional support, mainly in New England, and, after Jefferson's unpopular embargo forbidding exports (1807–1809), they made a national comeback of sorts in the 1808 and 1812 elections. Many Federalists opposed the War of 1812, however, and in 1814 the Hartford Convention, a meeting of arch-Federalists, considered secession from the union, thereby permanently tainting the Federalist name and ending the party's legitimacy at the national level. Federalists continued to play a limited, though sometimes important, role in state and local politics into the 1820s, challenging for key offices in several states.

Federalist leadership during the nation's critical early years contributed greatly to preserving the American experiment. In large part they were responsible for laying the foundation for a national economy (later carried forward by the National Republicans and then the Whigs), a national foreign policy agenda, and creating a strong national judicial system. The last of these was perhaps the Federalists' most enduring legacy as John Marshall used his position as chief justice (1801–1835) to incorporate Federalist principles into constitutional law.

FREE SOIL PARTY (1848–1852)

Born as a result of opposition to the extension of slavery into the newly acquired southwest territories, the Free Soil Party was launched formally at a convention in Buffalo, New York, in August 1848. The Free Soilers were composed of antislavery elements from the Democratic and Whig parties as well as remnants of the Liberty Party. Representatives from all the northern states and three border states attended the Buffalo convention, where the slogan “Free Soil, Free Speech, Free Labor and Free Men” was adopted. This slogan expressed the antislavery sentiment of the Free Soilers as well as the desire for cheap western land.

Former Democratic president Martin Van Buren (1837–1841) was selected by the convention as the party's presidential candidate and Charles Francis Adams, the son of President John Quincy Adams (1825–1829), was chosen as his running mate.

In the 1848 election the Free Soil ticket received 291,501 votes (10.1 percent of the popular vote) but was unable to carry a single state. The party did better at the congressional level, winning nine House seats and holding the balance of power in the organization of the closely divided new Congress.

The 1848 election marked the peak of the party's influence. With the passage of compromise legislation on slavery in 1850, the Free Soilers lost their basic issue and began a rapid decline. The party ran its second and last national ticket in 1852, headed by John Hale, who received 155,210 votes (4.9 percent of the popular vote). As in 1848, the Free Soil national ticket failed to carry a single state.

Although the party went out of existence shortly thereafter, its program and constituency were absorbed by the Republican Party, whose birth and growth dramatically paralleled the resurgence of the slavery issue in the mid-1850s.

GREEN PARTY (1996– )

Although new to the United States, the Green Party was part of a decentralized worldwide movement for peace, social justice, and the environment. Until the collapse of international communism and the fall of the Berlin Wall, the Greens were best known for their political inroads in Germany. But the German party lost ground after opposing reunification and it only recently has returned to prominence as the junior coalition partner of Germany's left-of-center Social Democratic Party.

With famed consumer activist Ralph Nader heading its ticket, the Green Party made an impressive debut in U.S. presidential politics in 1996. Nader received 685,040 votes (0.7 percent of the popular vote) to finish fourth, albeit a distant fourth, behind the Reform Party's H. Ross Perot. Four years later, Nader made an even more impressive showing, winning 2,882,738 votes (2.7 percent of the total vote), and finished third, well ahead of other third-party candidates in the 2000 race. Nader received votes in every state except three (North Carolina, Oklahoma, and South Dakota), a significant increase from four years earlier when he was on the ballot in barely twenty states. As before, Nader ran best in New England and the West. As in 1996, his running mate in 2000 was Winona LaDuke of the White Earth reservation in Minnesota. A Harvard graduate, LaDuke was active as an advocate and writer on human rights and Native American environmental causes.

Unlike four years earlier, however, Nader and LaDuke in 2000 ran an aggressive and active campaign. Nader took his populist, anticorporate campaign to a variety of venues, ranging from TV studios to union meetings, in a bid to put together what he described as a “blue-green” coalition of disaffected voters. Nader was on the ballot in a number of closely contested states but most were won by the Democratic nominee, Al Gore, who was seen by analysts as the candidate most likely to be hurt by Nader's presence in the contest. Of these states, none was more important than Florida. In that state, Nader took more than 97,400 votes in a contest decided by a few hundred in favor of Republican George W. Bush. That win put Bush over the top in electoral votes and gave the White House back to the Republicans. Some political observers thought that had Nader not been on the ticket, Gore would have won Florida and the White House. However, some analysts believed that a conservative candidate, Patrick J. Buchanan, who ran on the Reform Party ticket, drew enough votes in several states to probably give those states to Gore, assuming that most of the Buchanan voters would have supported Bush rather than Gore. Had Buchanan not been running Bush had a plausible chance to win those states, giving him a solid electoral college majority, which would have made the Florida contest moot. In 2004 Nader ran again for president, but as an independent. He sought the endorsement of the Green Party, although not its nomination. At their convention in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in June, the Greens nominated a party activist, David Cobb of Texas, rather than endorse Nader's "no nomination" strategy. Patricia La Marche of Maine was chosen as Cobb's running mate.

The separate tickets did not turn out well for either candidate. Nader and his running mate, Peter Camejo of California, failed to make the ballot in almost one-third of the states and polled less than 500,000 votes nationwide. The Green Party ticket drew 119,859 votes and fell from third in the popular vote standings in 2000 to sixth in 2004.

In 2008 the Green Party turned to another set of candidates, but the result was about the same. Their presidential candidate was Cynthia A. McKinney, a former Democratic representative from Georgia. Her running mate was Rosa Clemente, of New York. The party was on the ballot in thirty-nine states and the District of Columbia, drawing 161,313 votes. The total was about a third better but still left the party in sixth place among third parties that year.

GREENBACK PARTY (1874–1884)

The National Independent or Greenback-Labor Party, commonly known as the Greenback Party, was launched in Indianapolis in November 1874 at a meeting organized by the Indiana Grange. The party grew out of the Panic of 1873, a post-Civil War economic depression, which hit farmers and industrial workers particularly hard. Currency was the basic issue of the new party, which opposed a return to the gold standard and favored retention of the inflationary paper money (known as greenbacks), first introduced as an emergency measure during the Civil War.

In the 1876 presidential election the party ran Peter Cooper, a New York philanthropist, and drafted a platform that focused entirely on the currency issue. Cooper received 75,973 votes (0.9 percent of the popular vote), mainly from agrarian voters. Aided by the continuing depression, a Greenback national convention in 1878 effected the merger of the party with various labor reform groups and adopted a platform that addressed labor and currency issues. Showing voting strength in the industrial East as well as in the agrarian South and Midwest, the Greenbacks polled more than one million votes in the 1878 congressional elections and won fourteen seats in the U.S. House of Representatives. This marked the high point of the party's strength.

Returning prosperity, the prospect of fusion with one of the major parties, and a split between the party's agrarian and labor leadership served to undermine the Greenback Party. In the 1880 election the party elected only eight representatives and its presidential candidate, Rep. James B. Weaver of Iowa, received 305,997 votes (3.3 percent of the popular vote), far less than party leaders expected.

The party slipped further four years later, when the Greenbacks' candidate for president, former Massachusetts governor Benjamin F. Butler, received 175,096 votes (1.7 percent of the popular vote). With the demise of the Greenbacks, most of the party's constituency moved into the Populist Party, the agrarian reform movement that swept the South and Midwest in the 1890s.

KNOW NOTHING (AMERICAN) PARTY (1856)

The Know Nothing (or American) Party of the 1850s was the most formidable nativist political organization in American history; for two years in middle of that decade it was the nation's second-largest party. Nativism involved the fear of aliens and opposition to an internal minority believed to be un-American. Members of the American Party would be called Know Nothings because when asked about their organization they were instructed to say, "I know nothing." For them, fear and hatred of Catholics, particularly "papist conspirators," created this need for secrecy.

The Know Nothings emerged from one of the many nativist secret societies proliferating in the pre-Civil War period. The migration of millions of Catholics from Ireland and Germany stimulated an intense anti-alien activism in the United States. Key leaders of the Order of the Star Spangled Banner saw their group as a useful instrument for shaping a new political party in 1853. Like nativists of earlier decades, leaders of the Know Nothing Party accused Catholics of undermining the public school system and of being responsible for a host of social problems accompanying the influx of so many poverty-stricken newcomers into the great port cities.

The party emerged at a critical moment in U.S. political history. The slavery controversy was ripping apart the Whig Party, and the Democratic Party was suffering fissures in different states and sections. Out of this turmoil came a flood of members to the new nativist movement. For many people, a party organized around nativist themes—one that advanced “American” interests and stood for stability and union—offered a way out of the conflict between northern and southerner, abolitionist and slaveholder. A common crusade against foreigners, they thought, could cement broken institutions and warring people.

The political divisions of the day meant that Know Nothing membership varied from section to section. In New York, where the party was born and had its strongest support, the leadership was composed of conservative Whig refugees, men who opposed free soil and antislavery elements in their former party. These included James Barker and Daniel Ullmann, the party candidate in the New York gubernatorial race in 1855. In New England the antislavery wing of the former Whig Party, “Conscience Whigs,” played the key role. Leaders in Massachusetts included Henry Wilson, president of the state senate who was a U.S. senator in 1855, and Henry J. Gardner, elected governor in the Know Nothing landslide that year. Also swelling the party rolls in New England were abolitionists from the other major party, anti-Nebraska Act Democrats.

In the Midwest, where Know Nothings struggled to find support, nativists sought fusion with “Free Soil” activists in Indiana and Illinois, but in Wisconsin two factions (the Sams and the Jonathans) shared anti-alien attitudes yet split over slavery.

In the South, which contained a small immigrant population, nativism appealed to those who viewed “aliens” in the North as threatening to the southern way of life because it was assumed that newcomers would be opposed to slavery. The nativist party in the South represented an escape from the divisive struggle that threatened civil strife, but it had only limited impact.

Despite its political success in 1854 and 1855, the national Know Nothing Party could not survive the anti-slavery controversy. At the party gathering in Philadelphia in June 1855, a proslavery resolution led to wild debate and a massive defection led by Massachusetts nativists but including representatives from many other states. Further divisions in the party, including personal rivalries between New York leaders Barker and Ullmann, created more problems.

In 1856 the party nominated former president Millard Fillmore as its presidential candidate. But Fillmore—who had joined a Know Nothing lodge as a political maneuver and had never been a real nativist—failed at the polls, trailing in a three-way race with only 22 percent of the popular vote and taking only Maryland’s eight electoral college votes. The Know Nothings did not recover, losing members rapidly in subsequent months. In 1857 the party held its last national council.

LIBERAL PARTY (1944– )

New York State’s Liberal Party was founded in 1944 by anti-communist trade unionists and other politically liberal individuals who left communist-dominated political parties. Many of the state’s labor and educational leaders were instrumental in creating the party, which for years billed itself as the nation’s “longest existing third party.” Yet by failing to win enough votes in the state’s gubernatorial election in 2002, the Liberals lost their automatic ballot status, although voters could continue to register as Liberals in declaring their party affiliation.

The Liberal Party has played a major role in a number of New York elections. It provided crucial support for Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1944 and John F. Kennedy in 1960. Some political historians believe Roosevelt and Kennedy owed their national victories to the Liberal Party vote that carried New York for them. John Lindsay, nominally a Republican, won reelection in New York City’s 1969 mayoral race as the Liberal Party candidate. In 2000 Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton won the Liberal line in her campaign for the U.S. Senate, although the party continued to maintain its independence, describing itself in 2000 as an “alternative to a state Democratic Party dominated by local party machines rife with corruption and a Republican Party controlled by special interests.”

The party proclaims to nominate candidates on the basis of “merit, independence, and progressive viewpoints.” Many of the state’s most prominent liberal politicians have sought and won the party’s nomination for New York City mayor, governor, and U.S. senator, regardless of their major party affiliation. When the party has not run candidates of its own, it has usually been supportive of Democrats. Sometimes, however, the party’s role has been that of a spoiler, particularly in close races, where its support represents the balance of power. In modern Senate races, for example, political analysts say Liberal Party endorsement of moderate or liberal candidates has sometimes drawn enough votes from Democratic candidates to throw the election to conservative Republicans.

The party is active in pushing its political agenda, which supports abortion rights, universal health care, and public education (it has aggressively opposed school voucher programs, for example). Its successful Supreme Court suit for congressional reapportionment contributed to the 1968 election of Shirley Chisholm of New York, the first African American woman elected to the House of Representatives.

Through the latter part of the twentieth century, the Liberal Party served as a counterweight in Empire State politics to New York’s Conservative Party. In 1966, for instance, each party’s gubernatorial candidate drew over a half million votes. The Liberal nominee was Franklin D. Roosevelt Jr.

Both parties have lost ground at the polls since then, the Liberals a bit more than the Conservatives (which have retained automatic ballot status). New York party enrollment figures in April 2005 showed the Conservatives with 156,186 registered voters, the Liberals with less than half as many (73,554).

LIBERAL REPUBLICAN PARTY (1872)

A faction of the Republican Party, dissatisfied with President Ulysses S. Grant’s first term in office, withdrew from the party in 1872 to form a new party. Composed of party reformers, as well as anti-Grant politicians and newspaper editors, the new party focused on the corruption of the Grant administration and the need for civil service reform and for an end to the Reconstruction policy in the South.

The call for the Liberal Republican national convention came from the state party in Missouri, the birthplace of the reform movement. The convention, meeting in Cincinnati, Ohio, in May 1872, nominated Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune, for president and Missouri governor B. Gratz Brown as his running mate. Greeley, the choice of anti-Grant politicians but suspect among reformers, was not popular among many Democrats either, who recalled his longtime criticism of the Democratic Party.

With the hope of victory in the fall election, however, the Democratic National Convention, meeting in July, endorsed the Liberal Republican ticket and platform. The coalition was an unsuccessful one, as many Democrats refused to vote for Greeley. He received 2,834,761 votes (43.8 percent of the popular vote) but carried only six states and lost to Grant by more than 750,000 votes out of nearly 6.5 million cast. Greeley died shortly after the election.

Underfinanced, poorly organized, and dependent on the Democrats for their success, the Liberal Republicans ceased to exist after the 1872 election.

LIBERTARIAN PARTY (1971– )

In the brief period of four years, 1972 to 1976, the Libertarian Party leaped from a fledgling organization on the presidential ballot in only two states to the nation’s largest third party. They have largely retained that status ever since, when measured in terms of quantity of federal and nonfederal candidates and success in ballot access.

Individual responsibility and minimal government interference are the hallmarks of the Libertarian philosophy. The party has favored repeal of laws against so-called victimless crimes—such as pornography, drug use, and homosexual activity—the abolition of all federal police agencies, and the elimination of all government subsidies to private enterprise. In foreign and military affairs, the Libertarians have advocated the removal of U.S. troops from abroad, a cut in the defense budget, and the emergence of the United States as a “giant Switzerland,” with no international treaty obligations. Libertarians also have favored repeal of legislation that they believe hinders individual or corporate action. They have opposed gun control, civil rights laws, price controls on oil and gas, labor protection laws, federal welfare and poverty programs, forced busing, compulsory education, Social Security, national medical care, and federal land-use restrictions.

Formed in Colorado in 1971, the party nominated John Hospers of California for president in 1972. On the ballot only in Colorado and Washington, Hospers garnered 3,673 votes (including write-in votes from other states). But he received a measure of national attention when a Republican presidential elector from Virginia, Roger MacBride, cast his electoral vote for the Libertarian presidential nominee.

MacBride’s action made him a hero in Libertarian circles, and the party chose him as its 1976 standard-bearer at its August 1975 convention in New York City. MacBride had served in the Vermont legislature in the 1960s and was defeated for the Republican gubernatorial nomination in that state in 1964. In the 1970s he settled on a farm near Charlottesville, Virginia, and devoted himself to writing and party affairs. He was cocreator of the television show Little House on the Prairie.

Making a major effort in 1976, the Libertarians got on the ballot in thirty-two states, more than Eugene J. McCarthy—who ran independent of any political party—or any other third-party candidate that year. The reward was a vote of 173,011, more than for any other minor party candidate but far below McCarthy's total and only 0.2 percent of the national vote. MacBride's strength was centered in the West; he received 5.5 percent of the vote in Alaska and 1 percent or more in Arizona, Hawaii, and Idaho. He also ran well ahead of his national average in California (0.7 percent) and Nevada (0.8 percent). His running mate was David P. Bergland, a California lawyer.

In 1980 the Libertarian Party appeared on the ballot in all fifty states and the District of Columbia for the first time. The party also fielded about 550 candidates for other offices, a number that dwarfed other third-party efforts. The party nominees, Edward E. Clark of California for president and David Koch of New York for vice president, garnered 921,299 votes or 1.1 percent of the vote nationwide. It was the highest vote total obtained by the Libertarian national ticket to date and would have been higher if not for the fact that the independent candidacy of John Anderson dominated media attention in 1980 that did not go to the two major parties. As in previous elections, the major support for the Libertarians came from western states.

Of all third-party presidential candidates running in 1984, the Libertarians appeared on the greatest number of ballots: thirty-eight states and the District of Columbia. David Bergland, who had run in 1976 for the second slot, was the party's presidential candidate, and Jim Lewis, a Connecticut business executive, his running mate. The ticket, though, received only 228,314 votes, less than one-fourth the number the Libertarians had garnered four years earlier. In 1988 the Libertarian presidential and vice-presidential nominees—Ron Paul (a Republican House member from Texas before and after he was a Libertarian) and Andre V. Marrou, respectively—were on the ballot in all fifty-one jurisdictions save four and received 432,179 votes.

In 1992 Nevada real estate broker Marrou was the presidential nominee with running mate Nancy Lord, a lawyer from Georgia. The pair was on the ballot in all states and the District of Columbia and had a campaign budget of $1 million. Marrou received 291,627 votes in a fourth-place finish behind H. Ross Perot, who stole most of the third-party candidates' thunder that year. The Libertarians maintained their strong base in the West, especially in California, Nevada, and Hawaii, where they also ran candidates in 1992 for most House seats.

In 1996 the Libertarians regained voting strength but nevertheless dropped to fifth place in the presidential race behind Perot and Ralph Nader of the newly formed Green Party. The Libertarian candidate, financial analyst Harry Browne of Tennessee, and running mate, Jo Anne Jorgensen of South Carolina, drew 485,798 votes or 0.5 percent of the total. It was the party's best showing since 1980.

The Libertarian result in the 2000 presidential race was similar but not as favorable. The party won votes in forty-nine states, but its candidates, again Browne and running mate Art Olivier of California, won just 386,024 votes, or 0.4 percent of all votes, down 20 percent from four years earlier.

The Libertarians fielded a new ticket in 2004, headed by computer programmer and constitutional scholar Michael Badnarik of Texas, with Richard Campagna of Iowa as his running mate. But the results were largely the same, with the Libertarian national ticket collecting roughly 400,000 ballots. In 2008 Bob Barr, a Texas representative, was the party's presidential nominee, joined by Wayne Allyn Root of Nevada as the vice-presidential candidate. As before, it had a national presence and received 532,432 votes, second among third-party efforts to Ralph Nader who ran as an independent. The Barr-Root ticket was on the ballot in forty-five states, missing only Connecticut, Louisiana, Maine, Oklahoma, West Virginia, and the District of Columbia.

Yet while the Libertarians have yet to score a big breakthrough at the ballot box, they remain a role model for other third parties in their ability to get their candidates on the ballot. Party candidates have been listed in most states and the District of Columbia in both presidential and midterm elections for many years. The party brings in dozens of Libertarian candidates for other offices across the country as well, typically winning more than one million votes in U.S. House contests alone.

LIBERTY PARTY (1839–1848)

Born in 1839, the Liberty Party was the product of a split in the antislavery movement between a faction led by William Lloyd Garrison that favored action outside the political process and a second led by James G. Birney that proposed action within the political system through the establishment of an independent antislavery party. The Birney faction launched the Liberty Party in November 1839. The following April a national convention with delegates from six states nominated Birney for the presidency.

Although the Liberty Party was the first political party to take an antislavery position, and the only one at the time to do so, most abolitionist voters in the 1840 election supported the Democratic or Whig presidential candidates. Birney received only 6,797 votes (0.3 percent of the popular vote).

Aided by the controversy over the annexation of slaveholding Texas, the Liberty Party's popularity increased in 1844. Birney, again the party's presidential nominee, received 62,103 votes (2.3 percent of the popular vote) but again, as in 1840, carried no states. The peak strength of the party was reached two years later in 1846, when in various state elections Liberty Party candidates received 74,017 votes.

In October 1847 the party nominated Sen. John P. Hale of New Hampshire for the presidency, but his candidacy was withdrawn the following year when the Liberty Party joined the broader-based Free Soil Party.

NATIONAL DEMOCRATIC PARTY (1896)

A conservative faction in favor of the gold standard, the National Democrats bolted the Democratic Party after the 1896 convention adopted a prosilver platform and nominated William Jennings Bryan for president. With the nation in the midst of a depression and the Populists in the agrarian Midwest and South demanding monetary reform, currency was the dominant issue of the 1896 campaign. This produced a brief realignment in U.S. politics.

The Republican Party was controlled by leaders who favored maintenance of the gold standard, a noninflationary currency. Agrarian midwestern and southern Democrats, reflecting a populist philosophy, gained control of the Democratic Party in 1896 and committed it to the free coinage of silver, an inflationary currency demanded by rural elements threatened by debts. The Democrats attracted prosilver bolters from the Republican Party, but gold standard Democrats, opposed to the Republicans' protectionist position on the tariff issue, established an independent party.

Meeting in Indianapolis, Indiana, in September 1896, the National Democrats adopted a platform favoring maintenance of the gold standard and selected a ticket headed by seventy-nine-year-old Illinois senator John M. Palmer. Democratic president Grover Cleveland and leading members of his administration, repudiated by the convention that chose Bryan, supported the National Democrats. During the campaign the National Democrats encouraged conservative Democrats to vote either for the National Democratic ticket or for the Republican candidate, William McKinley. The Palmer ticket received 133,435 votes (1.0 percent of the popular vote), and McKinley defeated Bryan.

In the late 1890s returning prosperity and the Spanish-American War overshadowed the currency issue, and the intense Democratic Party factionalism that produced the National Democratic Party faded.

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN PARTY (1828–1832)

The Democratic-Republican Party splintered after the 1824 election into two factions. The group led by Andrew Jackson retained the name Democratic-Republicans, which eventually was shortened to Democrats; the other faction, headed by President John Quincy Adams, assumed the name National Republicans. The new party supported a protective tariff, the Bank of the United States, federal administration of public lands, and national programs of internal improvements. But Adams's belief in a strong national government contrasted with the period's prevailing mood of populism and states' rights.

The Adams's forces controlled Congress for two years, 1825 to 1827, but as party structures formalized the National Republicans became a minority in Congress and suffered a decisive loss in the 1828 presidential election. Running for reelection, Adams was beaten by Jackson. Adams received 43.6 percent of the popular vote and carried eight states, none in the South. Henry Clay, the party's candidate against Jackson four years later, had even less success. He received only 37.4 percent of the popular vote and carried just six states, none of which, again, were in the South.

Poorly organized, with dwindling support and a heritage of defeat, the National Republicans went out of existence after the 1832 election, but their members provided the base for a new anti-Jackson party, the Whigs, which came into being in 1834.

NATIONAL UNITY PARTY (INDEPENDENT JOHN B. ANDERSON) (1980–1988)

Republican representative John B. Anderson of Illinois formed the National Unity Campaign as the vehicle for his independent presidential campaign in 1980. Anderson began his quest for the presidency by trying to win the Republican Party nomination. But as a moderate in a party becoming more and more conservative, he won no primaries and could claim only fifty-seven convention delegates by April 1980, when he withdrew from the Republican race and declared his independent candidacy.

Anderson focused his campaign on the need to establish a viable third party as an alternative to domination of the political scene by the Republican and Democratic parties. The National Unity Campaign platform touted the Anderson program as a "new public philosophy"—more innovative than that of the Democrats, who "cling to the policies of the New Deal," and more enlightened than that of the Republicans, who talk "incessantly about freedom, but hardly ever about justice." Generally, the Anderson campaign took positions that were fiscally conservative and socially liberal. He and his running mate, former Democratic governor Patrick J. Lucey of Wisconsin, tried to appeal to Republican and Democratic voters disenchanted with their parties and to the growing bloc of voters who classified themselves as independents.

The National Unity Campaign ticket was on the ballot in all fifty states in 1980, although Anderson had to wage costly legal battles in some states to ensure that result. In the end, the party won 6.6 percent of the presidential vote, more than the 5 percent necessary to qualify for retroactive federal campaign funding.

In April 1984 Anderson announced that he would not seek the presidency again. He said that instead he would focus his energies on building the National Unity Party, which he had established officially in December 1983. He planned to concentrate initially on running candidates at the local level. In August Anderson endorsed Walter F. Mondale, the Democratic nominee for president, and his running mate, Geraldine A. Ferraro.

The National Unity Party did not run a presidential candidate in the 1988 race and by 1992 was no longer a political party.

NATURAL LAW PARTY (1992–2004)

The Natural Law Party ran three presidential campaigns from 1992 to 2000, with John Hagelin of Iowa the party's standard-bearer each time. He drew 39,179 votes in 1992, 113,668 in 1996, and 83,520 in 2000. In the latter year Hagelin sought to broaden the scope of his campaign by challenging Patrick J. Buchanan for the Reform Party nomination. Losing that contest, Hagelin and his Reform Party supporters set up a splinter Reform Party that later joined in coalition with the Natural Law Party.

Hagelin, a Harvard-trained quantum physicist, was born in Pittsburgh in 1954 and grew up in Connecticut. He became associated with Maharishi International University in Iowa in 1983. His running mate on the Natural Law Party ticket in 1992 and 1996 was fellow Maharishi scientist Mike Tompkins, a Harvard graduate and specialist in crime prevention programs. In 2000, Hagelin was joined on the ticket by Nat Goldhaber of California.

The Natural Law Party once described itself as “the fastest growing grassroots party,” standing for the environment, education, economic growth, job creation, and lower taxes. Despite its title, the party seemed to have little connection with the philosophic concept of natural law, which holds that some rules of society—such as the prohibition against murder—are so basic and inherent that they must be obeyed whether or not they are legislated. Hagelin and the party advocated prevention-oriented government and meditative, tension-relieving programs “designed to bring national life into harmony with natural law.”

Hagelin was on the ballot in thirty-eight states in 2000. Because the Natural Law Party fulfilled the necessary requirements, it was assured automatic ballot access in ten states in the next presidential election. However, in April 2004 the party announced that it was closing its national headquarters and focusing its efforts on a new nonelectoral entity, the U.S. Peace Government, dedicated to creating permanent peace in the United States and the world.

NEW ALLIANCE PARTY (1988–1992)

The New Alliance Party formed in the late 1980s to promote a combination of minority interests. Self-described as “black-led, multiracial, pro-gay and pro-socialist,” the party aggressively filed lawsuits to attain ballot access. In 1988 presidential candidate Lenora B. Fulani, a New York psychologist, drew 217,219 votes nationwide for a fourth-place finish. Her best showing was in the District of Columbia, where she received more than 1 percent of the vote.

In 1992, with the party qualifying for $1.8 million in federal matching funds, Fulani ran again, this time with California teacher Maria Munoz as a running mate. Fulani campaigned for equal employment for all. “I believe that a job at a union wage is the right of all Americans,” she said. The New Alliance ticket appeared on the ballot in thirty-nine states and the District of Columbia and received 73,714 votes, slightly less than 0.1 percent nationwide.

PEACE AND FREEDOM PARTY (1967–)

Although founded in Michigan, the radical Peace and Freedom Party has been active largely in California—the only state where it appeared on the ballot in 2004. From the outset, the party worked with the California Black Panther Party to oppose U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War and espouse black nationalism and other so-called New Left causes. The first Peace and Freedom nominee for president, in 1968, was Black Panther leader Eldridge Cleaver. Running with various vice-presidential candidates, Cleaver received 36,563 votes.

Cleaver's autobiographical, antiracist polemic, Soul on Ice, was published in 1968. After the election Cleaver, a paroled convict awaiting trial for murder, went into exile. On his return years later, he became a born-again Christian.

Before the 1968 election, black activist-comedian Dick Gregory broke with the Peace and Freedom Party and set up the similarly named Freedom and Peace Party with himself as the presidential nominee. He received 47,133 votes.

After 1968 no Peace and Freedom candidate attracted significant numbers of presidential votes until 1980, when Maureen Smith and Elizabeth Barron received 18,116. In 1972, however, noted pacifist and pediatrician Benjamin Spock, the People's Party nominee, ran under the Peace and Freedom banner in California. He received 55,167 votes there and 23,589 votes in other states.

In 1974 the California Peace and Freedom Party declared itself to be socialist. In recent elections its presidential ticket has received at least 10,000 votes: 1988, Herbert Lewin and Vikki Murdock, 10,370; 1992, Ron Daniels and Asiba Tupahache, 27,961; 1996, Marsha Feinland and Kate McClatchy, 25,332; and 2004, Leonard Peltier and Janice Jordan, 27,607. In subsequent years the party did not run a presidential candidate.

PEOPLE'S PARTY (1971– )

Delegates from activist and peace groups established the People's Party at a November 1971 convention held in Dallas, Texas. The initial cochairmen were pediatrician Benjamin Spock and author Gore Vidal.

The People's Party first ran a presidential candidate in 1972. They chose Spock for president and black activist Julius Hobson of Washington, D.C., for vice president. Despite hopes for widespread backing from the poor and social activists, the ticket received only 78,756 votes, 0.1 percent of the national total, with 55,167 of those votes from California alone.

At its convention, held in St. Louis, Missouri, August 31, 1975, the People's Party chose black civil rights activist Margaret Wright of California for president and Maggie Kuhn of Pennsylvania, a leader in the Gray Panthers movement for rights for the elderly, for vice president. Kuhn, however, declined the nomination and was replaced on the ticket by Spock.

The party platform focused on cutting the defense budget, closing tax loopholes, and making that money available for social programs. Other planks included redistribution of land and wealth, unconditional amnesty for war objectors, and free health care. In her campaign, Wright stressed the necessity for active participation by citizens in the governmental process, so that institutions and programs could be run from the grass roots up rather than from the top down.

As in 1972, the party's main backing came from California, where it was supported by the state Peace and Freedom Party. Wright's total national vote in 1976 was 49,024, and 85.1 percent (41,731 votes) of those votes came from California. The party has not fielded a presidential candidate since 1976.

POPULIST (PEOPLE'S) PARTY (1891–1908)

The Populist (or People's) Party, a third party founded in May 1891 in Cincinnati, Ohio, grew out of a period of agrarian revolt and remained politically active until 1908. Following the Civil War, farmers battled falling commodity prices, high railroad rates, and heavy mortgage debt. The Patrons of Husbandry (the Grange), organized in 1867 by Oliver Kelley, began as a group intent on improving educational and social opportunities for farmers and their families but soon adopted economic and political initiatives such as the cooperative movement of the 1870s. The inability of the Grange to give farmers an effective political voice led many Grangers in the 1880s to join the Farmers' Alliance, a precursor to the Populist Party. More aggressive and politically oriented, the Farmers' Alliance considered all agricultural problems as economic and pursued remedies such as political education and cooperative marketing, particularly in the South, as a means to break the grip of merchants who extended credit through crop liens.

Women, while active members, held far fewer offices in the Farmers' Alliance than those in the Grange. Existing racial prejudices led to the separate creation of a Colored Farmers' National Alliance in 1888.

In June 1890 Kansas farmers founded the People's Party based on the Southern Alliance platform, which included government ownership of railroads, free and unlimited coinage of silver, and a subtreasury (a system by which farmers could turn over a staple crop to a government warehouse and receive a loan for 80 percent of its value at 2 percent interest per month). As a national third party in 1891, the Populists also sought a farmer-laborer political coalition that championed the belief, expressed by Minnesota Populist Ignatius Donnelly, that the "public good is paramount to private interests."

For a time, the party attempted to bridge the racial gulf and recruited black farmers as well as white. Populism in the South, however, became mired in the volatility of race, epitomized by Georgia's Tom Watson and South Carolina's Benjamin Tillman. Although not immune to the negative racial and ethnic overtones of the period, the Populist Party was nevertheless more concerned with achieving economic reforms, a humane industrial society, and a just polity than it was with attacking cultural issues. The party's greatest support came from white land-owning cotton farmers in the South and wheat farmers in the West.

The Populists rallied behind a policy of monetary inflation in the expectation that it would increase the amount of currency in circulation, boost commodity prices, and ease farmers' indebtedness. In 1892, when the People's Party nominated James B. Weaver of Iowa as its presidential candidate, its demands included a graduated income tax, antitrust regulations, public ownership of railroads, and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at a ratio of sixteen to one. But Democrat Grover Cleveland was elected to a second term, with Weaver carrying only four states in the West. In 1896 the Populists nominated William Jennings Bryan, a free-silver candidate from Nebraska who was also the Democratic nominee, but the Republicans won with William McKinley.

Having lost on the silver issue and having lost their identity through a "fusion" with the Democrats, the Populists declined in strength and influence, particularly as new discoveries of gold eased the monetary crisis and agricultural conditions improved. Although the People's Party receded, some of the reforms it had championed, including a graduated income tax, were instituted during the Progressive era. The Populists' main significance lay in their visionary use of politics to turn a spotlight on the conditions facing farm families and thereby seek more democratic reform measures.

PROGRESSIVE (BULL MOOSE) PARTY (1912)

A split in Republican ranks, spurred by the bitter personal and ideological dispute between President William Howard Taft (1909–1913) and former president Theodore Roosevelt (1901–1909), resulted in the withdrawal of the Roosevelt forces from the Republican Party after the June 1912 GOP convention and the creation of the Progressive Party two months later. The new party was known popularly as the Bull Moose Party, a name resulting from Roosevelt's assertion early in the campaign that he felt as fit as a bull moose. While the Taft-Roosevelt split was the immediate reason for the new party, the Bull Moosers were an outgrowth of the Progressive movement that was a powerful force in both major parties in the early years of the twentieth century.

Roosevelt had handpicked Taft as his successor in 1908. But his disillusionment with Taft's conservative philosophy came quickly, and with the support of progressive Republicans Roosevelt challenged the incumbent for the 1912 Republican presidential nomination. Roosevelt outpolled Taft in nine of the ten presidential primaries where the two went head to head. Taft nevertheless won the nomination with nearly solid support in the South and among party conservatives, providing the narrow majority of delegates that enabled him to win the bulk of the key credentials challenges.

Although few Republican politicians followed Roosevelt in his bolt, the new party demonstrated a popular base at its convention in Chicago in August 1912. Thousands of delegates, basically middle- and upper-class reformers from small towns and cities, attended the convention that launched the party and nominated Roosevelt for president and California governor Hiram Johnson as his running mate. Roosevelt appeared in person to deliver his "Confession of Faith," a speech detailing his nationalistic philosophy and progressive reform ideas. The Bull Moose platform reflected key tenets of the Progressive movement, calling for more extensive government antitrust action and for labor, social, government, and electoral reform.

Roosevelt was wounded in an assassination attempt while campaigning in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in October, but he finished the campaign. In the general election Roosevelt received more than 4 million votes (27.4 percent of the popular vote) and carried six states. His percentage of the vote was the highest ever received by a third-party candidate in U.S. history, but his candidacy split the Republican vote and enabled the Democratic nominee, Woodrow Wilson, to win the election. The Progressive Party had minimal success at the state and local levels, winning thirteen House seats but electing no senators or governors.

Roosevelt declined the Progressive nomination in 1916 and endorsed the Republican candidate, Charles Evans Hughes. With the defection of its leader, the decline of the Progressive movement, and the lack of an effective party organization, the Bull Moose Party ceased to exist.

PROGRESSIVE PARTY (La FOLLETTE) (1924)

Similar to the Bull Moose Party of Theodore Roosevelt, the Progressive Party that emerged in the mid-1920s was a reform effort led by a Republican. Wisconsin senator Robert M. La Follette led the new Progressive Party, a separate entity from the Bull Moosers, which, unlike the middle- and upper-class Roosevelt party of the previous decade, had its greatest appeal among farmers and organized labor.

The La Follette Progressive Party grew out of the Conference for Progressive Political Action (CPPA), a coalition of railway union leaders and a remnant of the Bull Moose effort that was formed in 1922. The Socialist Party joined the coalition the following year. Throughout 1923 the Socialists and labor unions argued over whether their coalition should form a third party, with the Socialists in favor and the labor unions against it. It was finally decided to run an independent presidential candidate, La Follette, in the 1924 election but not to field candidates at the state and local levels. La Follette was given the power to choose his running mate and selected Montana senator Burton K. Wheeler, a Democrat.

Opposition to corporate monopolies was the major issue of the La Follette campaign, although the party advocated various other reforms, particularly aimed at farmers and workers, which were proposed earlier by either the Populists or Bull Moosers. But the Progressive Party itself was a major issue in the 1924 campaign, as the Republicans attacked the alleged radicalism of the party.

Although La Follette had its endorsement, the American Federation of Labor (AFL) provided minimal support. The basic strength of the Progressives, as with that of the Populists in the 1890s, derived from agrarian voters west of the Mississippi River. La Follette received 4,832,532 votes (16.6 percent of the popular vote) but carried just one state, his native Wisconsin. When La Follette died in 1925, the party collapsed as a national force. It was revived for a time by La Follette's sons on a statewide level in Wisconsin in the mid-1930s.

PROGRESSIVE PARTY (WALLACE) (1948)

Henry A. Wallace's Progressive Party resulted from the dissatisfaction of liberal elements in the Democratic Party with the leadership of President Harry S. Truman, particularly in the realm of foreign policy. The Progressive Party was one of two bolting groups from the Democratic Party in 1948; conservative southern elements withdrew to form the States' Rights Party.

Wallace, the founder of the Progressive Party, was secretary of agriculture, vice president, and finally secretary of commerce under President Franklin D. Roosevelt. He carried a reputation as one of the most liberal idealists in the Roosevelt administration. Fired from the Truman cabinet in 1946 after breaking with administration policy and publicly advocating peaceful coexistence with the Soviet Union, Wallace began to consider the idea of a liberal third-party candidacy. Supported by the American Labor Party, the Progressive Citizens of America, and other progressive organizations in California and Illinois, Wallace announced his third-party candidacy in December 1947.

The Progressive Party was launched formally the following July at a convention in Philadelphia, which ratified the selection of Wallace for president and Sen. Glen H. Taylor, D-Idaho, as his running mate. The party adopted a platform that emphasized foreign policy—opposing the cold war anticommunism of the Truman administration and specifically urging abandonment of the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan. These measures were designed to contain the spread of communism and bolster noncommunist nations. On domestic issues the Progressives stressed humanitarian concerns and equal rights for both sexes and all races.

Representatives of women, youth, African Americans, Jews, and Hispanic Americans were active in the new party. But the openness of the Progressives brought Wallace a damaging endorsement from the Communist Party. Believing the two parties could work together, Wallace accepted the endorsement while characterizing his philosophy as “progressive capitalism.”

In 1948 the Progressives appeared on the presidential ballot in forty-five states, but the Communist endorsement helped keep the party on the defensive the entire campaign. In the November election Wallace received only 1,157,326 votes (2.4 percent of the national popular vote), with nearly half of the votes from the state of New York. Not only were the Progressives unable to carry a single state, but President Truman won reelection. The Progressives had poor results in the congressional races as well, failing to elect a single representative or senator.

The Progressive Party's opposition to the Korean War in 1950 drove many moderate elements out of the party, including Wallace. The party ran a national ticket in 1952 led by Vincent Hallinan, but it received only 140,023 votes nationwide or 0.2 percent of the national popular vote. The party crumbled completely after the election.

PROHIBITION PARTY (1869– )

Prohibition and temperance movements sought to legislate an end to consumption of intoxicating beverages. Colonial and early national Americans preferred alcohol to impure water or milk and more expensive coffee or tea. By 1825 those over fifteen years of age drank an average of seven gallons of pure alcohol per year, diluted in cider, beer, wine, and distilled liquor; white males typically consumed substantially more, women much less, and black slaves very little. Physicians, Protestant ministers, and temperance advocates concerned about damage to health, morals, and industrial production urged voluntary abstinence from drinking. After achieving remarkable success, the temperance movement sought legal banishment of liquor. During the 1850s a dozen states—led by Maine in 1851—adopted alcohol bans.

After the Civil War, temperance crusaders created effective political pressure groups: the Prohibition Party in 1869, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union in 1874, and the Anti-Saloon League of America in 1895. Their campaigns won adoption of numerous statewide prohibition and local option laws, the latter giving individual communities the right to outlaw the sale of alcohol. In 1913 Congress banned shipment of liquor into any state that chose to bar it. Dissatisfied by uneven and sometimes short-lived state and local successes, goaded by rivalries between the Anti-Saloon League and competing temperance groups, and inspired by adoption of the first federal constitutional amendments in more than forty years (the income tax and direct Senate election amendments of 1913), reformers began calling for a total, permanent, nationwide solution to the liquor problem: a prohibition amendment to the Constitution.

National prohibition gathered support from evangelical Protestant denominations, feminists, nativists opposed to the recent flood of immigrants who drank, progressive social and political reformers, and industrial employers. Employing the unusual political tactic of pledging electoral support or punishment solely on the basis of a candidate's stand on the single issue of alcohol, proponents of Prohibition were able to get more and more supporters elected to Congress. U.S. entry into World War I against Germany added a final argument of patriotism, because the army needed the grain for bread and the troops needed to be sober to perform effectively. The Eighteenth (or Prohibition) Amendment was adopted with bipartisan backing in January 1919 and went into effect one year later; it operated with mixed success for fourteen years.

The Republicans, who were responsible for enforcement as the party in power throughout the 1920s, continued to defend Prohibition even as the Democrats' support was waning, especially in the urban North, as first Al Smith and later Franklin D. Roosevelt aligned with the repeal campaign. Differences regarding Prohibition were among the most clear-cut partisan divisions in the 1932 elections and helped account for the shift in the national political balance during the depths of the Great Depression. National Prohibition, widely viewed as a mistake, was repealed by the Twenty-first Amendment, which was ratified in December 1933.

The party remained after the repeal of Prohibition, however, becoming the longest-running third party in American history in the twentieth century. The party has run a national ticket in every presidential election since 1872, but its candidates have never carried a single state. After the 1976 election, the Prohibition Party changed its name to the National Statesman Party, and its 1980 candidate registered using that party name. The 1984 candidate, Earl F. Dodge of Colorado, emphasized that his party—on the ballots once again as Prohibitionists—no longer focused on a single issue: the party backed religious liberty and an antiabortion amendment. Dodge ran again in 1988, 1992, 1996, 2000, and 2004. In 2000 the party could only muster 208 votes nationwide and fell short of that total four years later. It did slightly better in 2008, winning 653 votes in three states with a new presidential candidate, Gene C. Amondson of Washington.

REFORM PARTY (INDEPENDENT ROSS PEROT) (1992–)

The Reform Party emerged almost full grown from Texas billionaire H. Ross Perot's independent self-financed presidential candidacy of 1992. That year Perot drew the highest vote share of any independent or third-party candidate in eighty years. Relying heavily on his wealth and on grassroots volunteer efforts to get his name on the ballot in all fifty states and the District of Columbia, Perot received 19,741,657 votes or 18.9 percent of the nationwide vote. He did not win any sizable constituency or receive any electoral votes, but he drew a respectable 10 percent to 30 percent in popular voting across the nation.

Perot, who announced the possibility of his candidacy in February 1992, ran his early unofficial campaign mainly on one issue—eliminating the federal deficit. He had the luxury of personally funding his entire campaign, which included buying huge amounts of television time. He won additional exposure through participation in the fall presidential debates. Drawing on the disenchantment of voters, Perot and his folksy, no-nonsense approach to government reform struck a populist chord. But he also demonstrated his quirkiness by bizarrely withdrawing from the presidential race in mid-July and then reversing himself and reentering in October. He chose as his running mate retired admiral James B. Stockdale, who as a navy flier had been a prisoner during much of the Vietnam War.

United We Stand America (UWSA), formed from the ashes of Perot's candidacy, did not bill itself as an official political party. Promoting itself instead as a nonpartisan educational organization, UWSA called for a balanced budget, government reform, and health care reform. The group's leaders did not endorse candidates or offer them financial assistance.

In 1993 Perot, rather than UWSA, commanded considerable attention on Capitol Hill, from marshaling grassroots support on congressional reform to unsuccessfully opposing the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). Democrats and Republicans were unable to co-opt his following as they had those of major third-party movements in the past. Perot continued to use his supporters' anger with government and the political process to sustain himself as an independent political force. In fall 1995 Perot created a full-fledged political party, the Reform Party that qualified for federal funding in 1996 and went along with the limitations that acceptance of the money entailed. By garnering more than 5 percent of the 1992 presidential vote, Perot's party qualified in 1996 for some $30 million, less than half the amount he spent from his own pocket four years earlier.

Perot was challenged for the Reform Party nomination by Richard D. Lamm, a former Democratic governor of Colorado who had shown a willingness to risk voter displeasure. Lamm called, for example, for deep cuts in Medicare, the popular health care program for the elderly. Perot defeated Lamm in an unusual two-stage nominating procedure, starting with speeches by the candidates at a convention in Long Beach, California, followed by a mail, phone, and computer vote with the winner announced a week later in Valley Forge, Pennsylvania. Ballots had been sent to 1.3 million voters who were registered party members or signers of its ballot access petitions. Less than 50,000 votes, though, were actually cast, with Perot a winner by a margin of nearly 2-to-1.

Perot again was on the general election ballot in all states. He chose as his running mate Pat Choate, a native Texan and economist who had coached Perot in his unsuccessful fight against NAFTA. The Reform Party also had congressional candidates in ten states.

Locked out of the presidential debates in 1996, Perot spent much of his campaign money on television “infomercials” espousing the party's principles. Besides a balanced budget these included higher ethical standards for the White House and Congress, campaign and election reforms, a new tax system, and lobbying restrictions.

Even with his restricted campaign budget, Perot again placed third in the national election after the two major party candidates. However, his 8,085,402 votes, 8.4 percent of the total, came to less than half of his 1992 achievement of 18.9 percent, a third-party figure surpassed in the twentieth century only by former president Theodore Roosevelt and his Bull Moose candidacy of 1912. As in 1992, Perot won no electoral votes.

In 1998 the Reform Party scored a high-profile victory when former professional wrestler Jesse Ventura was elected governor of Minnesota running on the party label. Ventura's victory helped give the Reform Party the look of a growth stock, and several well-known personalities publicly considered running for the party's presidential nomination in 2000, including former Connecticut governor Lowell P. Weicker Jr. and financier Donald Trump. Ultimately, they did not run, although Patrick J. Buchanan did, bolting the Republican Party in October 1999.

Highly public party infighting followed, with Perot loyalists arrayed against Buchanan supporters. The latter claimed they offered the party energy and new blood; the former contended Buchanan was intent on a hostile takeover designed to give the Reform Party a socially conservative face.

Calling the party "dysfunctional," Ventura announced in February 2000 that he was leaving the national party and subsequently identified only with the Independence Party of Minnesota. In June Perot publicly distanced himself from his creation by declining to run against Buchanan in the party's mail-in primary in July. But John Hagelin, the candidate of the Natural Law Party in 1992 and 1996, did enter.

The Reform Party's convention in Long Beach, California, in August, disintegrated into two competing conclaves: one favorable to Buchanan, the other, dominated by Perot loyalists, favorable to Hagelin. After Buchanan wrested control of the party and nomination, the Hagelin forces set up a splinter Reform Party. Hagelin chose Nat Goldhaber of California for the vice-presidential spot on his ticket. In September the splinter group joined in coalition with the Natural Law Party, Hagelin's old party.

Nevertheless, Buchanan retained control of the Reform Party apparatus, and a federal court awarded him full use of the $12.6 million in federal funds that Perot's 1996 showing had qualified the party's 2000 nominee to receive. Buchanan chose Ezola Foster, a California teacher, for his running mate. The bipartisan Commission on Presidential Debates, however, denied Buchanan participation in the three presidential debates held in October, as his support in the polls stayed well under the 15 percent required by debate organizers to qualify.

The actual 2000 election results were a major disappointment to Reform Party supporters. Although commentators thought Buchanan's message would attract many social conservatives, the party garnered only 449,077 votes, just 0.4 percent of the total presidential vote. Some commentators, however, noted that Buchanan was on the ballot in four competitive states that were won by Democratic candidate Al Gore, in essence offsetting any damage done to Gore by the Green Party candidacy of Ralph Nader. In 2004 the Reform Party did not run a presidential candidate and endorsed the independent candidacy of Nader, providing him with their ballot line in a handful of states. In 2008 its candidate, Ted Weill, received only 481 votes, all of them in Mississippi.

REPUBLICAN PARTY (1854– )

The Republican Party, founded in 1854, dominated national politics from 1860 to the New Deal era and presidential politics for most of the period from 1968 to 1992 and again from 2000 to 2008. The party emerged in 1854–1856 out of a political frenzy, in all northern states, revolving around the expansion of slavery into the western territories. The new party was so named because "republicanism" was the core value of American politics, and proponents of the new party argued that it was mortally threatened by the expanding "slave power." The enemy was not so much the institution of slavery or the mistreatment of the slaves. Rather, it was the political-economic system that controlled the South, exerted disproportionate control over the national government, and threatened to seize power in the new territories.

Origins through Reconstruction

The party came into being in reaction to federal legislation allowing the new settlers of Kansas Territory to decide for themselves whether to adopt slavery or to continue the Compromise of 1820, which explicitly forbade slavery there. The new party lost on this issue, but in addition to bringing in most northern Whigs, it gained support from "Free Soil" northern Democrats who opposed the expansion of slavery. Only a handful of abolitionists joined. The Republicans adopted most of the modernization programs of the Whigs, favoring banks, tariffs, and internal improvements and adding, as well, a demand for a homestead law that would provide free farms to western settlers. In state after state, the Republicans outmaneuvered rival parties (the old Whigs, the Prohibitionists, and the Know Nothings), absorbing most of their supporters without accepting their doctrines.

The 1856 campaign, with strong pietistic, Protestant overtones, was a crusade for "Free Soil, Free Labor, Free Men, and Fremont!" John C. Fremont was defeated by a sharp countercrusade that warned against fanaticism and the imminent risk of civil war. By the late 1850s the new party dominated every northern state. It was well positioned to win the White House, despite its almost complete lack of support below the Mason-Dixon line. Leaders such as William H. Seward of New York and Salmon P. Chase of Ohio were passed over as presidential candidates in 1860 because they were too radical in their rhetoric and their states were safely in the Republican column. Abraham Lincoln was more moderate and had more appeal in the closely divided midwestern states of Illinois and Indiana. With only 40 percent of the popular vote, Lincoln swept the North and easily carried the electoral college. Interpreting the Republican victory as a signal of intense, permanent Yankee hostility, seven states of the Deep South seceded and formed their own confederation.

President Abraham Lincoln succeeded in uniting the Republican Party to fight for the preservation of the Union after the secession of southern states.

The Republicans had not expected secession and were baffled by it. The Lincoln administration, stiffened by the unionist pleas of conservative northern Democrats, rejected both the suggestion of abolitionists that the slaveholders be allowed to depart in peace and the insistence of Confederates that they had a right to revolution and self-governance.

Lincoln proved brilliantly successful in uniting all the factions of his party to fight for the Union. Most northern Democrats were likewise supportive until fall 1862, when Lincoln added the abolition of slavery as a war goal. All the state Republican parties accepted the antislavery goal except Kentucky. In Congress the party passed major legislation to promote rapid modernization, including measures for a national banking system, high tariffs, homestead laws, and aid to education and agriculture. How to deal with the ex-Confederates was a major issue; by 1864 radical Republicans controlled Congress and demanded more aggressive action against slavery and more vengeance toward the Confederates. Lincoln held them off, but just barely. His successor, Andrew Johnson, proved eager to reunite the nation, but the radicals seized control of Congress, the party, and the army and nearly convicted Johnson on a close impeachment vote.

Ulysses S. Grant, former commander of the Union army, was elected president in 1868 with strong support from radicals and the new Republican regimes in the South. He in turn vigorously supported radical Reconstruction programs in the South, the Fourteenth Amendment, and equal civil and voting rights for the freedmen. Most of all, he was the hero of the war veterans, who gave him strong support. The party had become so large that factionalism was inevitable, hastened by Grant's tolerance of high levels of corruption. The Liberal Republicans split off in 1872 on the grounds that it was time to declare the war finished and bring the troops home from the occupied southern states.

Late Nineteenth Century

The 1873 depression energized the Democrats. They won control of the House and formed "Redeemer" coalitions that recaptured control of each southern state, often using threats and violence. The Compromise of 1877 resolved the disputed 1876 election by giving the White House to the Republicans and control of the southern states to the Democrats. The GOP, as it was now nicknamed, split into "Stalwart" and "Half-Breed" factions. In 1884 "Mugwump" reformers split off and helped elect Democrat Grover Cleveland.

In the North the Republican Party proved most attractive to men with an ambitious vision of a richer, more modern, and more complex society and economy. The leading modernizers were well-educated men from business, finance, and the professions. Commercial farmers, skilled mechanics, and office clerks largely supported the GOP, while unskilled workers and traditional farmers were solidly Democratic. The moral dimension of the Republican Party attracted pietistic Protestants, especially Methodists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Scandinavian Lutherans, and Quakers. By contrast, the high church or "liturgical" denominations (Roman Catholics, Mormons, German Lutherans, and Episcopalians) were offended by Republican crusaders who wanted to impose their moral standards, especially through prohibition and control over public schools.

Millions of immigrants entered the political system after 1850 and many started voting only a few years after arrival. The Catholics (Irish, German, and Dutch) became Democrats, but the Republicans won majorities among the Protestant British, German, Dutch, and Scandinavian newcomers and among German Jews. After 1890 new, much poorer ethnic groups arrived in large numbers—especially Italians, Poles, and Yiddish-speaking Jews. For the most part they did not become politically active until the 1920s. After 1876 southern voting was quite distinct from the rest of America—with few white Republicans, apart from pockets of GOP strength in the Appalachian and Ozark Mountain counties. The party remained popular among black southerners, even as disenfranchisement minimized their political role. (They were allowed to select delegates to the Republican national convention.)

The Republican elephant made its first appearance in a Thomas Nast illustration for Harper's Weekly on November 7, 1874.

In the 1888 election, for the first time since 1872, the Republicans gained control of the White House and both houses of Congress. New procedural rules in the House gave the Republican leaders (especially Speaker Thomas Reed) the ability to pass major legislation. New spending bills, such as one that provided generous pensions to Civil War veterans, coupled with the new McKinley tariff, made the GOP the target of charges of “paternalism.” Democrats ridiculed the “Billion Dollar Congress,” to which Reed shot back, “It’s a billion dollar country!”

At the grassroots level, militant pietists overcame the advice of more tolerant professionals to endorse statewide prohibition. In the Midwest, reformers declared war on the large German community, trying to shut down their parochial schools as well as their saloons. The Republicans, relying too much on the old-stock coalition that had always dominated the party’s voting base, were badly defeated in the 1890 off-year election and the 1892 presidential contest, won by Cleveland. Alarmed professionals reasserted control over the local organizations, leading to a sort of “bossism” that (after 1900) fueled the outrage of progressives. Meanwhile, a severe economic depression struck both rural and urban America in 1893—on Cleveland’s watch. The depression, combined with violent nationwide coal and railway strikes and snarling factionalism inside the Democratic Party, led to a sweeping victory for the GOP in 1894.

The party seemed invincible in 1896, until the Democrats unexpectedly selected William Jennings Bryan as their presidential candidate. Bryan’s hugely popular crusade against the gold standard, financiers, railroads, and industrialists—indeed, against the cities—created a crisis for Republican candidate William McKinley and his campaign manager, Mark Hanna. Because of civil service reforms, parties could no longer finance themselves internally. Hanna solved that problem by directly obtaining $3.5 million from large corporations threatened by Bryan. During the next century, campaign finance would be hotly debated. McKinley promised prosperity for everyone and every group, with no governmental attacks on property or ethnic groups. The business community, factory workers, white-collar workers, and commercial farmers responded enthusiastically, becoming major components of the new Republican majority. As voter turnout soared to the 95 percent level throughout much of the North, Germans and other ethnic groups grew alarmed by Bryan’s moralism and voted Republican.

Early Twentieth Century

Rejuvenated by their triumphs in 1894 and 1896 and by the glamour of a highly popular short war in 1898, against Spain over Cuba, the Philippines, and other Spanish possessions, the Republicans rolled to victory after victory. However, the party had again grown too large, and factionalism increasingly tore it apart.

The break within the party came in 1912 over the issue of progressivism. President William Howard Taft favored conservative reform controlled by the courts; former president Theodore Roosevelt found grassroots support in attacking Taft, bosses, courts, big business, and the “malefactors of great wealth.” Defeated at the convention, Roosevelt bolted and formed a third party, the Progressive—or Bull Moose—Party. The vast majority of progressive politicians refused to follow Roosevelt’s action, which allowed the conservatives to seize control of the GOP, which they kept for the next quarter century. Roosevelt's quixotic crusade also allowed Democrat Woodrow Wilson to gain the White House with only 42 percent of the vote. But after Wilson's fragile coalition collapsed in 1920, the GOP won three consecutive presidential contests.

Herbert Hoover, elected in 1928, represented the quintessence of the modernizing engineer, bringing efficiency to government and the economy. His poor skills at negotiating with politicians hardly seemed to matter when the economy boomed in the 1920s and Democrats were in disarray. However, when the Great Depression hit in the 1930s, his political ineptitude compounded the party's weaknesses. For the next four decades, whenever Democrats were at a loss for words, they could always ridicule Hoover.

New Deal and Democratic Dominance

The Great Depression sidelined the GOP for decades. The old conservative formulas for prosperity had lost their magic. The Democrats, by contrast, built up majorities that depended on labor unions, big-city machines, federal relief funds, and the mobilization of Catholics, Jews, and African Americans. However, middle-class hostility to new taxes, and fears about a repeat of the World War I, eventually led to a Republican rebound. Franklin D. Roosevelt's immense popularity gave him four consecutive victories, but by 1938 the GOP was doing quite well in off-year elections when FDR's magic was not at work.

In 1948 taxes were high, federal relief had ended, and big-city machines were collapsing, but union strength helped Harry S. Truman reassemble FDR's coalition for one last hurrah. The year 1948 proved to be the high-water mark of class polarization in American politics; afterward, the differences narrowed between the middle class and the working class.

The issues of Korea, communism, and corruption gave World War II hero Dwight D. Eisenhower a victory in 1952 for the Republicans, along with narrow control of Congress. However, the GOP remained a minority party and was factionalized, with a northeastern liberal element basically favorable to the New Deal welfare state and the policy of containing communist expansion, versus midwestern conservatives who bitterly opposed New Deal taxes, regulation, labor unions, and internationalism. Both factions used the issue of anticommunism and attacked the Democrats for harboring spies and allowing communist gains in China and Korea. New York governors Thomas E. Dewey and Nelson Rockefeller led the liberal wing, while senators Robert Taft of Ohio and Barry Goldwater of Arizona spoke for the conservatives. Eisenhower represented internationalism in foreign policy, and he sidetracked the isolationism represented by Taft and Hoover.

Richard Nixon, who was Eisenhower's vice president, was identified with the eastern wing of the GOP when he was nominated in 1960 to succeed Eisenhower. Nixon lost because the Democrats had a larger base of loyal supporters, especially among Catholics who turned out to support their candidate, John F. Kennedy. The defeat of yet another candidate sponsored by the eastern "establishment" opened the way for Goldwater's 1964 crusade against the New Deal and Kennedy's successor Lyndon B. Johnson's Great Society programs. Goldwater and his conservative supporters permanently vanquished the eastern liberals, but in turn his crushing defeat as the GOP presidential candidate in 1964 retired many old-line conservatives. Goldwater in 1964 and independent George Wallace in 1968 took southern whites and many northern Catholics away from their Democratic roots, while at the same time the Democratic commitment to civil rights won over nine-tenths of all African American voters.

Republican Revival

Democrat Johnson won an overwhelming victory in 1964 and brought with him a large Democratic majority in Congress that enacted sweeping social programs that Johnson called the Great Society. However, support for these programs collapsed in the mid-1960s in the face of violence and protest over racial anger as the civil rights movement gained steam, the increasingly unpopular Vietnam War, generational conflicts, the perception of increased crime, burning inner cities growing in part from the assassination of important civil rights leaders, and charges that the federal government was badly out of control.

Nixon seized the moment and ran again, winning narrowly in 1968. As president he largely ignored his party—his 1972 reelection campaign was practically nonpartisan but wildly successful as he buried his Democratic opponent. But Nixon was not to serve out his second term. The Watergate scandal, which revealed White House and presidential involvement in criminal activities, forced him to resign from office in the face of certain congressional impeachment and removal from office. Nixon's self-destruction wreaked havoc in the 1974 election, in which Democrats swept to a massive victory in off-year contests, and set the stage for the Carter interregnum.

Georgia governor Jimmy Carter won the White House for the Democrats in 1976 but his presidency crashed long before it expired in 1981. Foreign affairs were unusually salient, as public opinion saw failure in policy toward the Soviet Union, Middle Eastern nations that forced an energy crises by withholding oil supplies, and Iranian revolutionaries that held Americans hostage for months. "Stagflation" in the economy meant a combination of high unemployment and high inflation. Most of all there was a sense of drift or, worse, of malaise. The country craved leadership.

Republican Ronald Reagan answered that need. A former movie actor and governor of California, Reagan had been a supporter of Goldwater and an articulate spokesperson for the conservative views that the 1964 presidential candidate set in motion. Reagan led a political revolution in 1980, capitalizing on grievances and mobilizing an entirely new voting bloc, the religious right. Southern Baptists and other fundamentalists and evangelicals had been voting Democratic since the New Deal. Suddenly they began to react strongly against a perceived national tolerance of immorality (especially regarding abortion and homosexuality), rising crime, and America's apparent rejection of traditional family values. Reagan had vision and leadership qualities that many in the political establishment did not initially understand. Reagan oversaw a massive military buildup, large tax cuts, and—inadvertently—a massive increase in the national debt.

By 1984 inflation had declined significantly, unemployment had eased, profits were soaring, some changes had been made in the Social Security system, and Reagan carried forty-nine states in winning reelection. Most astonishing of all was Reagan's aggressive pursuit of cold war policy, followed closely by the collapse of the Soviet Union and the end of international communism in most nations. The best issue for the Democrats was the soaring national debt—long a conservative theme. For the first time since 1932, the GOP pulled abreast of the Democrats in terms of party identification on the part of voters. A greater number of higher-income people were voting Republican, which was not offset by the lower-income groups that had always been the mainstay of the Democratic Party. By the 1980s a gender gap was apparent, with men and housewives more Republican while single, divorced, and professional women tended to be Democratic. Groups that were part of the religious right helped deliver to the GOP the votes of their membership. Those gains were largely offset by the Democratic increases among well-educated voters (those with college and postgraduate degrees) for the party's positions on social issues such as multiculturalism and a tolerance of homosexuality and abortion.

Vice President George H.W. Bush rode to the White House in 1988 on Reagan's popularity and could himself claim important victories in the cold war and in the Middle East, where the Persian Gulf War liberated Kuwait in 1991 after an invasion by neighboring Iraq. But Bush—so knowledgeable on international affairs—seemed unconcerned about taxes, deficits, and other domestic issues that bothered Americans far more. Most importantly, Bush was ambushed by the remnants of a nasty recession in 1990–1991 just as he was running for reelection in 1992, allowing Arkansas governor Bill Clinton to take back the White House for the Democrats.

The 1990s was a decade of travail for the Republican Party at the presidential level. It lost the 1992 and 1996 presidential elections to Clinton, the first time the GOP had lost successive White House elections since 1960 and 1964. Clinton proved a popular if controversial president, raising the specter that the generally Republican trend of recent decades had finally been broken. However, the GOP roared back in 1994, gaining control of Congress—both the House and Senate—for the first time since 1952 as well as control of governors' mansions in nearly all the major states. This remarkable achievement was engineered in important part by an ambitious Republican representative from Georgia, Newt Gingrich, who had worked his way into the GOP House leadership. As a result of the Republican victory in 1994, he became House Speaker but then proceeded to all but self-destruct through an aggressive and ultimately futile combat with Clinton over programs and policies.

The rancorous leadership of Gingrich soured politics in Washington, and he was unable to deliver on most of his conservative program that he called the "Contract with America." The Republican condition worsened when the party attempted to impeach and remove Clinton from office over a scandal that had its roots in a messy affair between the president and a young female intern in the White House that Clinton at first denied. The public, appalled at the scandal, never showed enthusiasm for removing Clinton and the Senate refused to convict the president after the House—in highly partisan proceedings—approved impeachment. This event, the Gingrich overreaching, and other missteps by Republicans gradually whittled down the Republican's control of Congress in the 1996 and 1998 elections.

Nevertheless, in the 2000 elections the Republican Party achieved a dream long thought impossible. In a contested election, former president Bush's son, George W. Bush, defeated Democrat Albert "Al" Gore Jr. This victory—although one of the most narrow in history—revived the GOP dominance of national-level politics that began with Nixon in 1968. Equally important, the GOP retained control of Congress, giving it complete control of the federal government for the first time since 1954. To be sure, their margin in the House was further eroded and the margin in the Senate evaporated entirely with an exact tie of fifty Democrats and fifty Republicans, with the GOP retaining control since the new vice president could break a tie vote. However, with the defection of moderate Republican senator Jim Jeffords of Vermont to the independent ranks in June 2001, the Senate reverted to Democratic control.

As the presidential party, the Republicans scored an unusual midterm success in 2002, regaining the Senate, expanding their margin in the House, and maintaining a majority of the nation's governorships. But that was merely a warm up for the presidential election of 2004. It was the first presidential contest to be held after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001; the first after the start of the war in Iraq; the first after a state court in Massachusetts approved gay marriage; and the first since Bush initially won the White House in 2000 on a split decision—winning the electoral vote but losing the popular vote.

To his critics, virtually everything about Bush was controversial—from the furor over his initial election to the president's embrace of an ideologically conservative agenda driven by an assertive leadership style. The 2004 campaign was waged against the backdrop of an uncertain economy, with both parties evenly matched—unified and well-financed. On election day, Republicans were able to strengthen their grip on both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue. Bush was reelected with 51 percent of the vote. Republicans extended their majorities in the Senate and House. For good measure, the GOP maintained a clear majority of governorships in the election that produced the nation's highest voter turnout ever (more than 122 million votes).

The results seemed to suggest that the Republicans were on the lip of reestablishing the dominance they had enjoyed in the decades after the Civil War until Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1932 made the Democrats ascendant for twenty years in the presidency and longer in Congress. The appearance was misleading. Except for a period after the 2001 terrorist's attacks, when Bush's popularity was extraordinary high, as president he turned out to be a highly divisive leader. Even without any voter mandate in 2000, his administration undertook aggressive policy initiatives attuned to a conservative base of backers, including deep tax cuts, deregulation of industries, environment policy changes, proposed entitlement reforms vigorously opposed by most Democrats, and social issues, particularly abortion. Unexpectedly, his administration showed little restraint on government spending, wiping out budget surpluses left by Clinton.

But one decision by Bush, more than any other, stood out. In 2003 he ordered a military invasion of Iraq, on the pretense that the nation was developing weapons of mass destruction. Such weapons were never found, but the U.S.

military soon found itself in a quagmire that it could not win but could not leave. This war galvanized opposition to Bush and was a major factor in sending his popularity to record low levels.

For the Republican Party, the result was a disaster that ended any hope the GOP was about to become the dominant force in American politics for the foreseeable future. In 2006, riding on voter discontent over the war and many other issues, Democrats recaptured control of both the House and the Senate, setting the stage for a 2008 showdown when there would be no presidential incumbent running. While the Iraq war remained as controversial as it had been two years earlier, as the 2008 election campaign wore on, the nation's—and the world's—attention shifted to the plummeting economy—as serious as any downturn since the Great Depression of the 1930s. This financial crisis, occurring on the Republican watch, added to voter discontent, already high over Iraq and other Bush administration policies.

In the 2008 the Republicans chose Arizona senator John McCain, a prominent figure in Congress for twenty-five years, as their presidential nominee. McCain, who had survived heroically as a prisoner of war during the Vietnam War, added the first woman to a GOP presidential ticket by choosing Alaska governor Sarah Palin for a running mate. However, the American populous voted for change over experience and elected youthful Illinois senator Barack Obama decisively by a margin of 53 to 46 percent. Obama brought with him even larger Democratic margins in both chambers of Congress.

In early 2009 even the most loyal Republicans admitted that their brand was in shambles as they began to search about for a future course. An early sign appeared when the Republican National Committee (RNC) elected a black Maryland Republican, Michael Steele, a former lieutenant governor in that state, as chairman of the party. In one of his first acts, Steele requested the resignation of everyone in the RNC, in order—press reports indicated—to install a new set of faces for the future.

SOCIALIST PARTY (1901–)

The inception of the Socialist Party marked a unique, brief era of leftist organizational unity. Founded in 1901 by New York attorney Morris Hillquit and railroad worker and labor leader Eugene Debs, the Socialist Party brought together the Social Democratic Party; Social Laborites; Christian Socialists; a wing of the Socialist Labor Party; and followers of Henry George, Edward Bellamy, and assorted populist sympathizers. Rapid growth and early success continued through the 1912 presidential election, when Debs earned 6 percent of the votes cast and some 1,200 Socialist Party candidates won state and local elections, including seventy-nine mayoral races.

Despite the party's continued strong showing in the 1916 and 1920 elections, World War I took a toll on the Socialist Party. Although party members were already persecuted for their opposition to the war, the Sedition Act of 1918 resulted in additional arrests and prevented the Socialist Party from using the mail to communicate with branches beyond its East Coast and Midwest bases. While many, including Debs, were being sent to prison for either their pacifist views or Sedition Act violations, the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution in Russia led by Vladimir Lenin further hastened the party's demise.

By 1919, Leninist sympathizers threatened to take over the Socialist Party leadership. A schism ensued, resulting in the expulsion of radical party elements and the invalidation of the national executive committee elections. Thereafter, the Socialist Party and the Communist Party became two distinct organizations with decidedly different agendas. By breaking with its labor roots, the Socialist Party lost its legitimacy as an agent of radical social action. Debs's death in 1926 signaled the end of the worker-oriented party and the start of a more urban-middle-class-centered party under Norman Thomas's leadership. The Socialist Party, which had 9,500 members in 1929, experienced a revival between 1929 and 1934: membership increased during the Great Depression to almost 17,000 in 1932, when Thomas polled almost 900,000 votes in the presidential race, and to 20,000 members in 1934.

Many new members were young militants who increasingly disagreed with the party's old guard. Until Hillquit died in 1933, the old guard held their own, but they lost their grip thereafter. At the 1934 party convention in Detroit, the young militant wing, joined by Thomas and the Milwaukee mayor, Daniel W. Hoan, passed a new Socialist Party declaration of principles that the old guard believed encouraged too forcefully the nonelectoral seizure of power and sympathized too greatly with Soviet Russia. The old guard formally broke away in 1936 and formed the Social Democratic Federation (SDF). Party membership fell to 12,000 in 1936 and shrank to 6,500 the following year. More important, Thomas garnered only 187,000 votes during the 1936 presidential election and less than 100,000 in 1940.

From 1933 to 1940 the Socialist Party experienced further internal strains by criticizing President Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal. Party members viewed New Deal programs as more sympathetic to corporate interests than to organized labor's concerns. Remaining party members split over wartime policy, with Thomas leading a pacifist faction; the party lost any influence it had as it was effectively co-opted by Roosevelt. Only in the cities of Bridgeport, Connecticut, and Milwaukee, Wisconsin, did the old Socialist Party maintain a real presence. However, Thomas continued to run as the Socialist presidential candidate through the 1948 election.

In the post–World War II era, all radicalism was suspect. Although the Socialists made inroads into the Congress of Industrial Organizations and helped organize Detroit autoworkers and southern sharecroppers, the party disintegrated as an organization. The party continued to field a presidential candidate until the 1960 election, when it failed to run a candidate. Radicals shifted their emphasis from organized labor to civil rights and, later, worked against the war in Vietnam.

In the early 1960s the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee (DSOC), the New American Movement (NAM), and the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) became the main organizational vehicles for the New Left—all working outside the constraints of third-party politics. The SDS faded after Martin Luther King's assassination in 1968 and the Paris Peace Accords in 1973. Meanwhile NAM devoted its energies to feminism, gay rights, and local community organizing into the early 1980s.

The DSOC continued to operate in the old socialist manner as the left wing of the New Deal coalition—not as a separate political party as much as a socialist force within the Democratic Party and the labor movement. The DSOC was successful in attracting activists such as machinist union leader William Winpisinger, feminist Gloria Steinem, and gay rights activist Harry Britt. Bernard Sanders, member of Congress from Vermont who was first elected in 1991, was the first self-avowed socialist elected to Congress in decades and perhaps the best known since Victor Berger served in the House of Representatives during the 1920s.

NAM and DSOC completed a formal merger in 1983 and emerged as the Democratic Socialists of America (DSA). The DSA brought together for the first time since World War I the disparate segments of leftist opinion, including the SDF and former socialists and communists. Although the American left was in disarray in the late 1960s and the administrations of Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush, Bill Clinton, and George W. Bush were by and large conservative, a kind of socialist revival occurred by the beginning of the twenty-first century. Although membership remained low, Socialist Party influences such as government-supported health care, minimum wage, and human rights were more apparent in the national political debate than at any time since the 1960s. In addition, the Socialist Party resumed running a presidential ticket in 1976 and has continued to do so in most elections since then, although the Socialists did not receive more than 15,000 votes in any of them. In 2008 its presidential candidate, Brian P. Moore, received 7,301 votes.

SOCIALIST LABOR PARTY (1874– )

The Socialist Labor Party, the first national socialist party in the United States, ranks second only to the Prohibitionists among third parties in longevity. Formed in 1874 by elements of the Socialist International in New York, it was first known as the Social Democratic Workingmen's Party. In 1877 the group adopted the name Socialist Labor Party. Throughout the 1880s the party worked in concert with other left-wing third parties, including the Greenbacks.

The Socialist Labor Party ran national tickets in every presidential election from 1892 through 1976. The party collected its highest proportion of the national vote in 1896, when its candidate received 36,356 votes (0.3 percent of the popular vote).

Led by the autocratic Daniel DeLeon (1852–1914), a former Columbia University law lecturer, the Socialist Labor Party became increasingly militant and made its best showing in local races in 1898. But DeLeon's insistence on rigid party discipline and his opposition to the organized labor movement created a feeling of alienation among many members. Moderate elements bolted from the party, eventually joining the Socialist Party of Eugene V. Debs, which formed in 1901.

The Socialist Labor Party continued as a small, tightly organized far-left group bound to DeLeon's uncompromising belief in revolution. As late as 1976 the party advocated direct worker action to take over control of production and claimed 5,000 members nationwide, although it has not run a presidential ticket under the Socialist Labor banner since then.

SOCIALIST WORKERS PARTY (1938–)

The Socialist Workers Party was formed in 1938 by followers of the Russian revolutionary Leon Trotsky. Originally a faction within the U.S. Communist Party, the Trotskyites were expelled in 1936 on instructions from Soviet leader Joseph Stalin. A brief Trotskyite coalition with the Socialist Party ended in 1938 when the dissidents decided to organize independently as the Socialist Workers Party. Through its youth arm, the Young Socialist Alliance, the Socialist Workers Party was active in the anti-Vietnam War movement and contributed activists to civil rights protests.

Since 1948 the party has run a presidential candidate, but its entries have never received more than 0.1 percent of the popular vote. In 1992 presidential candidate James Warren was on the ballot in thirteen states and the District of Columbia and drew 23,096 votes nationwide. The party's 2004 candidate, James E. Harris Jr. of Georgia, received barely 7,000 votes.

In 2008 the party garnered a total of 7,561 votes with two sets of candidates running, separately, in thirteen states.

UNION PARTY (1936)

Advocating more radical economic measures in light of the Great Depression, several early supporters of President Franklin D. Roosevelt broke with him and ran their own ticket in 1936 under the Union Party label. Largely an outgrowth of the Rev. Charles E. Coughlin's National Union for Social Justice, the new party also had the support of Dr. Francis E. Townsend, leader of a movement for government-supported old-age pensions, and Gerald L. K. Smith, self-appointed heir of Louisiana senator Huey P. Long's share-the-wealth program.

Father Coughlin was the keystone of the Union Party and was instrumental in choosing its presidential ticket in June 1936—Rep. William Lemke, R-N.D., for president and Thomas O'Brien, a Massachusetts railroad union lawyer, for vice president. The new party did not hold a convention. The party's platform reportedly was written by Coughlin, Lemke, and O'Brien and was similar to the program espoused by Coughlin's National Union. Among the features of the Union Party platform were proposals for banking and currency reform, a guaranteed income for workers, restrictions on wealth, and an isolationist foreign policy.

Lacking organization and finances during the campaign, the party further suffered from the increasingly violent and often anti-Semitic tone of the oratory of both Coughlin and Smith.

The Union Party failed miserably in its primary goal of defeating Roosevelt. Roosevelt won a landslide victory and the Lemke ticket received only 892,267 votes (2 percent of the popular vote). The party standard-bearers were unable to carry a single state, and the Union Party's candidates for the House and Senate all were defeated. The party continued on a local level until it was finally dissolved in 1939.

U.S. LABOR PARTY (INDEPENDENT LYNDON LaROUCHE) (1973–)

Formed in 1973 as the political arm of the National Caucus of Labor Committees (NCLC), the U.S. Labor Party made its debut in national politics in 1976. The NCLC, a Marxist group, was organized in 1968 by splinters of the radical movements of the 1960s. Lyndon H. LaRouche Jr., the party's chairman (then of New York) and a self-taught economist who worked in the management and computer fields, became its 1976 presidential nominee and Wayne Evans, a Detroit steelworker, his running mate.

The party directed much of its fire at the Rockefeller family. It charged that banks controlled by the Rockefellers were strangling the U.S. and world economies. In an apocalyptic vein, the party predicted a world monetary collapse by election day and the destruction of the country by thermonuclear war by summer 1977.

LaRouche's party developed a reputation for harassment because of its shouted interruptions and demonstrations against its political foes, including the Communist Party and the United Auto Workers. It accused some left-wing organizations and individuals, such as linguist Noam Chomsky and Marcus Raskin and his Institute for Policy Studies, of conspiring with the Rockefellers and the Central Intelligence Agency.

During the 1976 campaign, LaRouche was more critical of challenger Jimmy Carter than President Gerald R. Ford. He depicted Ford as a well-meaning man out of his depth in the presidency, but Carter as a pawn of nuclear war advocates and a disgracefully unqualified presidential candidate. LaRouche captured only 40,043 votes, less than 0.1 percent of the national vote. He was on the ballot in twenty-three states and the District of Columbia.

Although the U.S. Labor Party did not run a presidential candidate in the 1980 election, LaRouche ran a strident campaign—as a Democrat. By this time, LaRouche’s politics had shifted to the right, and his speeches were fraught with warnings of conspiracy.

He continued his crusade in 1984 but as an “independent Democrat,” dismissing Democratic presidential nominee Walter F. Mondale as an “agent of Soviet influence.” LaRouche received 78,807 votes, or 0.1 percent of the vote, in the fall election.

In 1988 LaRouche again attempted to run as a Democrat but, failing the nomination, garnered 25,562 votes under the banner of the National Economic Recovery Party. On December 16, 1988, LaRouche and six of his associates were convicted on forty-seven counts of mail fraud and conspiracy to commit mail fraud. LaRouche was sentenced to fifteen years in prison.

In 1992 the unflagging LaRouche ran again for president from his jail cell. As a convicted felon, he no longer had the right to vote himself. LaRouche ran as an independent although his name appeared on several state ballots under various party names, including Economic Recovery. His supporters, experienced in winning ballot access, placed him on the ballot in seventeen states and the District of Columbia. He received 26,333 votes nationwide.

In 1996 LaRouche’s name disappeared from the general election ballot, although he continued to be a quadrennial entry in the Democratic primaries. LaRouche ran in the party’s primaries in every election from 1980 through 2004, with his best showing in 1996 when President Bill Clinton had no major opposition for renomination. That year, LaRouche drew nearly 600,000 Democratic primary votes (5.4 percent of the party’s total primary ballots). In 2004 LaRouche received barely 100,000 votes in the Democratic primaries.

U.S. TAXPAYERS PARTY AND CONSTITUTION PARTY (1992–)

Opposing taxes, welfare, abortion, and affirmative action, the U.S. Taxpayers Party made its first appearance in a presidential election in 1992. Its nominee, Howard Phillips of Virginia, drew 43,434 votes. Phillips, longtime chairman of the Conservative Caucus, founded the party to counter what he perceived to be a left-of-center movement by the Republican Party under George H.W. Bush. Failing to recruit rightist icons such as Patrick J. Buchanan, Oliver North, or Jesse Helms to be the party’s nominee, Phillips ran himself as its standard-bearer. In 1996 Phillips was on the ballot in thirty-nine states, and he received 184,658 votes or more than four times his 1992 total. Of the eighteen minor parties receiving at least 750 votes that year, the Taxpayers Party received the fourth highest total.

By 2000 the U.S. Taxpayers had changed its name to the Constitution Party, to more broadly reflect its conservative agenda. Phillips was willing to step aside when the prospect of the party nominating a more prominent politician was possible. First, it was Sen. Robert C. Smith of New Hampshire, a short-lived independent who returned to the Republican Party in September 1999. Second, was Republican presidential contender Alan Keyes, who indicated in spring 2000 that he might bolt to the Constitution Party if the GOP weakened the antiabortion plank in the party’s platform. It did not, and Keyes stayed in the Republican Party. The party nominated Phillips once again, and he won 98,004 votes in 2000, the sixth highest total of all presidential candidates that year.

In 2004 Phillips did step aside in favor of Michael Peroutka, a lawyer and head of the state party in Maryland, who was paired on the Constitution Party ticket with Charles O. “Chuck” Baldwin of Florida. They made it on the presidential ballot in thirty-six states and received more than 140,000 votes, which placed the Constitution Party in fifth place in 2004 in the popular vote count.

In 2008 Baldwin became the presidential candidate, paired with Darrell L. Castle of Tennessee. The party did relatively well, drawing in 197,453 votes in forty-five states.

WHIG PARTY (1834–1856)

Whigs were nineteenth-century modernizers who saw President Andrew Jackson (1829–1837) as a dangerous man with a reactionary opposition to the forces of social, economic, and moral change. As Jackson purged his opponents, vetoed internal improvements, and killed the Bank of the United States, alarmed local elites fought back.

The Whigs, led by Henry Clay, celebrated Clay’s vision of the “American System.” They demanded government support for a more modern, market-oriented economy, in which skill, expertise, and bank credit would count for more than physical strength or land ownership. They also sought to promote industrialization through high tariffs, a business-oriented money supply based on a national bank, and a vigorous program of government-funded “internal improvements,” especially expansion of the road and canal systems. As well, the Whigs championed the creation of public schools, private colleges, charities, and cultural institutions.

The Democrats, by contrast, harkened back to the Jeffersonian ideal of an equalitarian agricultural society, insisting that traditional farm life bred republican simplicity, whereas modernization threatened to create a politically powerful caste of rich aristocrats who might subvert democracy. In general, the Democrats enacted their policies at the national level; the Whigs' greatest success was at the state level.

Although the Whigs won votes in every socioeconomic class, including the poorest, they appealed especially to more prosperous Americans. The Democrats likewise won support up and down the income ladder, but they often sharpened their appeals to the working class by ridiculing the aristocratic pretensions of the Whigs. Most bankers, storekeepers, factory owners, master mechanics, clerks, and professionals favored the Whigs. Moreover, commercially oriented farmers in the North voted Whig, as did most large-scale planters in the South.

In general, the commercial and manufacturing towns and cities were heavily Whig, save for Democratic wards filled with recent Irish Catholic and German immigrants. Waves of Protestant religious revivals in the 1830s injected a moralistic element into the Whig ranks. Nonreligious individuals who found themselves the targets of moral reform, such as calls for prohibition, denounced the Whigs as Puritans and sought refuge in the Democratic Party. Rejecting the automatic party loyalty that was the hallmark of the tight Democratic Party organization, the Whigs suffered from factionalism. Yet the party's superb network of newspapers provided an internal information system.

Whigs clashed with Democrats throughout what historians term the "Second American Party System." When they controlled the Senate, Whigs passed a censure motion in 1834 denouncing Jackson's arrogant assumption of executive power in the face of the true will of the people as represented by Congress. Backing Henry Clay in 1832 and a medley of candidates in 1836, the opposition finally coalesced in 1840 behind a popular general, William Henry Harrison, and proved that the national Whig Party could win the White House. Moreover, in the 1840s Whigs won 49 percent of gubernatorial elections, with strong bases in the manufacturing Northeast and in the border states. Yet the party revealed limited staying power. Whigs were ready to enact their programs in 1841, but Harrison died and was succeeded by John Tyler, an old-line Democrat who never believed in Whiggery and was, in fact, disowned by the party while he was president. Factionalism helped defeat Henry Clay, the Whig presidential candidate, in 1844. In 1848 opportunity beckoned as the Democrats split. By ignoring Clay and nominating a famous war hero, Gen. Zachary Taylor, the Whigs papered over their deepening splits on slavery, and they won the White House for the second (and last) time. The trend, however, was for the Democratic vote to grow faster and for the Whigs to lose more and more marginal states and districts.

The Whigs were unable to deal with the slavery issue after 1850. Almost all of their southern leaders owned slaves. The northeastern Whigs, led by Daniel Webster, represented businessmen who loved the national flag and a national market but cared little about slavery one way or another. Many Whig voters in the North, however, felt slavery was incompatible with a free labor-free market economy, and the two sides were unable to find a compromise that would keep the party united. Furthermore, the burgeoning economy made full-time careers in business or law much more attractive than politics for ambitious young Whigs. For example, the party leader in Illinois, Abraham Lincoln, simply abandoned politics for several years after 1849. When new issues of nativism, prohibition, and antislavery burst on the scene in the mid-1850s, no one looked to the fast-disintegrating Whig Party for answers. In the North most ex-Whigs joined the new Republican Party, and in the South they flocked to a new, short-lived "American" (Know Nothing) Party. During the Lincoln administration (1861–1865), ex-Whigs enacted much of the "American System"; in the long run, America adopted Whiggish economic policies coupled with the Democrats' penchant for a strong presidency.

WORKERS WORLD PARTY (1959– )

With the Hungarian citizen revolt and other developments in eastern Europe providing some impetus, the Workers World Party in 1959 split off from the Socialist Workers Party. The party theoretically supports worker uprisings in all parts of the world. Yet it backed the communist governments that put down rebellions in Hungary during the 1950s, Czechoslovakia in the 1960s, and Poland in the 1980s. Workers World is an activist revolutionary group that, until 1980, concentrated its efforts on specific issues, such as the antiwar and civil rights demonstrations during the 1960s and 1970s. The party has an active youth organization, Youth Against War and Fascism.

In 1980 party leaders saw an opportunity, created by the weakness of the U.S. economy and the related high unemployment, to interest voters in its revolutionary ideas.

That year it placed Deirdre Griswold, the editor of the party's newspaper and one of its founding members, on the presidential ballot in ten states. Together with her running mate Larry Holmes, a twenty-seven-year-old black activist, Griswold received 13,300 votes. In 1984 Holmes ran as the presidential candidate, getting on the ballot in eight states and receiving 15,329 votes. In 1988 Holmes ran with Gloria La Riva, and they garnered 7,846 votes. La Riva ran as the presidential candidate in 1992 and was on the ballot only in New Mexico, where she received 181 votes.

The Workers World Party dramatically improved its electoral fortunes in 1996. Its candidate, Monica Moorehead of New Jersey, was on the ballot in twelve states and received 29,082 votes. But the party's vote has plummeted sharply from even that modest total. In 2004, the Workers World ticket headed by John Parker, an antiwar activist from California, drew less than 2,000 votes.

The Southern Electoral Experience

AMERICA'S SOUTHERN STATES have played a rich and colorful role in the nation's electoral history, arguably more so than any other region. Although the home to many of the founding generation, the South's notoriety stems at least as much from turbulent Civil War period, which fixed its control by Democrats, to the twenty-first century, when it had become a bastion of Republican strength. By the 2008 elections, the South was almost a GOP fortress against losses in other regions including the party's historical strongholds.

The South includes the eleven states of the Civil War Confederacy: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia. By 2008 political analysts usually added Oklahoma and Kentucky.

During the first half of the twentieth century, the Democratic Party's primaries became, in effect, the region's deciding elections. In his classic study Southern Politics in State and Nation, V.O. Key Jr. concluded, "In fact, the Democratic primary is no nominating method at all. The primary is the election." That was in 1949, before Republicans began seriously challenging Democrats for hegemony in the region.

But Key's observation holds true for the twentieth century up through the time of his study and for much of the following period until the region became at first competitive and then largely a Republican redoubt. Of the 132 elections to the Senate held in the eleven former Confederate states in the period 1919–1948, the Democratic nominee won 131 times. The only exception was a special election in Arkansas in 1937 when the Democratic nominee lost to an independent Democrat.

The southern shift to the Republican Party began in earnest on the presidential level in 1964, when Barry Goldwater's criticisms of civil rights laws found a wide audience. In 1972 Republican presidential nominee Richard Nixon carried all eleven states of the Old South with at least 65 percent of the vote. In 1984 and 1988 Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush did almost as well, carrying every state in the Old South with at least 58 percent (Reagan) or 54 percent (Bush) of the vote. Although the Democrats regained the White House in 1992 and 1996, the party's all-southern ticket of Gov. Bill Clinton of Arkansas and Sen. Albert "Al" Gore Jr. of Tennessee carried only four southern states in both elections. In 1992 Clinton and Gore won Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, and Tennessee. In 1996 the ticket lost Georgia but picked up Florida—the first time the state had gone Democratic since 1976. In the close 2000 presidential race, Republican George W. Bush won each of the thirteen southern states, including Tennessee, the home state of his Democratic opponent Gore. Bush repeated his thirteen-state southern sweep in 2004, with the region providing him with more than half his winning total of electoral votes (153 of 286). The pattern broke—to an extent—in 2008 when Democrat Barack Obama won three of these states, Florida, North Carolina, and Virginia.

From the 1960s to the 1990s, the growth of the Republican Party in southern congressional delegations was steady but slower than on the presidential level. The first popularly elected Republican U.S. senator from the South, John G. Tower of Texas, won a special election in 1961. Thereafter, Republicans won their first Senate seats in South Carolina (1966), Tennessee (1966), Florida (1968), North Carolina and Virginia (1972), Mississippi (1978), Alabama and Georgia (1980), and Arkansas (1996). In 2004 Louisiana became the last southern state to popularly elect a Republican senator.

Thirty years of political realignment in the South culminated in the 1994 congressional elections when the Republican Party won majority status in the South. Not since Reconstruction had the GOP held a majority of the region's seats in the House or in the Senate. The historic election also ushered in Republican control of Congress with southern GOP leadership: in 1995 Newt Gingrich of Georgia was elected Speaker of the House and in 1996 Trent Lott of Mississippi was elected Senate majority leader. Gingrich stepped down as Speaker after a poor showing by the Republicans in the 1998 midterm elections, and his job ultimately went to J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois. The post of House majority leader was held by a Republican Texan from 1995 to 2005—with Richard Armey holding the post from 1995 to 2002 and Tom DeLay until 2005. Meanwhile, when Lott stepped down as Senate majority leader in late 2002, he was replaced by another son of the south, Bill Frist of Tennessee, who held the post until 2006. The southern face of the Republican congressional leadership has been matched by a steady increase in GOP members from the region that was still proceeding in the early twenty-first century. By 2005 Republicans outnumbered Democrats in the eleven southern states by the lopsided margins of eighteen to four in Senate seats and eighty-two to forty-nine in U.S. House seats.

By 2005 Republican dominance in the South looked secure for the foreseeable future. The dramatic population influx in the 1980s and 1990s had reshaped the southern political landscape to the Republicans' advantage. Old-time Democratic voters were overwhelmed in many parts of the South by more independent or GOP-oriented newcomers. Younger voters found the region's historical Democratic roots irrelevant to their concerns. The GOP also aggressively fielded candidates where it once gave the Democrats a free ride. For their part, these candidates emphasized traditional values, an emphasis that resonated among the region's white voters, who constituted a majority of the electorate in every southern state. Although most of the Senate contests in the South were competitive in the 1990s, one sign of the emerging Republican dominance in the region came in 1990 when Republican senator Thad Cochran of Mississippi faced no Democratic opposition in the general election. By the early 2000s, the Democrats were struggling to stay competitive in high-profile races across the South. Not only did George W. Bush sweep the region's presidential balloting in 2000 and 2004, but all five open Democratic Senate seats up for grabs in 2004 went Republican.

The appearance of invincibility, however, was just that—appearance—at least for one election, 2008. As in so many other ways, 2008 was a break with the immediate past that few observers thought possible. The most profound break was the election of Barack Obama as president, the first African American to win that office. For the South, Obama's victory had a special significance as he, and congressional Democrats, challenged across the region. Obama won the popular vote in three of the thirteen states—Florida, North Carolina, and Virginia—that had previously been locks for the GOP, albeit his North Carolina victory was by a plurality of a little more than 14,000 votes. Obama did less well in the other southern states, but he held his opponent, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, to less than 55 percent of the vote in Georgia and South Carolina. The Democratic victories were preceded by a similar surge in registration in two key states—Florida and North Carolina—where Democrats gained a majority of voters on the elections rolls.

The congressional races showed a similar pattern. Democrats won two Republican Senate seats, one held by incumbent Elizabeth Dole in North Carolina and the other an open seat in Virginia. The Virginia win was significant because it gave both Senate seats and the governorship to Democrats, suggesting the changing political makeup of that state. In North Carolina a Democrat also won the governorship held by a term-limited Democratic predecessor.

In House races in the thirteen southern states, Democrats picked up six seats while losing three, but Republicans still held 56 percent of that region's 142 seats. In the Senate, the GOP also held sway with 73 percent of the region's twenty-six senators. In addition, Senate Democrats were a much smaller portion of their party's regional strength compared to counterparts in the House. The seven southern-state Democratic senators who remained in office as of April 1, 2009, constituted only 12 percent of the party's roster of fifty-eight votes, including two independents who voted with Democrats. By comparison, the sixty-two southern-state Democrats in the House were 24 percent of the party's total membership. Nevertheless, for both chambers the mix of southern members in Congress continued to change in a way likely to favor the national Democratic Party. Most of the older conservative Democrats from the South in both chambers, many holding committee chairs or other leadership positions or—in the Senate—with a proclivity to filibuster, had retired or been defeated by 2008, removing an important stumbling block to the national party.

Whether the Democratic inroads in 2008 were permanent, or a passing deviation from the longer trend in that region, remained to be seen. But analysts noted that the Democratic gains came in states that were experiencing important population changes as more committed or leaning Democrats moved into the region.

THE HISTORICAL ROLE OF PRIMARIES

Until changing demographics and the disappearance of old-line conservative Democrats altered the dynamics of southern politics, the real story—as V.O. Key noted a half century earlier—was in the primaries. Whoever won the primary election, which meant the Democratic primary, was almost guaranteed to win the regular election.

The South along with the rest of the nation instituted primaries during the first two decades of the twentieth century. By 1920 all eleven states of the Old South were choosing their Democratic senatorial nominees through the primary process.

But because the primaries were, for all practical purposes, the deciding election, many legislators began to doubt the effectiveness of a system that frequently allowed a candidate in a multi-candidate race to win a plurality of the popular vote—and thus the Democratic nomination that ensured election—even though he received only a small percentage of the total primary vote.

In recognition of this anomaly, most southern states adopted the runoff primary—a second election following the first primary, usually by two to four weeks—that matched only the top two contenders from the first primary. The runoff system was adopted in Alabama in 1931, Arkansas in 1939, Georgia in 1917 with the county unit system (see “County Unit System: Georgia,” p. 250), Louisiana in 1922, Mississippi in 1902, North Carolina in 1915, South Carolina in 1915, and Texas in 1918.

In several states, there has been an on-again, off-again relationship with the runoff. Arkansas adopted the runoff in 1933, abandoned it in 1935, then reinstituted it in 1939. Florida adopted the runoff in 1929 but suspended it in 2001. Virginia adopted the runoff in 1969 but repealed it in 1971. In states that have them, runoffs are traditionally triggered if no candidate wins a majority of the vote in the primary. But that is not always the case. In the 1990s, North Carolina lowered the percentage of the primary vote needed to nail down the nomination from a majority to 40 percent.

Tennessee is the only southern state to have never adopted or tinkered with a runoff, instead nominating in the primary even if that means the winner is far short of a majority. In Tennessee’s 1974 gubernatorial race, former representative Ray Blanton won the Democratic nomination with only 22.7 percent of the vote in a field of a dozen candidates. Blanton went on to win in November.

Runoffs—primary or general elections—are not always obligatory even in the states that have them. In most cases, if the second-place finisher in the primary does not want a runoff, the first-place candidate is then the winner without a runoff. In the North Carolina Republican gubernatorial primary of 2004, for example, front-runner Patrick Ballantine took just 30.4 percent of the vote. However, Richard Vinroot who placed a close second with 30.0 percent, declined the opportunity for a runoff. No runoff was held and Ballantine automatically became the Republican nominee. (Ballantine lost the general election to Democratic governor Michael F. Easley, 42.9 percent to 55.6 percent.)

This pattern held true in 2006 as well. Florida, for example, had five primary races, including those for governor and senator, in which the eventual general election candidate received less than 50 percent, but no runoff was held. By contrast, Georgia, Mississippi, and Texas all held runoffs to establish primary winners with more than 50 percent. In one Georgia race, a House incumbent—Cynthia A. McKinney, a Democrat—was defeated in the runoff after coming in first in the initial primary.

In 2008 a long-serving House Democrat, William Jefferson in Louisiana, lost a general election runoff, but in another incumbent Sen. Saxby Chambliss, R-Ga., easily won reelection after barely missing the 50 percent level in the first round of voting.

Jesse L. Jackson, contender for the 1984 Democratic presidential nomination, mounted an attack against the runoff feature in the spring of that year. Jackson hoped to persuade the ten other southern states to join Tennessee in

1. Arkansas adopted the runoff in 1933, abandoned it in 1935, and reinstituted it in 1939.

2. Florida adopted the runoff in 1929, but it was suspended in 2001 and was not used in immediate subsequent elections.

3. Georgia held runoffs under the county unit system until 1963.

4. Louisiana used the runoff “for a time prior to 1916,” according to political scientist V.O. Key Jr.; in 1975 Louisiana adopted an initial nonpartisan primary followed by a general election runoff. In 2008 it returned to a party primary system in Senate and House voting.

5. Tennessee has never used the preferential or runoff primary. Candidates are nominated by winning a plurality.

6. Virginia adopted the runoff primary in 1969 and repealed it in 1971.

NOTE: In some states with a runoff where redistricting drew a legal challenge that forced alterations in the election calendar, the runoff was temporarily suspended for that election cycle.

avoiding the runoff. Jackson argued that runoffs injured black candidates’ chances of victory because in the second election whites, who made up the majority of registered voters, usually voted on the basis of race. Jackson carried his plea to the Democratic National Convention, which defeated his move to abolish runoffs, 2,500.8 to 1,253.2. Supporters of runoffs argued that they prevented the election of fringe candidates when more broadly acceptable candidates split the vote in hotly contested primaries. In addition, conservative southerners opposed having a national convention decide their state’s election procedures.

PREFERENTIAL PRIMARIES

Three southern states—Alabama, Florida, and Louisiana—tried to avoid the effort and expense of runoff elections by experimenting with a preferential system of primary voting. All three later switched to the runoff system—Alabama after the election of 1930, Florida after the election of 1928, and Louisiana (whose system was similar to Alabama’s) after the election of 1920. Louisiana modified its system yet again in 1975, this time to a two-step process: an initial nonpartisan primary followed by a general election runoff between the two top finishers (if the leading candidate in the first round of voting did not receive a majority of the vote).

Under the preferential system voters, instead of simply marking an X opposite one candidate's name, write the digits 1 or 2, beside the names of two candidates. This indicates the "preference" order voters give each of the candidates, the number one indicating their first choice, the number two their second choice. To determine the winner, without a runoff, second-choice votes are added to the first-choice votes and the candidate with the highest combined total wins.

Alabama

Under the Alabama system, each voter expressed a first and second choice. If no candidate received a majority of the first choices, all but the two leaders were eliminated. All second choices expressed for the two leaders were then added to their first-choice totals, the candidate with the highest combined total winning.

In the Democratic primary for U.S. senator on May 13, 1920, for a special four-year term to fill a vacancy, the candidates were J. Thomas Heflin and three persons whose first names are not available: White, O'Neal, and Rushton. Heflin, with 49,554 first-choice votes, led the field but received only 37.9 percent of the total. White ran second with 34,854 first-choice votes, or 26.6 percent; O'Neal had 33,174 first-choice votes, or 25.4 percent, and Rushton was last with 13,232 first-choice votes, or 10.1 percent. Thus, in many southern states a runoff would have been necessary. But instead of a runoff, all second-choice votes cast for the two leaders—Heflin and White—were added to their first-choice ballots. A total of 11,062 second-choice votes were cast for Heflin by voters whose first choice had gone to one of the other three candidates. Added to his first-choice vote of 49,554, this gave Heflin a grand total of 60,016 votes. White received 12,699 second-choice votes—more than Heflin—but the second-choice votes were not enough to raise his grand total above Heflin's. White thus wound up with a grand total of 47,553 votes, and Heflin was the winner.

Florida

The Florida system of preference voting differed somewhat from the Alabama system. In Florida, as in Alabama, each voter expressed a first and second choice. Also as in Alabama, if no candidate received a majority of first choices, all candidates but the two highest first-choice candidates were eliminated. To determine the winner, the second choices expressed for the two highest on the ballots of eliminated candidates only were added to the first-choice totals. (In Alabama, the second choices for the two leaders expressed on ballots for all candidates, including the two leaders, were added to the first-choice totals.)

The preference system, however, did not prove useful. Apparently it was too confusing for voters, most of whom did not bother to cast second-choice votes. In the Alabama election discussed above, for example, there were 130,814 first-choice votes, but only 34,768 second-choice votes.

Louisiana

Not satisfied with either the partisan runoff or the preferential primary, Louisiana adopted a law in 1975 that allowed its voters to participate in an initial open primary followed by a runoff general election, if needed, between the two top finishers. In the primary, all candidates of all parties were to be on the ballot, but party designations were optional and at the individual candidate's discretion. A candidate receiving more than 50 percent of the primary vote would be unopposed in the general election. If no candidate received more than 50 percent of the vote, the two candidates receiving the greatest number of votes—regardless of party—would oppose each other in the runoff general election. In 1978 Louisiana dispensed with the runoff general election if the primary winner received more than 50 percent of the vote. In 2008 it returned to a party primary system.

The two different outcomes were on display in two of Louisiana's recent Senate races. In 2002 Democratic incumbent Mary L. Landrieu led the first-round voting with 46.0 percent of the vote. But because she had not attained a majority, she was forced into a runoff with the first-round runner-up, Republican Suzanne Haik Terrell, who had finished second with 27.2 percent. In the December runoff the result was much closer, but Landrieu prevailed with 51.7 percent of the vote. Two years later, when veteran Democratic senator John B. Breaux was vacating his seat, Republican representative David Vitter took 51.0 percent of the vote in the first round, and no runoff was necessary.

COUNTY UNIT SYSTEM: GEORGIA

Another variant of the primary system was Georgia's county unit system. Each county in the state was apportioned a certain number of unit votes. The candidate who received the largest number of popular votes in the county was awarded all the county's unit votes, even if he won only a plurality and not a majority. A candidate had to have a majority of the state's county unit votes to win the primary; otherwise a runoff became necessary. The runoff also was held on the basis of the county unit system.

For example, as of 1946, there were 410 county unit votes. The eight most populous counties had six unit votes each, the next thirty most populous counties had four each, and the remaining 121 counties had two each. The system was weighted toward rural and sparsely populated areas, because every county, no matter how small, had at least two unit votes.

The county unit system sometimes produced winners who received less than a majority of popular votes. Although no senators were ever elected through the county unit system without also attaining a majority of the popular vote, political scientist Key found that in two of sixteen gubernatorial races between 1915 and 1948 the winner of a majority of county units received less than a majority of the popular votes. In a third case, that of 1946, the winner of the county unit vote, Eugene Talmadge, actually received fewer popular votes than his chief opponent, James V. Carmichael.

The county unit system fell before the Supreme Court's "one-person, one-vote" doctrine. In the 1963 case, Gray v. Sanders, the court declared the Georgia county unit system unconstitutional because of the disparity in representation between the urban and rural areas.

SPECIAL ELECTIONS

As in other states, special elections in the South are held to fill vacancies for Senate seats when they occur. However, vacancies sometimes happen at times inconvenient for going through the lengthy runoff primary process before the special election. Either the filing deadline for the primaries has passed, or the vacancy occurs in a year when there is no regular primary scheduled. In such cases, when Democrats still ruled the region, the Democratic state committee sometimes selected the party nominee without holding a primary.

This process led to unexpected results. In Arkansas in 1937, for example, a special election was held on Oct. 19 for the five years remaining in the term of Democratic senator Joseph T. Robinson, who had died in office. The Democratic state committee chose Gov. Carl E. Bailey as the party's official nominee. But Rep. John E. Miller promptly jumped into the race as an independent Democrat, complaining that Democratic voters had not been given a choice of who their nominee should be. The result was a Miller victory, with 60.5 percent of the vote.

In an even more sensational case, this time in a regular election, the Democratic Party leadership in South Carolina found its wishes thwarted in 1954 when it nominated Edgar A. Brown following the death of Sen. Burnet R. Maybank, who had won renomination in the June Democratic primary. Former governor Strom Thurmond, feeling aggrieved that he had been deprived of a chance for the Senate nomination, entered the November election as a write-in candidate. With the backing of the outgoing governor, James F. Byrnes, Thurmond won the race overwhelmingly, 143,444 to 83,525—making him the only senator ever elected on a write-in vote.

To avoid the pitfalls sometimes encountered when candidates are chosen without a primary, Texas adopted a method of holding special elections for U.S. House and Senate seats similar to the one currently used in Louisiana for general elections. All candidates, no matter which party they belong to, compete in a free-for-all first election. If no one receives a majority, a second election is held between the top two candidates, regardless of party. Thus, the second election could occur between two Democrats, between two Republicans, or between a Democrat and a Republican or even between third-party candidates. The system received its first prominent test in the 1961 special Senate contest to fill the vacancy caused when Democratic senator Lyndon B. Johnson resigned to become vice president. In the first contest, there were seventy-three candidates competing, with Republican John G. Tower and Democrat William Blakley finishing first and second. The second election resulted in a Tower victory by a vote of 448,217 to 437,874.

This electoral system was also employed in Texas's 1993 special Senate election to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Democratic senator Lloyd Bentsen to become secretary of the Treasury in the Clinton administration. Former Democratic representative Robert Krueger had been appointed to fill the vacancy in early 1993. But Krueger narrowly trailed Republican Kay Bailey Hutchison among the field of two dozen candidates in the first round of voting that May, and he was decisively defeated by Hutchison in the June runoff by a margin of more than two-to-one.

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Closely connected with the history of southern Democratic primaries is the issue of race. In many southern states, African Americans were long barred from participation in the Democratic primary, either on a statewide basis or in various counties. To exclude blacks from the primaries, the Democratic Party was designated as a private association or club. The practice was defended as constitutional because the Fifteenth Amendment, ratified in 1870, prohibited only states, not private associations, from denying the right to vote to persons on account of race or color. However, in 1944 the Supreme Court, in the case of Smith v. Allwright, declared the white primary unconstitutional, holding that it was an integral part of the election machinery for choosing state and federal officials.

Poll Tax

Another device used in limiting both black and white voters was the poll tax, which required the payment of a fee before voting. The amount of the poll tax ranged from one to two dollars, but in Alabama, Mississippi, Virginia, and Georgia the tax was cumulative before 1945. Thus, a new voter in Georgia could face up to $47 in fees. Various regulations as to the time and manner of payment of the tax also substantially reduced the number of voters. In Mississippi, for example, a person wanting to vote in the Democratic primary (usually held in August) had to pay the poll tax on or before the first day of the two preceding Februarys—long before most voters had even begun to think about the election.

The poll tax was barred in federal elections by ratification of the Twenty-fourth Amendment in January 1964. The amendment simply stated that the “right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election... shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any other State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.”

Literacy Tests

The literacy test was another method used to limit the southern franchise to whites. Voters were required to read and/or write correctly—usually a section of the state or federal Constitution. Sometimes, voters who could not pass the test could have the materials read to them, to see if they could “understand” or “interpret” it correctly. This provision allowed local voting officials, inevitably whites, to judge whether voters passed the tests; it usually resulted in whites passing and blacks failing.

However, in his study of southern politics, Key concluded that informal pressures—including economic reprisals and other sanctions—were more important in limiting the black franchise than were the official suffrage limitations.

By the 1970s most formal bars to voting in the South, and many informal ones, had been lifted, either by constitutional amendment, federal laws, state action, or protest movements.

Introduction

THE U.S. SYSTEM OF SELECTING a president and vice president through indirect means is perhaps more complicated than it needs to be. But it has worked with few major repairs for more than two hundred years, generally satisfying the citizenry and meeting the nation's changing needs.

The election happens every four years and permits the peaceful transfer of power or continuation of the status quo for four more years, no matter how bitter or divisive the campaign that preceded it. Indeed, the American electoral system differs from those of other nations and, for all its flaws, is the envy of many other countries. From time to time, however, pressure mounts for abolishing the electoral college system in favor of the direct popular election process used in other major democracies. After each such wave of protest, the demands for reform have gradually faded and the electoral college has survived into the twenty-first century—even weathering the bitter 2000 election and the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attack on the United States.

Nevertheless, significant changes have taken place within the system. As the nation and the electorate have grown and technology has evolved, presidential elections have become more expensive. In 2008 preliminary data showed that the candidates alone spent nearly $1.8 billion in the primary and general elections, shattering all previous records. This does not reflect the enormous amounts spent by outside groups. Overall, total outlays were estimated at $3.1 billion. (See Table 3-2, p. 80.)

Because of the high costs, money and its abuses account for the biggest continuing blemish on the system, despite the myriad campaign finance reforms enacted since the 1970s to avoid corruption and lessen the influence of special interests. On the more positive side, presidential nominations have become more open and representative of the voters at large. Party bosses no longer dictate the choice of nominees. Instead, the nominations are won through a hard-fought series of primary elections and party caucuses, where rank-and-file party members have an opportunity to express their preference. Once forums for determining who would head the presidential ticket, national party conventions today perform different functions, including ratification of the nominations won in the primaries.

As televised spectacles, the conventions remain important to the parties' public relations efforts during the intense weeks before the November election. Although ratings have dropped in recent years, millions of people still watch the conventions on television, and major political parties try to capture and hold as much of that audience as possible. With expert advice they have streamlined the proceedings to showcase their nominees in prime time as the countdown begins to election day. In these final campaign stages, today's nominees usually keep intact the organizations they built to help them survive the primaries. These increasingly professional organizations are made up of the candidate, his or her family, a running mate, polling and political consultants, fund-raisers, media consultants, issues advisers, schedulers, advance persons, and others. Campaign strategies must be carefully managed if the candidate is to move successfully through the primary season, the nominating conventions, and the general election campaign.

WHO RUNS FOR PRESIDENT

Candidates for president or vice president must meet the same few constitutional requirements. They must be at least thirty-five years old and natural-born citizens who have "been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States."

Another requirement, one that affects very few people, is that the candidate must not have been elected president twice before. The Twenty-second Amendment, ratified in 1951, limits presidents to two four-year terms. A vice president who succeeds to the presidency and serves more than two years may be elected president only once. Franklin D. Roosevelt, whose breaking of the two-term tradition prompted the term limitation, is the only president who served more than eight years. He died in 1945 at the start of his fourth term.

More than half (twenty-six) of the nation's presidents have been lawyers, including Barack Obama. He was the forty-fourth president but only the forty-third person to hold the office; (Grover Cleveland is counted twice because he served two separate terms.) Twenty-five presidents served in Congress. Fourteen have been vice presidents. Nineteen presidents have been territorial or state governors. Most presidents have served in the military and three were career generals: Zachary Taylor, Ulysses S. Grant, and Dwight D. Eisenhower. (See "Roads to the White House," p. 264.)

Even for well-known public figures, the decision to seek the presidency is a difficult one. The prospective candidates must make complicated calculations about financial and time requirements; they must sort out the tangle of party and state rules and the makeup of the electorate in each state; and they must assess their ability to attract endorsements, recruit a competent staff, and develop an "image" suitable for media presentation. Would-be candidates must also consider the effect a campaign will have on their families, the psychological demands of the office, and possible revelations about their personal lives that might hinder a campaign.

An example of family considerations arose in 1996 from the popularity of retired general Colin L. Powell, the first African American to head the armed forces joint chiefs of staff and one of the architects of the successful 1991 Persian Gulf War. Although polls that year showed Powell would have been a strong contender for the Republican presidential nomination, he declined to seek it, saying he had promised his wife he would stay out of politics. (A pledge he reiterated while serving as secretary of state from 2001 to 2005.) Also in 1996, the man who won the Republican nomination, Robert J. "Bob" Dole, worried that the press would disclose an affair he had while married to his first wife. In his televised debates with President Bill Clinton, who had faced a similar scandal in 1992, Dole did not raise the character issue, reportedly fearing it would open himself to the same criticism. Although Dole's affair was disclosed before the election, it received scant attention and was not a major factor in Dole's defeat.

THE EXPLORATORY STAGE

The first stage in a presidential campaign is the exploratory stage, when the candidates "test the waters" for a try at the nation's highest office. Before announcing, a candidate routinely establishes a political action committee (PAC) to raise money and an exploratory committee to help assess the candidate's chances of challenging the competition. The exploratory advisers identify likely opponents and consider funding prospects and other preliminary factors, and if conditions appear favorable, the committee may form the nucleus of the candidate's campaign organization.

Since 1976, when Jimmy Carter won the presidency after a two-year campaign, candidates have tended to announce their intentions well ahead of the election, in part to have time to build a strong public profile and in part because early fund-raising can be crucial to a campaign. In 2000, with Clinton barred from seeking a third term, the looming White House vacancy drew a large field of Republican candidates. Among the first to form an exploratory committee in 1999 was Elizabeth Dole, wife of the 1996

Republican nominee. She decided against running, citing the difficulty of competing against Texas governor George W. Bush's fund-raising powerhouse. Several other prominent Republicans challenged Bush, including Arizona senator John McCain, who won the primaries in New Hampshire and six other states. But he, like the other contenders, eventually ceded the nomination to Bush.

Dole's decision to pull out of the race one year before the election illustrates a characteristic of U.S. presidential elections: they are endurance contests. From start to finish they are much longer, for example, than the few months typically devoted to parliamentary elections in Great Britain. By Labor Day, a good two months before the November election, many American voters are tired of listening to the candidates and have already made up their minds how they will vote.

THE PRIMARY AND CAUCUS SCHEDULE

If a candidate decides to seek a major party nomination, the next step is to enter the primaries and caucuses where Democratic and Republican party members select delegates to their national conventions. The states and the parties have a wide variety of rules for ballot access qualifications and allocation of delegates. Candidates must follow legal requirements to qualify for state contests, and they also have to adapt their campaign strategies to each state's particular circumstances. In 2008 the Democratic Party penalized its state organizations in Florida and Michigan for scheduling primaries earlier than party rules allowed. However, at the national convention in August the party relented and the delegations from both states were seated with full voting rights. Sen. Obama, then the party's presumptive nominee for president, requested that they be seated.

The process of filing to be a presidential candidate can be daunting. In 1988 Rep. Patricia Schroeder of Colorado cited the complexity of state rules as a major factor in her decision not to seek the Democratic presidential nomination. Independent H. Ross Perot made it a condition of his 1992 candidacy that his supporters obtain enough signatures to get his name on the ballot in all fifty states. They succeeded.

Traditionally, the New Hampshire primary and the Iowa caucus are the first delegate-selection events, a head start that gives the two states extraordinary influence over the selection process. (For forty years beginning in 1952, no president was elected without first winning the New Hampshire primary. Bill Clinton broke that precedent in 1992, as did George W. Bush in 2000 and Obama in 2008). Critics have complained that the system is unrepresentative because both states are predominantly rural, with largely white, Anglo-Saxon, Protestant populations. But no serious efforts have been made to change the pattern.

Democratic Party rules prevent other states from scheduling their primaries earlier than the New Hampshire and Iowa events. Republican caucuses are permitted earlier in Alaska, Hawaii, Louisiana, and Guam. For other states and territories, the primary and caucus period begins in late February or early March and ends in early June. The early primaries have grown in importance. Especially when the campaign does not have an obvious front-runner, the early contests single out a possible leader. After several early tests, the field of candidates shrinks. In 2000 both Republican Bush and Democrat Albert "Al" Gore Jr. had secured their party's nomination by mid-March, a feat made possible by the "front loading" of primaries earlier and earlier in presidential election years. In that election year sixteen states held presidential primaries on Super Tuesday, March 7. Although Bush defeated McCain in most of the primaries after New Hampshire, McCain nevertheless received more than five million votes in the 2000 primaries—the most ever amassed by a Republican candidate who did not win the nomination. In 2008, when he won the nomination, McCain received almost ten million primary votes. (See “2008 Presidential Primaries,” pp. 477–486.)

In 2004, with President Bush unopposed for renomination, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts had clinched the Democratic nomination for president by early March, after several of his challengers had dropped out, including Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who exited March 3. Kerry later chose Edwards as his running mate.

The 2008 presidential primaries, with Bush ineligible to run for a third term, drew large fields of candidates from both parties—nine Democrats and thirteen Republicans. Most of these had dropped out well before the fall nominating conventions.

THE PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION

The primary season culminates in the two national party conventions, usually held in late July or August. At these conventions, where guests and reporters outnumber the thousands of delegates, the presidential and vice-presidential nominees are formally selected and a party platform, setting out the party’s goals for the next four years, is approved. In recent elections, the convention also has become an important occasion for showcasing party unity after the sometimes divisive primary battles. In 2008 the two major parties held back-to-back conventions in late August and early September. In 2004 and 2008, each party received about $50 million in federal funds for its convention, mostly for security.

The first national convention was held in 1831, and for more than a century afterward state party leaders had the ultimate say in deciding who the presidential nominee would be. As direct primaries took hold in the twentieth century, this influence began to wane. Then in the 1970s and 1980s, the Democrats initiated a series of presidential selection reforms that opened the nominating process. The reforms were expected to result in more open conventions, but instead they led to even more primaries. (See box, Changes in Democrat’s Nominating Rules, p. 495.)

Victory in the primaries, however, does not mean the primary leader faces no opposition at the convention. Other candidates may stay in the race because they hope to benefit if the leader falters, or they may use the bloc of delegates committed to them to bargain for specific planks in the platform or to influence the selection of the vice-presidential nominee.

Before the widespread use of primaries, the conventions were more competitive and frenetic than they are

TABLE 8-2 Campaign Lengths for Presidential Candidates, 2008

Aspirants for the White House often begin their campaigns for the nomination months before the nominating conventions, sometimes as long as two years earlier. Candidates for the party that does not hold the White House, or in years where there is no incumbent such as 2008, usually begin the earliest. This table shows the dates on which Democratic and Republican candidates for the 2008 contest officially opened their campaigns and the dates on which they dropped out. For the two winners, Barack Obama and John McCain, the dates listed are the days on which they officially received their party’s nomination at the conventions, although their campaigns continued to election day.

today. All the candidates still in the race had substantial campaign operations at the conventions. Campaign managers and strategists kept in close contact with state delegations. Candidates deployed floor leaders and “whips” to direct voting on the convention floor and to deal with any problems that arose among state delegations. In addition, “floaters” wandered the crowded floor in search of any signs of trouble. Floor leaders, whips, and floaters often wore specially colored clothing or caps so that they could be spotted easily on the convention floor.

This spectacle, however, became a rarity. It has been decades since either major party took more than one ballot to nominate a president. But in 1996 Reform Party founder Perot faced opposition from former Colorado governor Richard D. Lamm. In a two-step procedure the party nominated Perot at the second of two conventions.

At party conventions, nominating speeches mark the beginning of the formal selection process. These remarks are usually followed by a series of short seconding speeches, and all of the speeches are accompanied by floor demonstrations staged by delegates supporting the candidate. For many years a good deal of convention time was taken up by the nomination of favorite sons, candidates nominated by their state's delegation. Such nominations were seldom taken seriously, and since 1972 both parties have instituted rules that have effectively stopped them.

In recent years, the balloting for the presidential nominee has been anticlimactic. More attention focuses on whom the presidential nominee will select as a running mate. Even then, much of the suspense has been removed because the leading presidential candidates may have named their running mates well before the convention begins. That was not the case in 2008, when Republican nominee John McCain, just before the convention, surprised the political world by choosing a woman, the little-known Alaska governor, Sarah Palin, as his running mate.

With the young, politically moderate, all-southern ticket of Clinton and Gore in 1992 an obvious exception, the choice of the vice-presidential candidate often has been motivated by an effort to balance the ticket geographically. For years, a balanced ticket was one that boasted an easterner and a midwesterner. More recently, the balance has shifted so that the split is more often between a northerner and a southerner. Some examples: Democrats John F. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas in 1960, Johnson and Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota in 1964, Jimmy Carter of Georgia and Walter F. Mondale of Minnesota in 1976, Kerry of Massachusetts and Edwards of North Carolina in 2004, and Obama of Illinois and Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware in 2008; and Republicans Barry Goldwater of Arizona and William E. Miller of New York in 1964, George W. Bush of Texas and Richard B. Cheney of Wyoming in 2000, and McCain of Arizona and Palin of Alaska in 2008.

Ideology also plays a part in the balance. A liberal presidential candidate may be paired with a more conservative running mate to attract a broader base of voters. Or the choice of the vice-presidential candidate may be used to appease party factions who are unhappy with the presidential candidate. Additionally, governors generally choose running mates with Washington credentials, such as senators. With the increasing number of vice presidents who go on to be president, more attention is given to the abilities of the person who is chosen, and more prominent figures are willing to accept the nomination.

The method for nominating the vice-presidential candidate mirrors the procedure for presidential nominations. The climax of the convention then occurs with the two nominees' acceptance speeches and their first appearance together, with their families, on the podium.

GENERAL ELECTION CAMPAIGN

The traditional opening of the presidential election campaign is Labor Day, just two months before the general election on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November. In recent years, however, candidates have been unwilling to wait until Labor Day to capitalize on their postconvention bounce in the polls.

The campaign organization for the general election is usually an extension of the nomination organization, and it is separate from the national and state party organizations. Nominees normally have the prerogative of naming their party's national committee chair to help coordinate the campaign.

The national campaign committee, usually based in Washington, D.C., receives its funding from the Federal Election Commission (FEC). In exchange for federal funding, the campaign must agree not to spend more than it receives from the FEC. From 1975, when federal funding of elections began, to 2004 all major party nominees accepted the government funds for their general election campaigns. In 2008, however, Democrat Obama rejected public money for the fall campaign so that he could continue his highly successful fund-raising operation. Republican McCain accepted the federal funds and accused Obama of reneging on his pledge to do the same. Neither candidate took the checkoff money for their primary campaigns. (See Chapter 3.) A president running for reelection has inherent advantages that may tilt the balance in the incumbent's favor. The incumbent already has the stature of the presidency and is able to influence media coverage by using official presidential actions and "pork-barrel politics" to appeal to specific constituencies. The president also benefits from the public's reluctance to reject a tested national leader for an unknown quantity.

In times of economic or foreign policy difficulties, however, the president's prominence can have negative effects on the campaign. President Carter's bid for a second term was plagued by both a sagging economy and Iran's continued holding of U.S. citizens as hostages. In 1992, after achieving record-high approval ratings for success in the Gulf War, President George H.W. Bush saw his reelection hopes dashed by an economic recession, which he was slow to acknowledge and which the Democrats used to advantage with their emphasis on "it's the economy, stupid."

Debates

Now almost taken for granted, presidential and vice-presidential candidate debates are a relatively recent phenomenon. Until the second half of the twentieth century, White House nominees did not debate. Richard Nixon and Kennedy began the debate tradition on September 26, 1960, with the first of four televised meetings. When Abraham Lincoln and Stephen A. Douglas held their famed debates in

TABLE 8-3 “Minority” Presidents

Under the U.S. electoral system, there have been eighteen presidential elections (decided by either the electoral college itself or by the House of Representatives) where the victor did not receive a majority of the popular votes cast in the election. Four of these presidents—John Quincy Adams in 1824, Rutherford B. Hayes in 1876, Benjamin Harrison in 1888, and George W. Bush in 2000—actually trailed their opponents in the popular vote.

The following table shows the percentage of the popular vote received by candidates in the eighteen elections in which a “minority” president (designated by boldface type) was elected:

1858 they were Senate candidates; they did not debate as presidential candidates two years later.

There were no debates from 1960 until 1976, when President Gerald R. Ford, running behind in the polls, agreed to debate the Democratic nominee, former Georgia governor Carter. The relatively unknown Carter gained stature in the exchange when Ford made a gaffe by saying he did not believe East European nations were under Soviet Union control. Since 1976 all major party nominees have debated on live television. Independent candidate Perot was included in the presidential debates in 1992, but he was excluded as the Reform Party nominee in 1996.

Unlike formal, academic debates, the presidential confrontations have been loosely structured, at first with a panel of journalists or audience members asking the questions. Beginning in 1992, debate sponsors began having a journalist moderator question the candidates, with the audience sometimes allowed to participate. Throughout, there have been no judges to award points and therefore no way to determine who “won” or “lost” except by public opinion polling. Media commentators make immediate assessments of winners and losers, however, and their judgments undoubtedly influence the public’s opinion about which candidate “won” the debate.

With one exception, vice-presidential nominees have debated since 1976 when Ford’s running mate Bob Dole faced Democrat Mondale. There was no debate in 1980 between Vice President Mondale and the Republican nominee, George H.W. Bush. The nominees in 2000, Republican Cheney and Democrat Joseph I. Lieberman, debated once. In 2004 Vice President Cheney and Edwards, the Democratic nominee, also debated once, as did 2008 nominees Palin and Biden.

Early in the presidential debate era, the television networks or the League of Women Voters sponsored the debates. Since 1988 they have been sponsored by the bipartisan Commission on Presidential Debates.

The Popular Vote

The United States’ winner-take-all electoral college system gives presidential and vice-presidential nominees an incentive to campaign where the votes are. Because in most states the leading vote-getter wins all that state’s electoral votes, the system encourages nominees to win as many populous states as possible. Nominees generally spend most of their time in closely contested states, and just enough time in “likely win” states to ensure victory. Appearances in unfavorable states are usually symbolic efforts to show that the candidate is not conceding anything.

In the electoral college, states have votes equal to their representation in Congress: two for the senators and at least one for the representatives, for a total of 538 votes. (The District of Columbia has the three votes it would have if it were a state.) Two states, Maine and Nebraska, permit splitting their electoral votes between the state-wide winner and the winner in each of the congressional districts (two in Maine, three in Nebraska). No such split had occurred until 2008, when Obama won one district and one electoral vote in Nebraska. (See “Electoral College,” p. 263; and Chapter 17, The Electoral College.)

Four times in U.S. history—most recently in 2000—the winner of the presidential popular vote has lost the electoral college vote. In these and other close presidential races, a shift of a few hundred votes within one or two states could have changed the result of the election. In the most notable example, in 2000 Bush won Florida’s twenty-five electoral votes by a scant 537 votes out of more than six million popular votes cast. After the Supreme Court halted Gore’s requested manual recount, those 537 votes gave Bush the bare electoral vote majority he needed to win.

The disputed Florida election brought renewed calls for abolition or reform of the electoral college system. But it also spurred demands for modernization of methods of casting, recording, and reporting of the popular vote throughout the United States. The election brought to light that 37 percent of all U.S. registered voters were still being required to use outmoded punch-card voting systems similar to those blamed for much of the difficulty in Florida. By 2004, largely to avoid a repeat of the Florida fiasco, many states and counties had modernized their voting systems, cutting in half the percentage of voters using punch-card systems. (See “Removing Obstacles to Voting,” p. 41.)

Previously, little attention had been paid nationally to voting systems. Each state or locality was free to purchase whatever type of system it wanted or could afford, although the FEC set standards for such equipment and recommended purchase of systems that met those standards.

Campaign finance reform and efforts to make registration easier and increase voter participation received higher priority from most groups in the final decades of the twentieth century. The National Voter Registration Act of 1993, the motor-voter act, which enabled people to obtain registration forms when they picked up driver's licenses, was an example of laws that helped put millions more people on the voting rolls. Yet the changes did not necessarily translate into higher turnouts at the polls. (See "Elections: An Expanding Franchise," p. 23.)

By 2008 most jurisdictions had modernized their voting systems, with many using some form of optical scanning in which the voters use a marker to fill in their ballots, which can then be read by the machine. Some such systems leave a "paper trail," whereby the ballots can be stored and recounted if necessary. The 2008 elections elicited few complaints nationwide about the voting technology. Nevertheless, the most persistent complaints were over systems that lacked a paper trail for verifying the election result at a particular polling place. After 2008, states and manufacturers continued to work to address these complaints.

Similarly, actions to expand the electorate took place at both the state and federal levels. Voting qualifications varied widely because the U.S. Constitution (Article I, Section 2) permits the states to set their own voting standards. Early in the nation's history, the states dropped their property qualifications for voting, but some retained literacy tests as late as 1970.

On the federal level the Constitution has been amended five times to circumvent state qualifications denying the franchise to certain categories of people. The Fourteenth Amendment, ratified in 1868, directed Congress to reduce the number of representatives from any state that disfranchised adult male citizens for any reason other than commission of a crime. However, no such reduction was ever made. The Fifteenth Amendment, ratified in 1870, prohibited denial of the right to vote "on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude," and the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920 prohibited denial of that right "on account of sex." The Twenty-fourth Amendment, which came into effect in 1964, barred denial of the right to vote in any federal election "by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax." Finally, in 1971 the Twenty-sixth Amendment lowered the voting age to eighteen in federal, state, and local elections.

Congress in the 1950s and 1960s enacted a series of statutes to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment's guarantee against racial discrimination in voting. A law passed in 1970 nullified state residence requirements of longer than thirty days for voting in presidential elections, suspended literacy tests for a five-year period (the suspension was made permanent in 1975), and lowered the minimum voting age to eighteen years from twenty-one, the requirement then in effect in most states. A 1970 Supreme Court ruling upheld the voting-age change for federal elections but invalidated it for state and local elections. In the same decision the Court upheld the provision on residence requirements and sustained the suspension of literacy tests with respect to both state and local elections. The Twenty-sixth Amendment was ratified six months after the Court's decision.

The right to vote in presidential elections was extended to citizens of the District of Columbia by the Twenty-third Amendment, ratified in 1961. District residents had been disfranchised from national elections except for a brief period in the 1870s when they elected a nonvoting delegate to the House of Representatives. In 1970 Congress took another step toward full suffrage for District residents by again authorizing the election of a nonvoting delegate to the House.

Through the various state or federal reforms, virtually all citizens aged eighteen or over were eligible to vote at the beginning of the twenty-first century. By 2001, following the decennial census, the U.S. Census Bureau estimated the nation's voting-age population at 205.8 million. But a relatively low 105.4 million voted in the 2000 presidential election, for a turnout rate of 51.2 percent. The numbers improved in the 2004 election when 122.3 million, or 56.7 percent, voted for president, the highest turnout since 1968. In 2008 the presidential turnout was slightly higher at 131.3 million, or 56.8 percent of the voting-age population. (See also alternative calculations, p. 28.)

Because the United States does not register voters nationally, reliable figures on the number of registered voters were not available until motor-voter required states to report the numbers to the FEC. In 1996 the states reported a total of 146.2 million registered voters. Using that figure, only about 71.0 percent of voting-age citizens were registered in 2000, and the turnout was about 72.1 percent.

ELECTORAL COLLEGE

Even after the winner has declared victory and the loser has conceded defeat, at least two more steps must be taken before a president-elect is officially declared. The first occurs on the first Monday after the second Wednesday in December. On that day electors meet in their respective state capitals to cast their votes for president.

Each state has as many electors as it has members of Congress. Typically, slates of electors are pledged before the popular election to each of the presidential nominees. The presidential nominee who wins the state wins that state's electors. Although the Constitution does not require electors to remain faithful to their pledge of support for a particular candidate, many states have laws to that effect. Such laws, however, are generally regarded as unenforceable and likely unconstitutional. There have been several instances in which “faithless electors” did not vote for their party’s nominee.

The second step occurs when the electors’ ballots are opened and counted before a joint session of Congress in early January. The candidate who wins a majority of the vote is declared the president-elect and is inaugurated three weeks later on January 20. The counting of electoral votes by a joint session of Congress is normally a routine affair. But in 2001 a number of Democratic House members attempted unsuccessfully to have Florida’s controversial twenty-five electoral votes for George W. Bush thrown out. Likewise, in 2005 several House Democrats and one Democratic senator, Barbara Boxer of California, failed to block the counting of Ohio’s twenty electoral votes on grounds that thousands of mostly minority voters had been disfranchised by numerous irregularities. By contrast, the electoral vote counting on January 8, 2009, was conducted without incident. Obama and Biden each received 365 electoral votes to 173 each for McCain and Palin.

In the rare event that no presidential candidate receives a majority of the electoral college vote, the election is thrown into the House of Representatives. If no vice-presidential candidate receives a majority of the electoral college vote, the Senate makes the selection.

TERM OF OFFICE

A president’s term begins with inauguration at noon on January 20 following the November election. Until the Twentieth Amendment was ratified in 1933, presidents were not inaugurated until March 4, leaving a four-month hiatus between the election and the inauguration. The briefer interval established by the so-called lame-duck amendment shortened the period in which the nation had, in effect, two presidents—the outgoing president and an incoming president-elect. Yet the amendment allowed time for an orderly transition between the old and the new administrations.

The Twentieth Amendment took effect in 1933 after President Franklin Roosevelt and Vice President John Nance Garner had been sworn in. In 1937, at the beginning of their second terms, they became the first president and vice president inaugurated on January 20.

ROADS TO THE WHITE HOUSE

The earliest tradition concerning the path to the presidency developed around the secretary of state, who was considered the preeminent cabinet officer and therefore the most important person in the executive branch after the president. Thomas Jefferson was George Washington’s first secretary of state. Although he left the cabinet early in Washington’s second term, he went on to become leader of the newly formed Democratic-Republican Party and its candidate for president in 1796, 1800, and 1804. Losing to John Adams in 1796, Jefferson came back to win four years later.

In turn, James Madison, Jefferson’s secretary of state for two terms, won the presidency in 1808. Madison had been a close ally of Jefferson’s in the political struggles of the 1790s and served throughout Jefferson’s two presidential terms as secretary of state (1801–1809). During his first term as president, Madison appointed fellow Virginian James Monroe as his secretary of state. And following in what was rapidly becoming a tradition, Monroe went on to the presidency in 1816, serving two terms (1817–1825).

Throughout Monroe’s terms, the secretary of state was John Quincy Adams, son of former president John Adams. At the end of Monroe’s second term, five major candidates entered the race to succeed him. Three were cabinet officers, including Adams. After none of the candidates acquired a majority in the electoral college, the House of Representatives chose Secretary of State Adams.

Adams was the last secretary of state to go directly from his cabinet post to the White House. After him, only two secretaries of state made it to the White House at all—Martin Van Buren, who was secretary of state under President Andrew Jackson from 1829 to 1831 and president from 1837 to 1841, and James Buchanan, who served as secretary of state from 1845 to 1849 under President James K. Polk and as president from 1857 to 1861.

Two other institutions died at approximately the same time as the cabinet tradition—the Virginia dynasty and “King Caucus,” a derogatory term referring to the congressional party caucuses that met throughout the early 1800s to designate presidential nominees.

After the four Virginians who occupied the presidency during the first thirty-six years of the Republic—Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe—there have been no elected presidents who were born in and made their careers in Virginia. John Tyler was born there but succeeded to the presidency from the vice presidency in 1841 and was not renominated. Three other presidents were born in Virginia but made their careers elsewhere—William Henry Harrison, Zachary Taylor, and Woodrow Wilson.

During its heyday, the Washington-centered mentality of King Caucus had virtually guaranteed that cabinet officers should be among those most often nominated by the party in power. But the caucus came under attack as being undemocratic and unrepresentative and ceased to function as a presidential nominating mechanism after 1824. It was eventually replaced by the national party conventions, bodies that are not connected with Congress and that, as of the 2008 presidential election, had never met in the national capital.

Military Men

The next cycle of American politics, from the presidency of Jackson (1829–1837) to the Civil War, saw a variety of backgrounds qualify candidates for the presidency. One of the most prevalent was the military. Jackson, who ran in 1824 (unsuccessfully), 1828, and 1832, was a general in the War of 1812, gaining near-heroic stature by his defeat of the British at the Battle of New Orleans in January 1815. Like most military officers who rose to the presidency, however, Jackson was only a part-time military man. As a politician, he had served in the U.S. House during Washington's presidency and in the Senate during the administration of John Adams, as well as later under Monroe and John Quincy Adams.

Other candidates during this era who were or had been military officers included William Henry Harrison, a Whig candidate in 1836 and 1840; Taylor, the Whig candidate in 1848; Winfield Scott, the 1852 Whig candidate; Franklin Pierce, the Democratic nominee in 1852; and John C. Fremont in 1856, the Republican Party's first presidential candidate. From 1824 through 1856, all but one presidential election (1844) featured a major candidate with a military background.

Career general Ulysses S. Grant was elected president in 1868 and 1872.

Like Jackson, Harrison had a mixed military and political career. A member of a distinguished Virginia family, he was the son of a signer of the Declaration of Independence. Harrison served in Congress during the John Adams administration and again under Madison, Monroe, and John Quincy Adams. In between, he battled American Indians and the British during the War of 1812.

Taylor and Scott led victorious armies in the Mexican War. Pierce also had a command in the Mexican War, although he had been primarily a politician, with service in both the House and the Senate during the 1830s and 1840s. Fremont was famous as an explorer as well as for a dashing military campaign through California during the Mexican War. Later, he was a U.S. senator from the young state of California (1850–1851).

The smoldering political conflicts of the 1840s and 1850s probably contributed to the naming of military men for the presidency. Generals usually had escaped involvement in national politics and had avoided taking stands on the issues that divided the country—slavery, expansion, the currency, and the tariff. In 1840, for example, the Whigs adopted no platform or statement of principle; they simply nominated Harrison and assumed that his personal popularity plus the resentments against Van Buren's administration would suffice for Whig victory. They were correct.

Later on, the nature of the Civil War almost automatically led at least one of the parties to choose a military officer as presidential standard-bearer every four years. To have been on the “right” side during the war—fighting to save the Union and destroy slavery—was a major political asset in the North and Midwest, where tens of thousands of war veterans were effectively organized in the Grand Army of the Republic (GAR). The GAR became part of the backbone of the Republican Party during the last third of the nineteenth century.

Consequently, it became customary for Republicans to have a Civil War officer at the head of their ticket. Except for James G. Blaine in 1884, every Republican presidential nominee from 1868 to 1900 had served as an officer in the Union Army during the Civil War. Blaine, who had spent the war years as a Maine state legislator and a member of the U.S. House, lost the election to Grover Cleveland.

Of all the late-nineteenth-century Republican nominees, however, only Ulysses S. Grant, who was elected president in 1868 and 1872, was a professional military man. The others—Rutherford B. Hayes in 1876, James A. Garfield in 1880, Benjamin Harrison in 1888 and 1892, and William McKinley in 1896 and 1900—were civilians who volunteered for Civil War service. Two of them—Hayes and Garfield—were elected to the House while serving in the army. At the time of their presidential nominations, Hayes was governor of Ohio, Garfield was minority leader of the U.S. House and a senator-elect, Harrison was a former senator from Indiana, and McKinley was a former governor of Ohio.

WHAT THEY DID BEFORE THEY BECAME PRESIDENT

This list gives the terms of office for each president and the public jobs each held before becoming president.

Franklin Pierce. 1829–1833, New Hampshire House; 1833–1837, U.S. House (N.H.); 1837–1842, U.S. Senate (N.H.); 1846–1848, U.S. Army; 1850, delegate to New Hampshire constitutional convention; 1853–1857, president.

James Buchanan. 1814–1815, Pennsylvania House; 1821–1831, U.S. House (Pa.); 1832–1833, minister to Russia; 1834–1845, U.S. Senate (Pa.); 1845–1849, secretary of state; 1853–1856, minister to Great Britain; 1857–1861, president.

Abraham Lincoln. 1833, postmaster, New Salem, Illinois; 1835–1840, Illinois General Assembly; 1847–1849, U.S. House (Ill.); 1861–1865, president.

Andrew Johnson. 1828–1829, alderman, Greeneville, Tenn.; 1830–1833, mayor, Greeneville, Tenn.; 1835–1837, Tennessee House; 1839–1841, Tennessee House; 1841, Tennessee Senate; 1843–1853, U.S. House (Tenn.); 1853–1857, governor of Tennessee; 1857–1862, U.S. Senate (Tenn.); 1862–1865, military governor of Tennessee; 1865, vice president; 1865–1869, president.

Ulysses S. Grant. 1843–1854, U.S. Army; 1861–1865, general, U.S. Army; 1867–1868, secretary of war; 1869–1877, president.

The Democrats, who had been split over the war, had few prominent military veterans to choose from. Only twice between 1860 and 1900 did the Democrats pick a Civil War officer as their nominee, and both lost. In 1864, during the war, the Democrats nominated Gen. George B. McClellan, the Union military commander who had fallen out with President Abraham Lincoln. In 1880 Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock of Pennsylvania was the Democrats' choice.

New York and Indiana

From the Civil War to the midtwentieth century, several governors or former governors of New York were

Rutherford B. Hayes. 1857–1859, Cincinnati city solicitor; 1861–1865, U.S. Army; 1865–1867, U.S. House (Ohio); 1868–1872, governor of Ohio; 1876–1877, governor of Ohio; 1877–1881, president.

Gerald R. Ford. 1949–1973, U.S. House (Mich.); 1973–1974, vice president; 1974–1977, president.

Jimmy Carter. 1946–1953, U.S. Navy; 1955–1962, chairman, Sumter County (Ga.) Board of Education; 1963–1967, Georgia Senate; 1971–1975, governor of Georgia; 1977–1981, president.

Ronald Reagan. 1967–1975, governor of California; 1981–1989, president.

George H.W. Bush. 1942–1945, U.S. Navy; 1967–1971, U.S. House (Texas); 1971–1973, ambassador to the United Nations; 1974–1975, chief of U.S. Liaison Office, Beijing, People's Republic of China; 1976–1977, director of Central Intelligence Agency; 1981–1989, vice president; 1989–1993, president.

Bill Clinton. 1977–1979, attorney general of Arkansas; 1979–1981, governor of Arkansas; 1983–1993, governor of Arkansas; 1993–2001 president.

George W. Bush. 1995–2000, governor of Texas; 2001–2009, president.

Barack Obama. 1997–2004, Illinois State Senate; 2005–2008, U.S. Senate (Ill.); 2009–, president.

Democratic standard bearers. The 1868 nominee was Horatio Seymour, who had been governor there 1853–1855 and again 1863–1865. In 1876 the Democrats chose Samuel J. Tilden, New York's reform governor who was battling Tammany Hall. In 1884 Cleveland, another New York reform governor, captured the Democratic nomination. He went on to become the first Democrat to win the White House in twenty-eight years. Cleveland was again the Democratic nominee in 1888 and 1892.

Besides being the most populous state, New York was a swing state in presidential politics. During the period from Reconstruction through the turn of the century, most southern states voted Democratic, although the Republicans usually carried Pennsylvania, the Midwest, and New England. A New Yorker appeared as the nominee for president or vice president of at least one of the major parties in every election from 1868 through 1892.

This general tradition was maintained through the candidacy of Thomas E. Dewey, Republican governor of New York, in 1948. Only twice between 1868 and 1948 was there no New Yorker on the national ticket of at least one of the major parties—for president or vice president. Once, in 1944, both major party presidential nominees, Democrat Franklin Roosevelt and Republican Dewey, were from New York.

From 1952 to 2008, however, no New Yorkers were nominated by a major party for president and only three for vice president. The latter three were Rep. William E. Miller, R, in 1964; Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro, D, in 1984; and Rep. Jack Kemp, R, in 1996. Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1952 and Richard Nixon in 1968 were technically residents of New York but were generally identified with other states. President Gerald R. Ford's vice president, Nelson A. Rockefeller, was a former governor of New York, but he was appointed to the vice presidency. He was not asked to be on the ticket when Ford ran in 1976.

Another major swing state in the years from the Civil War through World War I was Indiana. In most elections during this period a prominent Indianan found his way onto one of the major party's national tickets. In the thirteen presidential elections between 1868 and 1916, an Indianan appeared ten times on at least one of the major parties' national tickets. However, from 1916 to 2008 only two Indianans, Wendell Willkie in 1940 and Dan Quayle in 1988 and 1992, were major party nominees.

Governors

From 1900 to 1956 Democrats tended to favor governors for the presidential nomination, whether from New York or elsewhere. Democratic governors who received their party's presidential nomination included Wilson of New Jersey in 1912, James M. Cox of Ohio in 1920, Alfred E. Smith of New York in 1928, Franklin Roosevelt of New York in 1932, and Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois in 1952.

During the same period, Republican presidential nominees had a wide variety of backgrounds. There were two cabinet officers (Secretary of War William Howard Taft in 1908 and Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover in 1928), a Supreme Court justice (Charles Evans Hughes in 1916), a U.S. senator (Warren G. Harding in 1920), two governors (Alfred M. Landon of Kansas in 1936 and Dewey of New York in 1944 and 1948), a private lawyer (Willkie in 1940), and a general (Eisenhower in 1952 and 1956). Calvin Coolidge of Massachusetts, the 1924 nominee, and Theodore Roosevelt of New York, the 1904 nominee, who succeeded to the presidency from the vice presidency, had been governors of their respective states.

Curiously, the two world wars did not produce a plethora of military candidates. The only general besides Eisenhower who made a strong bid for a presidential nomination was Gen. Leonard Wood, who had commands in the Spanish-American War and World War I. Wood led on five ballots at the 1920 Republican National Convention before losing out on the tenth ballot to Harding. Otherwise only a few military men were even mentioned for the presidency in the twentieth century—most notably Gen. Douglas MacArthur in the 1940s and 1950s (he got little support at Republican conventions) and Colin Powell in the 1990s.

Senators and Former Vice Presidents

An abrupt change took place in 1960 with the nominations of John F. Kennedy, a senator, and Nixon, a former senator and sitting vice president. It was only the second time in the twentieth century that an incumbent U.S. senator was nominated for the presidency. The first time was in 1920 when the Republicans nominated Harding from Ohio. In the nineteenth century the phenomenon also had been rare, with National-Republican Henry Clay in 1832, Democrat Lewis Cass in 1848, and Democrat Douglas in 1860 the only incumbent senators nominated for president by official party conventions. Republican Garfield was a senator-elect at the time of his election in 1880. Beginning with Kennedy's ascension from the Senate to the White House in 1960, senators dominated presidential campaigns until 1976. During those sixteen years every major party nominee was a senator or former senator.

The nomination of Nixon, like the nomination of Kennedy, was also a sign of things to come. It was the first time since 1860 and only the third time in the history of party nominating conventions that an incumbent vice president was chosen for the presidency. Beginning in 1960 the vice presidency, like the Senate, became a presidential training ground. Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey was chosen by the Democrats for president in 1968. That same year the Republicans renominated Nixon, who went on to win the presidency eight years after being vice president.

Vice President Spiro T. Agnew was the leading contender for the 1976 Republican presidential nomination before his resignation in October 1973. In 1984 former vice president Walter Mondale, who had served under Jimmy Carter, emerged as the Democratic choice for the presidential nomination. When George H.W. Bush won the presidency in 1988, after filling the second spot under Ronald Reagan for eight years, it marked the first time a sitting vice president had been elected president since Van Buren in 1836. Democratic Vice President Al Gore tried to duplicate Bush's success in 2000. He won the popular vote but lost in the electoral college to Bush's son, George W. Bush.

Even defeated vice-presidential nominees have been considered for the nomination—witness Henry Cabot Lodge Jr. of Massachusetts in 1964; Edmund S. Muskie of Maine in 1972; Sargent Shriver of Maryland in 1976; Bob Dole of Kansas in 1980, 1988, and 1996 (when he was the Republican nominee); Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut in 2004; John Edwards of North Carolina in 2008.

Only four senators or former senators secured the top spot on a major party ticket between 1976 and 2004—Mondale in 1984, Dole in 1996, Gore in 2000, and John Kerry in 2004—and all suffered defeat. Several senators were also tapped as vice-presidential running mates: Mondale with Carter and Dole with Ford in 1976; Lloyd Bentsen with Dukakis and Quayle with George H.W. Bush in 1988; Gore with Bill Clinton in 1992; Lieberman with Gore in 2000, and Edwards with Kerry in 2004.

In the 2008 election senators dominated the presidential primaries and the general election. Six of the nine Democratic candidates were senators or former senators. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois were the top two contenders over a field that included Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, Sen. Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, and former senators Edwards of North Carolina and Mike Gravel of Alaska. In the Republican contest Sen. John McCain of Arizona quickly bested twelve other candidates including Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas and former senator Fred Thompson of Tennessee. However the most historical aspect of the 2008 presidential race was the fact that for the first time a woman, Clinton, and an African American, Obama, vied for the top of a major party ticket, with Obama eventually winning the nomination and the presidency.

Governors Reconsidered

The 1976 campaign saw the reemergence of governors as leading contenders in the nomination sweepstakes. Between 1976 and 2004 governors or former governors won seven out of eight presidential elections. Although there was no shortage of senators in the 1976 races, it was the governors who attracted the most attention. Former California governor Reagan came close to depriving incumbent Ford of the Republican presidential nomination. The Democratic nominee and eventual winner, former Georgia governor Carter, faced a dramatic last-minute challenge from the governor of California at the time, Edmund G. “Jerry” Brown Jr. In 1980 Reagan (the Republican nominee), Carter (the Democratic nominee), and Brown were candidates again along with former Democratic Texas governor John B. Connally. In 1984 former Florida governor Reubin Askew vied unsuccessfully for the Democratic presidential nomination as incumbent Reagan easily gained his reelection.

In 1988 and 1992 the field of Democratic presidential candidates contained a near equal mix of governors and senators, but two Democratic governors established momentum early in the primaries. In 1988 Massachusetts governor Michael S. Dukakis won enough delegates by June to take the Democratic nomination, but he lost to Vice President George H.W. Bush in the November general election. In 1992 Arkansas governor Clinton fought off several Democratic contenders—including another challenge from Brown of California—to secure the nomination. Clinton went on to defeat Bush in 1992 and Dole in 1996. In 2000 Bush’s son, George W. Bush, governor of Texas, locked up the Republican nomination in March and then defeated Vice President Gore who had moved to the top of the Democratic ticket. In the 2004 campaign, two governors joined the crowded Democratic field: former Florida governor and sitting senator Daniel Robert “Bob” Graham and Vermont governor Howard Dean. Dean became the early Democratic front-runner before losing the nomination to Massachusetts senator Kerry, who had also served previously as lieutenant governor. Bush prevailed over Kerry in the November election.

In 2008 four of the thirteen Republican candidates for president were former governors—Jim Gilmore of Virginia, Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, and Tommy Thompson of Wisconsin. A sitting governor, Sarah Palin of Alaska, became the party’s candidate for vice president. Among Democrats, Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico and Tom Vilsack of Iowa were the only sitting or former governors among the presidential candidates.

Chronology of Presidential Elections

IN THE EARLY YEARS of the Republic, the American colonists and their leaders were ambivalent about the concept of democracy. On the one hand, Americans searched for ways to prevent the kind of tyranny they had experienced at the hand of elite rulers such as King George of England. On the other hand, political elites feared the instability that might result from mass participation in politics. This ambivalence was evident in the compromise for presidential selection worked out at the Constitutional Convention in 1787 and in the halting steps the nation took toward party competition.

The presidential selection process has changed significantly since George Washington was elected to his first term in 1789. The electoral college is still the center of the system, but all of the related institutions and processes are dramatically different, in part because the constitutional provisions for presidential selection are so vague.

The major features of the electoral system have developed over time as a process of trial and error. The Constitution contains no provisions for organizing political parties, nominating candidates, or campaigning for office. The Framers assumed, incorrectly, that the selection process would be a reasoned one that would transcend petty partisanship. The original provision for balloting by the electoral college was flawed and had to be superseded by the Twelfth Amendment in 1804.

Until the eighteenth century, competitive elections were rare. The nation's first legislative body, the Virginia House of Burgesses, had largely single-candidate elections until the 1700s, and later, even when the elections for state legislatures attracted more than one candidate, there was little active campaigning. It was only with the decline of homogeneous communities and the end of elite control over politics that election contests began to occur.

The very concept of the political party—a way to organize electoral coalitions—was viewed with distrust by the nation's earliest leaders. As George Washington described the dangers of parties in a letter: "A fire not to be quenched; it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume."<sup>1</sup> Only after the experience of factional debate in Congress, where bitter strife developed over issues such as banking, tariffs, and slavery, did the idea of parties seem necessary and capable of control.

EMERGENCE OF THE ELECTORAL PROCESS

The method of choosing presidential and vice-presidential candidates has moved through four distinct phases, according to political scientist Richard P. McCormick.<sup>2</sup> The first phase was a period marked by uncertain and hazardous rules that lasted until the Twelfth Amendment was ratified in 1804. The second phase, continuing through 1820, saw the decline of the Federalists as a national force and the dominance of the Democratic-Republicans. This phase is associated with "King Caucus"—the nomination of candidates by congressional caucuses. In the third phase, King Caucus was replaced by factional politics and unsettled rules for selecting candidates. The fourth phase—still in effect today—evolved between 1832 and 1844. It is characterized by a two-party system that nominates candidates by national conventions. In recent years, however, the conventions have been rendered obsolete by mass politics, which takes the form of mass media presentations of candidates to the public and mass participation of party members in primary elections.

Washington's First Election: 1789

Establishment of the rules for democratic decision making in the United States occurred inauspiciously. The states completed their separate ratifications of the Constitution in July 1788—nearly nine months after the close of the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia. The Continental Congress then decided that New York City would serve as the seat of government. There, on September 13, 1788, Congress passed a resolution requiring the states to appoint electors on the first Wednesday in January, the electors to assemble and vote in their respective states on the first Wednesday in February, and the new government to convene on the first Wednesday in March.

Under the Constitution, the method of choosing electors was left up to the individual state legislatures. (See Methods of Choosing Electors, p. 820.) The requirement that all electors be chosen on the same day proved to be troublesome for the states. Some did not have time to call elections. In New York, for example, where electors were to have been chosen by the legislature, dissension between the two houses led to a stalemate and prevented the state from participating in the election.

No formal nomination of candidates took place in 1788. Nevertheless, it had been widely anticipated since the Constitutional Convention the previous year that George Washington of Virginia, the reluctant hero of the Revolutionary War, would be president. The only real question was who would be the vice president. Leaders of the Federalists, a group organized in the fall of 1787 to achieve ratification of the Constitution, ultimately decided to support John Adams of Massachusetts.

The inherent flaws of the electoral system became evident quickly. Under the Constitution, each elector was to cast two votes for president. The two votes had to be for different persons, and the two candidates could not both receive votes from a common home state. The individual receiving the votes of a majority of the electors was to be named president, and the person receiving the second highest total was to be named vice president. Because no distinction was made between balloting for president and vice president, it was possible for more than one candidate to receive an equal number of votes, thereby throwing the election into the House of Representatives. It also was possible that a candidate for vice president—through fluke or machination—actually could end up with the most votes and become president.

The Federalist leader Alexander Hamilton recognized the danger, and his personal animosity toward Adams aggravated his concern. In response, he plotted to siphon away votes from Adams. In a letter to James Wilson of Pennsylvania, Hamilton wrote: “Everybody is aware of that defect in the constitution which renders it possible that the man intended for vice president may in fact turn up president.” To prevent such a crisis, Hamilton recommended that several votes that would otherwise have gone to Adams be thrown away on other candidates: “I have proposed to friends in Connecticut to throw away 2 [votes], to others in New Jersey to throw away an equal number and I submit to you whether it would not be well to lose three or four in Pennsylvania.”<sup>3</sup>

Hamilton’s efforts were successful. Washington was unanimously elected president with sixty-nine electoral votes. Adams, however, won the vice presidency with only thirty-four electoral votes. Just two states—New Hampshire and his own Massachusetts—voted solidly for him. Because in other states Federalist leaders withheld support from Adams and sometimes worked against him, he did not receive any votes from Delaware, Georgia, Maryland, and South Carolina, and he received only one vote from New Jersey. The remaining votes were spread among ten other candidates, including John Jay, John Hancock, Robert Harrison, John Rutledge, and George Clinton.

Although the new government was supposed to open its doors on March 4, 1789, not enough members of Congress had arrived in New York City by that date to achieve a quorum. When the Senate finally convened on April 6 and counted the electoral votes, a messenger was dispatched on horseback to deliver the news to President-elect Washington at his home in Mount Vernon, Virginia. He received the news on April 14. Washington then set out for New York where he was sworn in on April 30.

Before the end of Washington’s first term as president, political divisions developed that would lead to a party system. James Madison emerged as the de facto opposition leader in Congress. Seventeen members of the House of Representatives regularly sided with Madison, and a bloc of fifteen supported the administration. The other dozen or so members of the House switched back and forth between the administration’s and Madison’s faction.<sup>4</sup>

The election of 1789 demonstrated the potential for partisanship and intrigue in presidential contests. It also revealed the weaknesses of the existing election calendar (which had made it difficult for New York to participate in the election) and reminded participants of the danger of the constitutional “defect” in the selection process that made it possible for the person intended to be vice president to become president.

Washington’s Reelection: 1792

Washington remained first in the hearts of his countrymen when his first term as president drew to a close in 1792. But the facade of national unity was showing signs of crumbling as bitter oppositional factions began to develop. From this arose a system of electoral competition.

Washington won a second unanimous term as president in 1792, but the election did produce competition for vice president. An overtly partisan contest broke out when the Democratic-Republicans, as one faction was now known, decided to challenge the Federalist Adams. Some of Adams’s approving statements about the British angered populists, who campaigned behind the scenes against him. Adams managed to win, but not before bitter partisan identities had developed in response to the nation’s only unanimous administration.

The election was different from the 1789 one in another way as well. The election calendar was changed and made more flexible by an act of Congress that allowed states to choose electors within a thirty-four-day span before the first Wednesday in December when the electors met to vote. The new law remained in effect until 1845.

Thomas Jefferson, the leader of the Democratic-Republicans, chose not to run for vice president in 1792, in part because he came from the same state as President Washington. Because electors could vote for only one candidate from their state, Jefferson was tacitly precluded from receiving the large electoral vote of Virginia. Besides, a “balanced ticket” required regional diversity. Instead, Democratic-Republican leaders from New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and South Carolina chose New York governor George Clinton as their candidate at a meeting in Philadelphia in October 1792. The endorsement of Clinton was a milestone in the evolution of the presidential nominating process and a step away from the Framers’ original understanding of the selection process.

Both Washington and Adams were reelected, but Clinton scored well in the electoral college. Adams received 77 electoral votes to Clinton’s 50 (with four votes going to Jefferson and one to Sen. Aaron Burr of New York), and Washington was reelected president by a unanimous electoral vote of 132.

The political tensions brought out by the Adams-Clinton contest became even tauter as policy controversies arose. Jefferson resigned as secretary of state in 1793 in protest over Secretary of the Treasury Hamilton’s growing influence in foreign affairs. Jefferson complained: “In place of that noble love of liberty and Republican government which carried us triumphantly through the war, an Anglican, Monarchical, and Aristocratical party has sprung up, whose avowed subject is to draw over us the substance as they have already done the forms of the British government.” Even Washington was subject to attacks. A Pennsylvania politician wondered aloud if Washington had not “become the tyrant instead of the saviour of his country.”<sup>5</sup>

News of the French Revolution’s period of terror divided the nation’s political leaders. Federalists recoiled in horror with the news of a democratic revolution gone awry, while democrats such as Jefferson expressed sympathy for France’s struggle. The U.S. government’s use of troops to suppress the Whiskey Rebellion of 1794, approval of the Jay Treaty of 1794, and maneuvering between the warring French and British also polarized the young nation into factions. State-level Democratic-Republican societies formed during this period in opposition to the Federalists.

The First Succession: 1796

Washington decided not to run for president again in 1796, even though the Constitution did not bar a third term and public sentiment supported it. With Washington out of the race, the United States witnessed its first partisan contest for president. Washington’s Farewell Address, published in summer 1796, was “a signal, like dropping a hat, for the party racers to start.”<sup>6</sup>

On the Democratic-Republican side, Jefferson faced no opposition as the presidential candidate; a consensus of party leaders selected him to run in 1796. But a caucus of Democratic-Republican senators was unable to agree on a running mate, producing a tie vote for Burr of New York and Sen. Pierce Butler of South Carolina that ended with a walk-out by Butler’s supporters. As a result, there was no formal Democratic-Republican candidate to run with Jefferson.

The Federalists, by contrast, held what historian Roy F. Nichols has described as a “quasi caucus” of the party’s members of Congress in Philadelphia in May 1796.<sup>7</sup> The gathering chose Vice President Adams and Minister to Great Britain Thomas Pinckney of South Carolina as the Federalist presidential and vice-presidential candidates. The choice of Adams was not surprising because he was Washington’s vice president. Nevertheless, Adams was unpopular in the South, and he continued to be disliked by Hamilton. As a result, Hamilton tried to use the “defect” in the Constitution to make Pinckney president instead of Adams. He urged northern electors to give equal support to Adams and Pinckney in the hopes that the South would not vote for Adams and that Pinckney would therefore win the most votes.

Had the northern electors followed Hamilton's advice, Pinckney might have won the presidency. Instead, eighteen votes were thrown to other Federalists (thereby preventing a Pinckney claim to the presidency), giving Adams the presidency with seventy-one electoral votes. Pinckney—with fifty-nine votes—was not even able to win the vice presidency. Jefferson—the candidate of the opposing Democratic-Republican ticket—came in second with sixty-eight votes and became Adams's vice president. Although the results again played up the defects in the constitutional procedure for electing presidents, Federalists and Democratic-Republicans did not seem unduly concerned that the president and vice president were of opposing parties. Both sides felt that they had prevented the opposition from gaining total victory.

For the first and last time, a foreign figure played an active and public role in the election. French ambassador Pierre Adet promoted Jefferson's campaign in appearances and in written statements. Whether the Adet effort helped or hurt Jefferson is uncertain. The effort aroused supporters of France but angered others who favored Great Britain or resented outside interference.

Jefferson's Revenge: 1800

The election of 1800 was the first in which both parties used congressional caucuses to nominate candidates for their tickets. Such caucuses were an important innovation in the presidential selection process because they formalized partisan alignments in Congress and demonstrated the emergence of organized political parties.

President Adams was hated bitterly by farmers, populists, and states' rights advocates. In one of the nation's first professionally run smear campaigns, Adams was denounced as a "hideous hermaphroditical character which has neither the force and firmness of a man, nor the gentleness and sensibility of a woman."<sup>8</sup>

Federalist members of Congress met in the Senate chamber in Philadelphia on May 3, 1800, to choose their candidates. As in previous presidential election years, Federalists were divided in their support of Adams, yet they felt they had to nominate him because he was the incumbent president. Their ambivalence toward Adams was revealed, however, when they nominated both Adams and Maj. Gen. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney of South Carolina without giving preference to one or the other for president. Pinckney was the elder brother of the Federalist vice-presidential candidate in 1796.

The choice of Pinckney was made at Hamilton's insistence. Once again Hamilton was plotting to use the constitutional defect against Adams. In 1796 South Carolina had voted for an all-southern ticket—Jefferson and Thomas Pinckney—even though the two were of opposing parties. Hamilton hoped that South Carolina would vote the same way in 1800, and that all other Federalist electors could be persuaded to vote for Adams and Charles Pinckney. That would give Pinckney more votes than Adams, thus making him president.

Although the deliberations of the Federalist caucus were secret, the existence of the meeting was not. It was described by the local Democratic-Republican paper, the Philadelphia Aurora, as a "Jacobinical conclave." Further denunciations by the paper's editor, Benjamin F. Bache, earned him a personal rebuke from the U.S. Senate.

The Democratic-Republicans once again chose Jefferson as the presidential candidate by consensus. On May 11 a caucus of Democratic-Republican members of Congress met at Marache's boarding house in Philadelphia to choose a running mate. Their unanimous choice was Burr.

Although there was no such thing as a formal party platform in 1800, Jefferson wrote fairly detailed statements of principle in letters to various correspondents. Among other things, the Democratic-Republicans believed in states' rights, a small national government, and a relatively weak executive. They opposed standing armies in peacetime, a large naval force, and alliances with other countries. They also denounced the Alien and Sedition Acts, which had been passed by the Federalists in 1798, ostensibly to protect the nation from subversives given the threat of war with France.

The presidential election in 1800 witnessed other signs of formal public campaigning. Tickets listing the names of Democratic-Republican electors were printed and distributed in a number of states, including New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Delaware. Speeches in behalf of the candidates increased markedly. Partisan newspapers also helped to spread the party positions—the number of newspapers in the United States had grown dramatically in the last decade of the century, from 91 to 234.<sup>9</sup> Despite attempts by the Federalist Party to muzzle the opposition press with the passage of the Sedition Act of 1798, partisan newspapers on both sides actively defamed the opposition. Ultimately, the Sedition Act worked against the Federalists by turning the Democratic-Republicans into public champions of a free press.

Increased partisan activity spurred voter participation. Because electors still were chosen indirectly in twelve of the sixteen states, voters often expressed themselves through state legislative elections as a means of influencing future presidential elections.<sup>10</sup> The seeds were being sown for a new phase in the development of the presidential election process.

A harbinger of Democratic-Republican success came in May when the New York state party won state legislative elections. Burr managed the campaign in the state, building a machine with ward and precinct organizations. Burr's efforts showed the importance of large-scale mobilization—a lesson that would not be lost on the party in future years.

When the electors voted in December, the constitutional defect did not work as Hamilton had hoped. Instead of resulting in a Pinckney victory, the defect produced an unexpected tie vote between the two Democratic-Republican candidates, Jefferson and Burr—each of whom had seventy-three electoral votes. Adams came in third with sixty-five, and Pinckney followed with sixty-four. In accord with the Constitution, the election was thrown into the Federalist-controlled House of Representatives.

Some Federalists felt that Burr was the lesser of the two evils and plotted to elect him president instead of Jefferson, even though Jefferson was clearly the presidential candidate. Hamilton helped to squelch the idea as he preferred Jefferson over Burr. After thirty-six ballots, Jefferson carried a majority in the House of Representatives. The crisis—which could have fatally wounded the nation by calling into question the legitimacy of the new president—was over. Jefferson was elected president and Burr, vice president.

The near disaster brought about by the constitutional defect led to the passage of the Twelfth Amendment to the Constitution in September 1804. It called for electors to vote for president and vice president on separate ballots, thereby clarifying who was the presidential candidate and eliminating the possibility of a tie between the principal candidate and the running mate.

Jefferson's Reelection: 1804

By the 1804 election, President Jefferson had grudgingly accepted the emergence of a party system. Indeed, the president wrote that year: “The party division in this country is certainly not among its pleasant features. To a certain degree it will always exist.”<sup>11</sup>

Jefferson's record—lower taxes, a reduced national debt, repeal of the Alien and Sedition Acts, and purchase of the Louisiana Territory from France—assured him of a second term. Particularly important was Jefferson's willingness to expand the nation's reach and power with the Louisiana Purchase, which compromised his philosophical preference for a small republic. The opposition's case against Jefferson was personal. But the voters were not convinced of the need to make a change.

The 1804 election was the first one held after the Twelfth Amendment went into effect, requiring electors to cast separate votes for president and vice president. Therefore as of that election, parties always specifically designated their presidential and vice-presidential candidates.

The Democratic-Republicans retained the caucus system of nomination in 1804, as they did for the next two decades, and for the first time they publicly reported their deliberations. When the party caucus met on February 25,

This 1807 anti-Jefferson cartoon compares Washington and Jefferson in contrasting images of good and evil.

1804, it attracted 108 of the party's senators and representatives.

President Jefferson was renominated by acclamation, but Vice President Burr, who had fallen out with his party, was not considered for a second term. On the first nominating roll call publicly reported in U.S. political history, New York governor George Clinton was chosen by the caucus to run for vice president. He received sixty-seven votes and easily defeated Sen. John Breckinridge of Kentucky, who collected twenty votes. To "avoid unpleasant discussions" no names were placed in nomination and the vote was conducted by secret ballot.

Before adjourning, the caucus appointed a thirteen-member committee to conduct the campaign and promote the success of Democratic-Republican candidates. A forerunner of party national committees, the new campaign group included members of both the House and Senate, but with no two persons from the same state. Because the Twelfth Amendment had not yet been passed when the caucus met, the committee was designed to "manage" the vote of Democratic-Republican electors to ensure that the events of 1800 were not repeated. In fact, that precaution was not necessary because the Twelfth Amendment was ratified in September—well before the electors voted.

By 1804 the Federalist Party had deteriorated badly. The new era of dominance by the Virginia-led Democratic-Republicans had begun. The Federalists did not even hold a congressional caucus to elect their nominees. Instead, Federalist leaders informally chose Charles Cotesworth Pinckney for president and Rufus King of New York for vice president. How the Federalists formulated this ticket is not clear. There is no record in 1804 of any formal meeting to nominate Federalist candidates.

The Federalists then mounted a disorganized and dispirited national campaign. Despite concerted efforts to win at least the votes of New England, the Federalists failed miserably. Pinckney received only 14 electoral votes—those of Connecticut and Delaware, plus 2 from Maryland. Jefferson, the Democratic-Republican candidate, was the overwhelming victor with 162 electoral votes.

Madison's Victory: 1808

Following Washington's precedent, Jefferson refused to seek a third term of office. The nation was bitterly divided over Jefferson's policy toward France and Britain. In an attempt to stay out of their war, Jefferson had supported a trade embargo so that neither country would seize American ships. But the embargo only undermined U.S. business interests. Under political attack, Jefferson decided to return to his beloved home of Monticello near Charlottesville, Virginia.

Despite the unpopularity of the administration's European policy, Jefferson's secretary of state and chosen successor, Madison, won the presidency in 1808. Jefferson's retirement provided a serious test to the authority of the Democratic-Republican congressional caucus to select presidential candidates. The caucus met on January 23, 1808, after, for the first time, a formal call was issued. Sen. Stephen R. Bradley of Vermont, chairman of the 1804 caucus, issued the call to all 146 Democratic-Republicans in Congress and several Federalists sympathetic to the Democratic-Republican cause. A few party leaders questioned Bradley's authority to call the caucus, but various reports indicate that between eighty-nine and ninety-four members of Congress attended.

As in 1804, the balloting took place without names being formally placed in nomination. Madison easily won the presidential nomination with eighty-three votes. Despite earlier support for future secretary of state James Monroe among Democratic-Republicans in Virginia, and Vice President Clinton's desire to be president, each won only three votes at the caucus. But the caucus overwhelmingly renominated Clinton as vice president, giving him seventy-nine votes; runner-up John Langdon of New Hampshire collected five votes.

The Democratic-Republican caucus also repeated its practice of appointing a committee to conduct the campaign. Membership was expanded from thirteen to fifteen House and Senate members, and it was formally called the "committee of correspondence and arrangement." The committee was authorized to fill vacancies on the national ticket, should any occur. Before the caucus adjourned, it passed a resolution defending the caucus system as "the most practicable mode of consulting and respecting the interest and wishes of all." Later caucuses adopted similar resolutions throughout the history of the system.

Still, the Democratic-Republicans suffered divisions as 40 percent of their members of Congress had refused to attend the nominating caucus. Monroe refused to withdraw from the presidential race even after his defeat in the caucus. Clinton, although nominated for vice presidency, was angry at not being nominated for president—so much so that he publicly denounced the caucus, as did Monroe's supporters. Pro-Clinton newspapers in New York launched harsh attacks on Madison and even suggested a Clinton-Monroe ticket. Some Clinton supporters went so far as to hope that Federalists would nominate Clinton for president later in the year. But such a thought was unpalatable to the Federalists, who ultimately nominated Charles Cotesworth Pinckney.

The Federalists chose their ticket at a secret meeting of party leaders in New York City in August 1808. Initially, the meeting was called by the Federalist members of the Massachusetts legislature. Twenty-five to thirty party leaders from seven states, all north of the Potomac River except South Carolina, attended the national meeting. Despite the suggestion from Massachusetts representatives that Clinton be nominated, the gathering decided to run the same ticket they had chosen in 1804: Pinckney and King.

The Federalists did not actively publicize their ticket. The party itself was divided and devoid of leadership. Indeed, many Virginia Federalists formally endorsed Monroe, even though he was a Democratic-Republican. Others preferred to align themselves with Clinton.

In the end, Madison achieved a wide margin of victory with 122 electoral votes; Pinckney came in second with 47 votes. Monroe received no electoral votes. For the sake of future party unity, Democratic-Republicans had retained Clinton as their vice-presidential nominee even though he had tried to subvert Madison's candidacy. Clinton won, receiving 113 electoral votes for vice president. He even received 6 electoral votes from New York for president.

Madison's Reelection: 1812

The winds of war were sweeping through presidential politics when Madison sought a second term in 1812. In response to constant agitation by "war hawks," the president asked Congress on June 1 for a declaration of war against Great Britain. Madison, benefiting from the public's willingness to rally in times of national emergency, swept to a second term. The Federalists did not field a candidate but supported a dissident from Madison's party.

The possibility of war had long hung over the United States. Great Britain had taken American ships captive for years—boarding the vessels, taking cargo, and intimidating seamen. Anti-British political forces also charged that the British had encouraged Native Americans in their attacks against settlers in the North and West.

The Democratic-Republican Party held its quadrennial nominating caucus on May 18, 1812. Only eighty-three of the 178 Democratic-Republicans in Congress participated. The New England and New York delegations in particular were poorly represented. Many of the New Yorkers supported the candidacy of their state's lieutenant governor, DeWitt Clinton (George Clinton's nephew), who also was maneuvering for the Federalist nomination. New England was noticeably upset with Madison's foreign policy, which was leading to war with England. Others did not attend the caucus because they opposed the system in principle.

Madison won a near-unanimous renomination in the caucus, receiving eighty-two votes. John Langdon of New Hampshire got the vice-presidential nomination by a wide margin, collecting sixty-four votes to sixteen for Gov. Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts. But Langdon declined the nomination, citing his age (seventy) as the reason. The Democratic-Republicans held a second caucus on June 8 to select another vice-presidential candidate. Gerry was the clear winner with seventy-four votes, and he responded with a formal letter of acceptance. Ten members of Congress who had not been present at the first caucus also took the opportunity to endorse Madison's presidential candidacy.

Democratic-Republicans from New York were unwilling to accept the choice of Madison. They held their own caucus, composed of nearly all party members from the New York state legislature, where they unanimously nominated Clinton, who responded with a written "Address" that was a precursor to party platforms. Clinton won the endorsement of the Federalists as well.

As they had four years earlier, the Federalists convened a three-day secret meeting in New York City. The September meeting was more than twice the size of the 1808 gathering, with seventy representatives from eleven states attending. Delegates were sent to the conference by Federalist general committees, with all but nine of the delegates coming from the New England and Middle Atlantic states.

Debate centered on whether to run a separate Federalist ticket or to endorse Clinton. After much debate, they decided to endorse Clinton, and they nominated Jared Ingersoll of Pennsylvania for vice president. Originally, the caucus's decision was meant to be kept a secret, but leaks eventually were reported by Democratic-Republican newspapers.

The presidential election of 1812 was the first wartime contest for power in the United States. The Federalists, calling Madison a dupe of French emperor Napoleon Bonaparte, aligned themselves with the cause of peace and unimpeded commerce. In some northern states the Federalists even adopted the Peace Party label.

Despite all the opposition, President Madison beat Clinton by an electoral vote count of 128–89. The vote reflected the growing split between southern agricultural states, which supported Madison, and northern commercial states, which supported Clinton. Indeed, the common bond that held the Clinton coalition together was a hatred of Virginia—the kingmaker of the Democratic-Republican Party.

The 1812 race was the last real campaign by the Federalists. Disgraced by their obstructionist tactics during the war, isolated by their talk of secession from the Union, and unable to coordinate a national campaign, the Federalists faded from a system increasingly marked by permanent party competition.

Monroe's Victory: 1816

Monroe, President Madison's old foe who had left the Democratic-Republican Party in 1808, seemed like an unlikely presidential candidate for the party in 1816. But not only did Monroe return to the Democratic-Republican fold, he also won the White House without any opposition.

The inconclusive War of 1812 colored American politics for years. The United States and Great Britain fought to a stalemate, and then both sides offered conditions for ending the war that the other would not accept. The British, for example, demanded control over the Great Lakes and Mississippi River for commerce, as well as the creation of a Native American state in the Northwest. In the end, both parties simply accepted the end of hostilities. An American representative said the treaty was “a truce rather than a peace.”<sup>12</sup> Inconclusive or not, the war sparked a generation of nationalism. Rufus King revived the Federalist Party in 1816 with his race for the governorship of New York. But he lost the race and afterward found the job of maintaining the party a “fruitless struggle.” Efforts were made to convene another secret meeting in Philadelphia to nominate candidates for president and vice president, yet the party held no such meeting. With the Federalists not running candidates, nomination by the Democratic-Republican caucus was tantamount to election.

Despite his opposition to Madison in 1808, Monroe had been accepted back into the Democratic-Republican fold in the years that followed. In 1811 Madison had named him secretary of state; by 1816 he was Madison’s heir apparent. But many states were increasingly jealous of the Virginia dynasty that had held a grip on the presidency since 1804. Democratic-Republicans in such states opposed Monroe (himself a Virginian) and favored Secretary of War William H. Crawford of Georgia.

A Democratic-Republican caucus met in the House chamber on March 12, 1816, but only fifty-eight members of Congress—mostly Crawford supporters—attended. With the expectation of better attendance, a second caucus was held on March 16. It drew 119 of the 141 Democratic-Republicans in Congress. There, Monroe narrowly defeated Crawford by a vote of 65–54. Forty of Crawford’s votes came from five states: Georgia, Kentucky, New Jersey, New York, and North Carolina. The vice-presidential nomination went to New York governor Daniel D. Tompkins, who easily outdistanced Pennsylvania governor Simon Snyder, 85–30.

The nominations of Monroe and Tompkins revived a Virginia–New York alliance that extended back to the late eighteenth century. With the lone exception of 1812, every Democratic-Republican ticket from 1800 to 1820 was composed of a presidential candidate from Virginia and a vice-presidential candidate from New York.

With the Federalist Party still in disarray, the Democratic-Republican ticket won easily. Monroe received 183 electoral votes. The three states that had chosen Federalist electors—Connecticut, Delaware, and Massachusetts—cast their 34 electoral votes for King.

Although the collapse of the Federalists ensured Democratic-Republican rule, it also increased intraparty friction and spurred further attacks on the caucus system. Twenty-two Democratic-Republican members of Congress had not attended the second party caucus, and at least fifteen were known to be opposed to the system. Mass meetings around the country protested the caucus system.<sup>13</sup> Opponents asserted that the writers of the Constitution did not envision the caucus, that presidential nominating should not be a function of Congress, and that the caucus system encouraged candidates to curry the favor of Congress.

Monroe’s Reelection: 1820

The 1820 election took place during the “Era of Good Feeling,” a phrase coined by a Boston publication, the Columbian Centinel, to describe a brief period of virtual one-party rule in the United States. But that phrase glosses over serious sectional divisions that were growing during Monroe’s presidency. The divisions, however, did not prevent Monroe from winning another term.

Sectional strife was on the brink of eruption during Monroe’s first term over the admission of Missouri as a new state. Tensions between northern and southern states had simmered for years. The emotional core of the struggle was slavery. Therefore whichever region controlled Congress might decide whether slavery was extended into new territories—and the shape of the nation’s economy and culture—for years to come.

In the Senate, there was a tenuous balance between the two regions—eleven free states and eleven slave states—but the admission of Missouri threatened that balance. The two sides finally agreed to a compromise in which both Missouri and Maine would apply for statehood at the same time, Maine as a free state and Missouri as a slave state. Monroe remained neutral in the debate leading up to the compromise. Despite a financial panic in 1819, he retained overwhelming popular support, bolstered by peace and a wave of nationalistic feeling that overshadowed any partisan divisions.

While the United States struggled over the slavery issue, President Monroe embarked on a bold new foreign policy. Still smarting over the British presence in North America that had resulted in the War of 1812, the president declared that the United States would view any European attempts to colonize the Western Hemisphere as acts of hostility. The Monroe Doctrine claimed the hemisphere as the preserve of the United States. It was the boldest venture yet of the nation into foreign policy and permanently defined America’s role in world affairs.

Although several rival Democratic-Republican candidates aspired to win the presidency when Monroe retired in 1824, none wanted to challenge his reelection in 1820. A nominating caucus was called for early March, but fewer than fifty of the Democratic-Republican Party’s 191 members of Congress showed up. The caucus voted unanimously to make no nominations and passed a resolution explaining that it was inexpedient to do so because so few of the party’s members were in attendance. Although Monroe and Tompkins were not formally renominated, electoral slates were filed in their behalf.

Because the Federalist Party was finally dead, Monroe ran virtually unopposed. Even John Adams, the last Federalist president, voted for Monroe as an elector from Massachusetts.

Only one elector, a Democratic-Republican from New Hampshire, cast a vote against Monroe, supporting instead John Quincy Adams, son of the former president.

Last of the Old Order: 1824

The 1824 election, in an odd way, represented everything that the Framers of the Constitution had hoped to see. Without a permanent party system, a number of candidates vied for the presidency. Unable to win an electoral majority, the top three finishers saw their names submitted to the House of Representatives for a final decision. The candidate representative of elite interests and sensibilities and who had House ties won.

But if the 1824 election of John Quincy Adams represented something old, it also represented something new. The popular vote winner and House loser, Andrew Jackson, protested loudly that the election had been stolen from the people. In fact, soon he would mobilize the Democratic Party around a populist rallying cry. American politics would never be the same.

In 1824, as in 1820, only one working party existed in the United States: the Democratic-Republican. But that party had an abundance of candidates competing for the presidency: Secretary of State Adams of Massachusetts, Senator Jackson of Tennessee, Secretary of War John C. Calhoun of South Carolina, House Speaker Henry Clay of Kentucky, and Secretary of the Treasury William H. Crawford. The number of candidates, coupled with the growing democratization of the U.S. political system, led to the demise of King Caucus in 1824.

Early on, Crawford was the leading candidate. He had strong southern support and appeared likely to win the support of New York's Democratic-Republicans. Because it was assumed that he would win a caucus if one were held, Crawford's opponents joined the growing list of caucus opponents. But Crawford's apparent invincibility suddenly ended in September 1823 when he suffered a paralytic stroke. Nearly blind and unable even to sign his name, he was incapacitated and stayed in seclusion for months.

In early February 1824, eleven Democratic-Republican members of Congress issued a call for a caucus to be held in the middle of the month. Their call was countered by twenty-four other members of Congress from fifteen states who deemed it "inexpedient under existing circumstances" to hold a caucus. They claimed that 181 members of Congress were resolved not to attend if a caucus were held.

The caucus convened in mid-February, but only sixty-six members of Congress showed up. Three-quarters of those attending came from just four states—Georgia, New York, North Carolina, and Virginia. Despite his illness, Crawford won the caucus nomination with sixty-four votes. Albert Gallatin of Pennsylvania was selected for vice president with fifty-seven votes. The caucus adopted a resolution defending its actions as "the best means of collecting and concentrating the feelings and wishes of the people of the Union upon this important subject." The caucus also appointed a committee to write an address to the people. As written, the text of the address viewed with alarm the "dismemberment" of the Democratic-Republican Party.

In fact, the action of the caucus just aggravated splits in the party. Because so few members of Congress attended the caucus—almost all of them Crawford supporters—opponents could argue that the choice was not even representative of the Democratic-Republicans serving in Congress. Crawford was roundly criticized as being an illegitimate candidate. His opponents derided King Caucus, and his physical condition made it even easier for them to reject his nomination. As it stood, other candidates simply refused to follow the caucus's decision. Never again were candidates chosen by the caucus system.

With the caucus devoid of power and the party lacking unity or leadership, there was no chance of rallying behind a single ticket. In addition, many political issues proved to be divisive. Western expansion and protective tariffs, for example, benefited some parts of the country but hurt others. Thus the various candidates came to represent sectional interests.

The candidates themselves recognized that such a crowded field was dangerous. The election would be thrown into the House of Representatives if no candidate received a majority. The candidates therefore made efforts to join forces. Adams tried to lure Jackson as his running mate. Adams was a short, stocky, aloof, well-educated New Englander who came from a family of Federalists, while Jackson was a tall, thin, hot-tempered war hero with little formal education who came to epitomize a new brand of populist democracy. In trying to recruit Jackson onto their team, Adams's supporters envisaged a ticket of "the writer and the fighter." Jackson would have nothing of it.

In the meantime, Crawford dropped Gallatin as his vice-presidential running mate. His supporters then tried to persuade Clay to drop his quest for the presidency and join the Crawford team. They hinted that Crawford's physical condition was such that he would probably not finish out a term of office if elected (in fact, he lived ten more years). But Clay was not swayed. Calhoun then dropped his race for the presidency and joined efforts with Jackson.

Four candidates remained in the field, and each collected electoral votes. None, however, received a majority. Jackson received the most with ninety-nine, followed by Adams with eighty-four, Crawford with forty-one, and Clay with thirty-seven. Therefore the election was thrown into the House of Representatives.

In accordance with the Twelfth Amendment, the names of the top three candidates—Jackson, Adams, and Crawford—were placed before the House. Clay, who had come in fourth and was Speaker of the House, would play a major role in tipping the balance in favor of one of the candidates.

In contrast to Jackson, Adams actively lobbied for support, and the Capitol rocked with rumors of corruption. Clay informed Adams in January that he would support the New Englander in the House election—a major blow to Jackson. Shortly thereafter, a letter in a Philadelphia newspaper alleged that Adams had offered Clay the post of secretary of state in return for his support. Adams went on to win the House election narrowly by carrying thirteen out of twenty-four state delegations. Jackson came in second with seven, and Crawford third with the remaining four. Consequently, the candidate who won the most electoral votes and the most popular votes did not win the presidency.

Jackson was furious at what he considered to be unfair bargaining between Adams and Clay. He felt that the will of the people had been thwarted, and he seethed when President Adams proceeded to name Clay secretary of state as rumor had indicated he would. In this way, the events of 1824 kindled the flame of popular democracy. The stage was set for a rematch between Adams and Jackson in 1828.

AGE OF JACKSON

Andrew Jackson was in many ways the perfect man to usher in an age of popular politics, although his rhetoric was more populist than his style of governing. The textbook version of U.S. history depicts Jackson as a coarse man of the frontier, a war hero, a battler of banks and moneyed interests, and a leader of the unschooled and exploited men who built a mass party on patronage and charismatic leadership. Jackson, from Tennessee, was the first politician to break the Virginia dynasty that had governed the country since the Revolution. After his bitter defeat in the 1824 election, Jackson fought back and grabbed the reins of government in the turbulent election of 1828. These two elections signaled the passing of elite politics and the rise of popular politics. In 1828 Jackson roused the people to turn Adams and his aristocratic clique out of office.

But the Jacksonian folklore has serious flaws. Jackson traveled in elite business circles, for example, and one of his greatest contributions as president was the creation of a more rationally organized bureaucracy.<sup>14</sup> Still, the textbook depiction of Jackson suffices to show some trends in U.S. politics, including the development of a stable mass party system, sectionalism, urbanization, and shifts in the debate about U.S. expansionism.

While President John Quincy Adams was struggling with warring factions in Washington, an opposition force was gathering strength and, in fact, was able to deal the president a number of humiliating defeats. Adams's desire for a national program of roads and canals, education, and research in the arts and sciences antagonized even the most nationalistic groups in the country. U.S. participation in a conference of countries from the Western Hemisphere and the imposition of a tariff (a tax on imported goods designed either to raise revenues or to protect domestic industries from foreign competition) also were divisive issues. But even though Adams was under constant personal attack, the opposition was divided on the same issues. The opposition was united, however, behind “Old Hickory.”<sup>15</sup>

Jackson, hero of the Battle of New Orleans in the War of 1812, had a strong appeal to the common man even though he traveled in the circles of southern gentlemen. People who met with Jackson talked of his unerring “intuition” about people and politics. Jackson’s decision to push for reforms of the punishment of debtors was an important gesture to small businesspeople and workers who were held to a kind of indentured servitude to their creditors. Sen. Martin Van Buren of New York, Jackson’s strongest supporter in the Northeast, said the people “were his blood relations—the only blood relations he had.”<sup>16</sup>

Jackson’s First Victory: 1828

Jackson and his running mate, John C. Calhoun, easily beat Adams in their 1828 rematch; Jackson won 178 electoral votes, and Adams won 83. (Calhoun also had been vice president under John Quincy Adams.) Of the popular vote, Jackson received 643,000 votes (56.0 percent) to Adams's 501,000 (43.6 percent). Sectional splits showed in the vote distribution. Adams held all but 1 of New England's electoral votes, all of Delaware's and New Jersey's, 16 of New York's 36 votes, and 6 of Maryland's 11 votes. Jackson took all the rest—the South and the West. The election, then, was decided by the newly enfranchised voters in the burgeoning regions of the country. The U.S. electorate, however, was expanding not only in the West but also in the original states. Between 1824 and 1856 voter participation grew from 3.8 percent to 16.7 percent of the total population.<sup>17</sup>

Jackson had only begun to exert electoral influence with his revenge victory over Adams. The expanded pool of politically involved citizens that had brought Jackson victory also brought him demands for patronage jobs with the federal government. Van Buren, a master machine politician from New York State, tutored the beleaguered new president in dealing with the office seekers. Jackson replaced fewer than one-fifth of the government's employees, which he defended as a perfectly reasonable "rotation in office" that would keep the ranks of the bureaucracy fresh. But the effect of his system was greater. Appointees of previous administrations were able to retain their jobs only when they expressed loyalty to Jackson and his party. Far more important than any government turnover, Jackson's spoils system inaugurated an age in which mass party loyalty was a paramount concern in politics.

The increased importance of loyalty, to the president and to the party, became clear with Jackson's dispute with Vice President Calhoun and the subsequent purging of the cabinet. A growing feud between Jackson and Calhoun came to a head when a personal letter in which Calhoun criticized Jackson's conduct of the Seminole Indian campaign and the 1818 invasion of Florida became public. In a letter to Calhoun during the cabinet crisis, Jackson wrote: "Et tu, Brute." A purge of Calhoun men in the cabinet followed the incident. Secretary of State Van Buren enabled the president to make the purge when he and Secretary of War John Eaton, both Jackson allies, resigned their posts; the president then called on the whole cabinet to quit.

The central element of the Jacksonian program was expansion. Much like twentieth-century politicians who would talk about economic growth as the key to opportunity, Jackson maintained that movement West “enlarg[ed] the area of freedom.”<sup>18</sup> The administration fought to decentralize the management of expansion. Jackson railed against the “corrupt bargain” between the government and banks, joint-stock companies, and monopolies, which, he said, were squeezing out the average person seeking opportunity.

Indeed, Jackson opposed the Bank of the United States and promoted state banks because of his desire to free finance capital from central control. In his first term, the president carried on a long-running battle with Nicholas Biddle, the head of the Bank of the United States, and with Congress over the status of the bank. Alexander Hamilton had created the bank to manage the nation's monetary policy and investment, but Jackson opposed it as a tool of the eastern financial establishment. Jackson may have failed to close the bank, but he did manage to strip it of much of its basic authority and functions by placing its deposits in a number of regional institutions.

Jackson's presidency was activist from the beginning. His administration negotiated treaties with France, the Ottoman Empire, Russia, and Mexico. Jackson himself established a distinctive interpretation of federalism when he vetoed a number of public improvement bills as unconstitutional infringements of local affairs. He also called for a tariff that would yield revenues for dispersal to the states for their public projects—an early form of “revenue sharing.” Jackson also signed the Indian Removal Act of 1830, which provided for settlement of the territory west of the Mississippi River. Late in his first term, Jackson's strong stand defeated the South Carolina legislature's claim that it could “nullify,” or declare “null and void,” federal tariff legislation that the state disliked.

Jackson's Reelection: 1832

There was never any doubt that Jackson would be renominated in 1832; in fact, several state legislatures endorsed him before the convention. Jackson's political strength was also underscored with the introduction of a quintessentially party-oriented institution: the national party convention. Jacksonians from New Hampshire proposed the Democratic convention of 1832, and the president and his advisers jumped at the opportunity. The only previous national convention had been held by the Anti-Masonic Party in 1831. Conventions had been the principal means of selecting candidates for local offices since the early part of the century. Especially when compared with the caucus system that preceded it, the convention system was a democratic leap forward.

The convention system enabled the parties to gather partisans from all geographic areas, and it welded them together as a cohesive unit that ultimately was accountable to the electorate, if only in a plebiscitary way. Voters had the opportunity to give approval or disapproval to a party program with one vote. Historian Eugene H. Roseboom has written: “It was representative in character; it divorced nominations from congressional control and added to the independence of the executive; it permitted an authoritative formulation of a party program; and it concentrated the party's strength behind a single ticket, the product of compromise of personal rivalries and group or sectional interests.”<sup>19</sup>

Given Jackson's popularity in 1832, the purpose of the convention was to rally behind the president and select a new vice-presidential candidate. Van Buren got the nomination, despite lingering resistance from Calhoun supporters and various “favorite sons” (prominent state and local leaders of state party organizations).

As in 1828, Jackson's political opposition was fragmented. The Whigs—the opposition party that had developed from grassroots protests in the North and West against Jackson's tariff and development policies—held their national convention in Baltimore in December 1831 and unanimously nominated Henry Clay of Kentucky for president. Eighteen states used a variety of selection procedures to determine who would be their convention delegates. The party's platform sharply criticized the Jackson administration's patronage practices, relations with Great Britain, and ill-tempered congressional relations, as well as Supreme Court decisions.

In the election, the incumbent easily dispatched the opposition. “The news from the voting states blows over us like a great cold storm,” wrote Rufus Choate, a prominent lawyer, to a friend.<sup>20</sup> Despite last-minute maneuvering to unite the opposition to Jackson and a well-financed campaign by the Bank of the United States, the president won 219 electoral votes to Clay's 49, Independent John Floyd's 11, and Anti-Mason William Wirt's 7. Jackson won all but seven states. Clay won Kentucky, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Delaware, plus five electors from Maryland. Jackson won 702,000 popular votes to Clay's 484,000 and Wirt's 101,000.<sup>21</sup>

Jackson, who finally left the political stage in 1837, changed the face of U.S. politics. Even if his pretensions to being an everyman were overstated, he opened up the system to mass participation, and he forced politicians to listen to popular demands. He developed the notion of a strong party organization. He fought, and eventually defeated, the national bank by withdrawing its funds and placing them in state banks. He strongly opposed two forces that could have torn the nation apart—the nullification principle of state sovereignty and the Supreme Court's bid for broader discretion over political issues (that is, to review legislation and state actions)—by simply proclaiming the law to be “unauthorized by the Constitution” and “therefore null and void.”

Van Buren's Win: 1836

Many historians consider the election of 1836 to be the most important event in the development of the party system. Van Buren, a Democratic follower of Jackson and a theorist on the role of political parties in a democratic system, easily won the election against an uncoordinated Whig Party. The defeat eventually persuaded Whig leaders of the need for a permanent organization for political competition. The emergence of two permanent parties extinguished the American suspicion of the morality of a party system based on unabashed competition for the levers of power.

Van Buren, who had allied with Jackson during the cabinet controversies and promoted his philosophy of parties and patronage, received the Democratic nomination in 1836 at a convention packed with Jackson administration appointees. The vice-presidential nomination of Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky, whose earlier relationship with a mulatto woman caused controversy, damaged the ticket in the South, but the Democrats won anyway.

The Whigs' campaign strategy was to run several favorite sons to prevent any candidate from getting a majority of the electoral votes, thereby throwing the election into the House of Representatives. As one Whig put it: "The disease [Democratic rule] is to be treated as a local disorder—apply local remedies."<sup>22</sup> The Whig expectation was that one of two favorite sons—Gen. William Henry Harrison of Ohio or Hugh Lawson White of Tennessee—would be selected by the House after the electoral college vote proved inconclusive.

Van Buren, however, had Jackson's machine and his personal backing and was able to overcome the Whigs' local strategy. Thus in this race, the last for the White House before presidential elections became dominated by two national parties, Van Buren took 170 electoral votes—22 more than he needed for election. Of the Whig candidates, Harrison received 73 electoral votes; White, 26; and Daniel Webster of Massachusetts, 14. Willie Mangum, an Independent Democrat from North Carolina, received 11 electoral votes from the South Carolina legislature, which was hostile to White because of his role in nullification politics. Van Buren won 764,000 popular votes (50.8 percent); Harrison, 551,000 (36.6 percent); White, 146,000 (9.7 percent); and Webster, 41,000 (2.7 percent). For the only time in history, the Senate selected the vice president, Van Buren's running mate Johnson, who had fallen one vote shy of election by the electoral college. In the Senate, Johnson defeated Francis Granger by a 33–16 vote.

Van Buren was besieged with problems practically from the minute he took the oath of office in March 1837. About midway through his term, the economy crashed after years of feverish business growth, overspeculation in land and business, huge private debt accumulation, and unregulated financial and trade practices. Van Buren's approach to the economic crisis alternated between stubborn refusal to fix a mess that he had not created and action that was guaranteed to antagonize key interest groups.

When Van Buren moved to create an independent treasury to insulate the federal government from state financial institutions, he was opposed by conservative Democrats who were supporters of the state financial institutions that Jackson had promoted in his legendary national bank battles. When Van Buren was not hit from the right, he was hit from the left. The nascent labor movement called for protection of jobs and wages and made protests against monopoly and privilege.

IDEA OF A PARTY SYSTEM

Whatever problems Martin Van Buren had in governing, he should receive credit at least for helping to establish the principle of party government in the United States. That principle, much derided in the early days of the nation's history, now enjoys widespread allegiance.

Van Buren's arguments for a party system—contained in his book, An Inquiry into the Origin and Course of Political Parties in the United States—were similar to the economic principle of Adam Smith, which had held that the pursuit of selfish ends redounded to the good of the entire community. American leaders from George Washington through John Quincy Adams had believed that self-interested factions endangered the functioning and virtue of the Republic. These leaders also had warned against the dangers of democracy, which they often called "mob rule." In the worst possible scenario, permanent parties with strong ideological stances appealed to the mass public for support, undermining the ability of national leaders to guide public virtue.<sup>23</sup>

The basic tension that Van Buren had to resolve was the system's need for stability and responsible leadership and the parties' imperative to gain office. How could a party's selfish desire to run the government and award patronage and contracts to political allies benefit the whole system?

Van Buren argued that the absence of parties—that is, collections of people from disparate backgrounds—resulted in a system of personal politics that fueled demagoguery, perpetual campaigns, and a lack of accountability. Personal presidential politics was more polarizing than the politics of consensus or of coalition building. Presidents should be able to do their job without constant carping from outsiders who fancied themselves prospective presidents. Mass parties with certain partisan principles would enable presidents to get the backing they needed to do their work.

Moreover, the existence of two parties would enable the nation to move beyond its many cleavages—that is, toward the general interest and away from simple clashes of particular interests. Competition among parties, like competition among economic enterprises, would bring about a situation in which disparate demands would be promoted by a party. The key was to achieve a balance of competing forces. Summarizing Van Buren, political scientist James W. Ceaser has written:

Established parties ... may stand "over" the raw electoral cleavages, possessing some leeway or discretion about which potential issues and electoral divisions will be emphasized and which will be suppressed or kept at the fringes. This discretion is exercised according to the interests of the organizations and the judgement of their leaders. But it is important to keep in mind that the degree of this discretion is limited.... Their discretion is always threatened or held in check by the possibility that they might be displaced by a new party having as its goal the advancement of a certain policy.... When a sufficiently powerful and enduring issue exists, an impartial reading of American party history suggests that the party system in the end will have to respond to it, regardless of how the established parties initially react.<sup>24</sup>

The Age of Jackson brought a fundamental shift from republican to democratic values as the nation's territory and activities expanded. Republicanism was the product of a variety of strains of thought—from the Romans Cicero and Tacitus and the Greek Polybius to the Frenchman Charles Montesquieu—that stressed the need for a balancing of interests to produce public virtue. Republicans worried about excess in any single form of governance, particularly “mob rule.” For them, democracy was a term of derision. That is why the Constitution contained many buffers against this and other forms of excess.

Republicanism declined in many stages. A greater stress on the individual's role in society, embodied in the work of Adam Smith and David Hume, restricted the kinds of issues open to public deliberation. At the same time, the pace of economic change undermined established patterns. As the nation demanded large-scale projects (such as canals and railways), and as rival factions looked to the mobilization of larger and larger parts of the electorate to augment their strength, democratic rhetoric gained respectability. Mass party participation became a vehicle for pursuing civic virtue and balance, and the notion of a constant opposition party gained strength. If the democratic process had enough constitutional “checks,” political thinkers now reasoned, the harmful “mob” aspects of democracy could be tempered. The development of the Jacksonian party as a way of arbitrating interests was the final stage in republican decline and democratic ascendance.

Political scientist Russell Hanson has noted that the new democratic ethos sprang from one of the same goals as the old republican ethos: development of a public spirit by rising above particular restraints. “Support for popular sovereignty became the lowest common denominator for a Democratic Party composed of interests seeking liberation from a variety of sectionally specific restraints on the ‘will of the people.’”<sup>25</sup>

A two-party system persisted as the nation drifted toward civil war, but it was not a simple two-party system. The Democrats and Whigs competed for the presidency and other political offices until 1856, when the Republican Party fielded its first national ticket and made the Whigs obsolete. But the parties were so unstable that their many elements were constantly forming and breaking up coalitions—and threatening to bolt from the system itself. Moreover, a series of third parties entered the national electoral arena for short periods, applying or relieving pressures on the two major parties.<sup>26</sup>

Only by examining the parties and their various factions and struggles can one understand the presidential contests in the two decades before the Civil War, and the way that the Civil War revealed the basic fault lines of U.S. politics.

The Whigs' Victory: 1840

The Whigs developed to fill the role of their British namesake, which had been to mount a republican opposition to the royal ruling power. When the rise of Andrew Jackson and his supposedly imperial presidency threatened the “balance” of the United States, the Whigs rose to restore that balance. The Whigs saw Jackson's Democrats as a faction of the most dangerous variety—a majority faction that had the ability to trample liberties in its mad scramble for spoils.

The key to Whiggery was the notion of balanced development. The Whigs opposed the war with Mexico and other expansionist programs because they feared the perils of overextending the nation's abilities and getting entangled with foreign powers. They favored internal improvements, but only as a way of maintaining balance and staving off the corruption of the Jackson era. The protective tariff was central to the Whigs' program of internal development and protection from outsiders. According to Hanson,

Even in America, which was uniquely blessed by an abundance of natural resources and a citizenry of hardy stock, there was need for informed guidance and direction of progress. For the Whigs, government was the primary agent of this progress. Government represented a strong and positive force to be used in calling forth a richer society from the unsettled possibilities of America. In the economic realm this meant that government was responsible for providing the essential conditions for a sound economy, namely, a reliable currency, ample credit, and the impetus for internal improvements. In the social realm, the government was responsible for promoting virtue in its citizenry through education and exhortation.<sup>27</sup>

The Whigs' desire for balance and compromise was intended to give the party a national rather than a sectional identity. Moreover, their tendency to nominate widely popular military heroes helped to create at least the illusion of a party of national dimensions. A series of Senate battles with President Jackson, especially the tariff battles of 1833, which resulted in an unsatisfying compromise, gave impetus to grassroots organizations in the North and West and to Southern Democratic opponents. In fact, the Whigs developed first in the South where voters were dissatisfied with Jackson's selection of Van Buren as his running mate. There, loose coalitions elected candidates in the 1834 and 1835 state and congressional elections. Westerners also organized to oppose the Democratic Party, which was headed by a New Yorker.

The first serious Whig presidential contest was a loss, but an encouraging one. In 1836 the Whig tickets headed by William Henry Harrison and others had shown surprising appeal in the loss to the Democrat Van Buren. The Whigs had won Jackson's home state of Tennessee and neighboring Georgia, as well as three border slave states, and were strong competitors elsewhere. Harrison had carried the old Northwest (now the Midwest) and had come close in northern states such as Pennsylvania.

Because of the rise of the antislavery “conscience Whigs,” the Whigs eventually moved to a completely different base of support—the North rather than the South and West—but their early organizing at least broke the Democratic stranglehold on the latter two regions. The Whigs nominated Harrison in 1840 after a nomination struggle with Henry Clay. A Clay supporter, John Tyler of Virginia, was the vice-presidential nominee. This time, the popular if politically inexperienced hero of the War of 1812 won his ticket to the White House. Harrison defeated the incumbent Van Buren in an electoral vote landslide, receiving 234 of the 294 electoral votes—all the states except Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Missouri, New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Virginia. For the popular vote, Harrison won 1.3 million (52.9 percent) to Van Buren’s 1.1 million (46.8 percent).

According to political scientist Richard P. McCormick,

The campaign of 1840 brought the American party system at last to fruition. In every region of the country, and indeed in every state, politics was conducted within the framework of a two-party system, and in all but a handful of states the parties were so closely balanced as to be competitive. In broad terms, it was the contest for the presidency that shaped this party system and defined its essential purpose.<sup>28</sup>

Harrison’s campaign was as vague as his government experience was unimpressive. The image of Harrison as a sort of frontier everyman—which received its popular expression when a Baltimore newspaper mocked him as a sedentary man who would sit in a log cabin and drink cider rather than perform great deeds of leadership—was the theme of numerous parades and mass meetings. On issues from banking and currency to slavery, Harrison spoke in generalities. Harrison’s strategist acknowledged that he advised the candidate to “say not a single word about his principles or creed. Let him say nothing—promise nothing.”<sup>29</sup>

As it happened, Harrison did not have an opportunity to do much as president besides discipline the aggressive Clay. Clay had assumed that he and the rest of the congressional leadership would play the leading role in the government, but Harrison quickly dispelled that notion in a note rebuking him. But one month after his inauguration, the sixty-eight-year-old Harrison developed pneumonia and died. On April 6, 1841, the burdens of the presidency fell on Vice President Tyler, who became the first to assume the office after the death of a president.

The rift between the White House and Congress widened under Tyler. Clay acted as if he were prime minister during a special session of Congress, pushing through a legislative program that included a recharter of the long-controversial Bank of the United States, higher import taxes, and distribution of proceeds from land sales to the states. Tyler, a lifetime states’ rights advocate, vetoed two bills for a national bank, and the Whigs in Congress and his cabinet began a bitter feud with the president. In 1842 Clay left the Senate to promote his presidential aspirations, and everyone in the cabinet except Secretary of State Daniel Webster quit. Tyler was all alone, but he did manage to defeat the Whig program in his four years as president.

Polk’s Dark-Horse Victory: 1844

The Democrats were transformed into a well-organized party by Jackson and Van Buren between 1828 and 1836. But, as with the Whigs, the Democratic Party became vulnerable because of the irreconcilable differences among many of its parts.

From the beginning, the Democratic Party had contained contradictory elements. According to political scientist James L. Sundquist: “The party had been formed originally as an alliance between Southern planters and New Yorkers and had always spanned both regions. Northern men of abolitionist sympathies were accustomed to sitting with slaveholders in presidential cabinets and collaborating with them in the halls of Congress.”<sup>30</sup> But northern Democrats went so far as to organize antiabolitionist rallies in their cities and towns, and newspapers and churches also defended slavery.

The deepest Democratic divisions—which eventually would lead to the failure not only of the party but also of the nation—were the regional differences based on slavery. But other, more complex divisions also affected the operation of the Democratic Party. When the party was able to reconcile or even delay action on the divisive issues, it won. When the divisions burst into the open, the party was in trouble.

James K. Polk of Tennessee, the first “dark-horse” candidate in history, defeated the Whig Henry Clay in 1844 by supporting an expansionist program and winning the support of the solid South. One of the key issues in the campaign was whether Texas should be admitted to the Union and, if so, whether it should be a slave or free state. President Van Buren in 1840 had opposed annexation—opposition that may have cost him the presidency—and the Democrats and Whigs hedged on the issue for the next eight years. In 1844 Polk endorsed the annexation of Texas as a slave state; that was enough for him to lock up the South.

During the 1844 nominating convention, the Democrats finessed the sectional dangers of the Texas issue by combining it with a call for occupying Oregon and eventually bringing that state into the Union. The Democrats also appealed to Pennsylvania and the rest of the Northeast by supporting a high tariff. Both parties spoke out against the growing foreign elements in the cities, but the Whigs were more effective because of the Democrats’ swelling immigrant ranks.

In the election, the Democrat Polk defeated the Whig Clay, winning 1.34 million votes (49.5 percent) to Clay's 1.30 million (48.1 percent) and 170 electoral votes to Clay's 105. Clay received his strongest support from five northeastern states and five border slave states. Of the expansionist Northwest, only Ohio fell in the Clay column.

The Liberty Party—an abolitionist party formed out of more than two hundred antislavery societies in time for the 1840 election—may have been the deciding factor in the 1844 race. Although the party received only 2.3 percent of the popular vote and no electoral votes, it was strong enough in New York to prevent the Whigs from winning that state's crucial thirty-six electoral votes. Those votes went to the Democrat Polk rather than to the Whig Clay.

The depth of the Democrats' divisions were agonizingly evident even when the party won elections and started to pass out spoils and make policy. Like Harrison, the Whig who had won the presidency four years before, President Polk faced the antagonisms of party factions when he began making appointments after his 1844 win. Westerners were angry when they were shut out of the cabinet and Polk vetoed a rivers and harbors bill. Supporters of both Van Buren and John Calhoun were angry that their faction did not win more prominent positions. Northeasterners were upset at tariff cuts. The New York split between the reformist "Barnburners" and the party-regular "Hunkers"—who disagreed on every issue, including banks, currency, internal improvements, and political reforms—also disrupted the administration.

Creating still more dissension was the war with Mexico (1846–1848), fought because of the dispute over the Texas border and the possible annexation of California. Northerners resented the country's fighting Mexico over a slave state.

Whig Success under Taylor: 1848

In 1848 the Whigs recaptured the White House behind another military hero, Gen. Zachary Taylor, who was vague on most political issues. Hailing from Louisiana, where he was a slave owner, Taylor defeated the irrepressible Clay and Gen. Winfield Scott for the nomination on the fourth convention ballot. His running mate was New Yorker Millard Fillmore. Clay mounted an impressive public campaign that drew large crowds, but the Whigs had lost too many times with Clay.

The Whigs were so determined to avoid sectional and other splits that they not only nominated the popular Taylor but also eschewed writing a platform. Despite such extreme measures to maintain unity, the convention was disturbed by squabbles between pro- and antislavery forces on the question of the Wilmot Proviso, which would ban slavery in any territory the United States obtained from Mexico.

At the Democratic national convention, Sen. Lewis Cass of Michigan defeated Sen. James Buchanan of Pennsylvania and Supreme Court Justice Levi Woodbury for the presidential nomination, and Gen. William Butler was picked as his running mate. (The Democratic incumbent Polk had declared after taking his office that he would not seek a second term.) But the convention experienced splits between two New York factions: the Barnburners, who were part of the antislavery movement, and the more conservative Hunkers, who had ties to Southerners. The Barnburners finally defected from the party to become part of the Free Soil Party.

The Democrats behind Cass praised the administration of the beleaguered Polk, defended the war with Mexico, congratulated the French Republic that emerged from the wave of revolution in Europe, and did everything it could to avoid the nasty slavery issue. The nomination of Cass—a "doughface," or northerner with southern principles—was expected to appeal to both sides of the simmering issue.

But Taylor defeated Cass, winning 1.4 million popular votes (47.3 percent) to Cass's 1.2 million (42.5 percent). New York Democrat Van Buren, the former president, running on the Free Soil ticket, won 291,500 votes (10 percent) but no electoral votes. Taylor received 163 electoral votes to Cass's 127, with a strong showing in the North. Taylor won Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont in the North; Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, and Tennessee in the border states; and Florida, Georgia, and Louisiana in the Deep South. This combination was enough to beat Cass's coalition of seven slave states, six northwestern states, and two New England states.

On July 10, 1850, Fillmore succeeded to the presidency when Taylor died suddenly. After consuming too many refreshments at a Fourth of July celebration, Taylor had developed cramps and then a fatal illness, probably typhoid fever.

Despite this turn of events, Fillmore was unable to secure the party nomination two years later, in 1852, although he had an early lead in convention polling. Gen. Scott won the nomination, and the Whigs entered into permanent decline.

SLAVERY DIVIDES THE NATION

The Whigs' electoral strategy with dealing with the nation's disagreements was to select military heroes as candidates and take vague stances on issues. When divisive issues erupted, however, the party suffered.

The tariff issue and their mildly probusiness stance gave the Whigs strength in the North. But, like the Democrats, they also needed to attract support in the South—a goal they sought by trying to keep the slavery question out of their rhetoric. The Whigs could count on being competitive in the border slave states but not in the rest of Dixie. In 1844 Henry Clay had won only the northern rim of slave states (Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, and Tennessee).

The abolitionist movement, which may be dated to the founding of William Lloyd Garrison's newspaper, the Liberator, in 1831, posed problems for the Whigs that eventually proved fatal. The antislavery belt developed in the Whigs' strongest territory—New England—and westward into the modern-day Midwest. Abolitionism was largely an upper- or middle-class and religious cause. But it also became a partisan issue: the Whigs, the party out of power for years, needed an issue with which to confront the Democrats, and slavery was a useful one, even if the Whigs' antislavery stance in the North contradicted their accommodating stance in the South.

As Sundquist has noted, both the Whig and Democratic parties in the pre-Civil War era attempted to ignore the slavery issue, but the Whigs had less room to maneuver. The Democrats' agrarian and populist position gave them the solid South as a foundation, and they could make a variety of antiabolitionist appeals to the rest of the electorate. Democrats could argue that their support for slavery in the South was compatible with their many "moderate" positions. The appeal of Senators Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois and James Buchanan rested on such a coalition-building strategy. The Whigs, however, included vociferous opponents of slavery who could not be reconciled easily with "moderate" positions. Abolitionism had upper-class and religious roots that were difficult to use as a foundation. The support the Whigs were able to retain in the South was based on their positions on local issues. In sum, the Whigs did not have the same potential to build a national party organization as the Democrats.

Because both parties contained slavery sympathizers and opponents, neither was willing to take a principled stand against the institution, particularly where it already existed. This was not the case, however, for issues such as westward expansion, banking questions, public improvements, the tariff, and foreign relations, where their differences were more evident. But third parties such as the Liberty and Free Soil parties had no such hesitations about pressing the slavery issue. In fact, sectional cleavages were so strong that in 1836 Congress passed a "gag rule" that forbade the reading of antislavery statements in Congress. Such attempts to silence abolitionist fervor were in vain, however, because politics was entering an age of mass communication and organization. The slavery issue would become irrepressible.

The slavery issue split the Whigs badly with the controversy over the admission of Texas to the Union in 1845. A splinter group of young party members calling themselves the "Conscience Whigs" argued for a straightforward statement of principle against slavery. An opposition group, "Cotton Whigs," wanted to defuse the slavery issue by ignoring moral arguments and simply calling for a halt to annexation. The party split became complete with Clay's Compromise of 1850, which admitted California as a free state, ended slave trade in the District of Columbia, and admitted Texas but reduced its size by splitting off the New Mexico territory. After agitation from Conscience Whigs and General Winfield Scott's nomination in 1852, the party was irreparably rent by the slavery issue.

The 1852 Whig convention platform contained several statements supporting states' rights and the principles behind Clay's compromise<sup>31</sup>—concessions made by northern Whigs to win southern support for their presidential favorite, General Scott. But when no Whigs voted for the Kansas-Nebraska Act in 1854, which permitted new states to determine individually the slavery question, the Whigs' remaining ties to Dixie were severed.

The Whigs' strength in the Northwest was almost nonexistent. Only Ohio, in 1844, went for the Whigs even once over the course of the 1844, 1848, and 1852 presidential elections. Previously strong ties between the "lake region" and the South deteriorated as immigrants and others moved from the Northeast to the Northwest and, after the completion of railroad links, the two regions developed strong economic ties.

The Whigs' last gasp came in 1852, when Scott was demolished by Democrat Franklin Pierce, who won all thirty-one states except two in New England (Massachusetts and Vermont) and two border states (Kentucky and Tennessee). In 1856 the Whigs split their votes among Democrat Buchanan, former Whig Millard Fillmore, and Republican John C. Fremont. At that time, not all Whigs were ready yet to join the nascent Republican Party because of the extremism of some of the party's abolitionists. But the majority of Whigs folded into the Republicans in 1860 when Republican presidential candidate Abraham Lincoln avoided a white "backlash" by insisting that he supported slavery where it existed and opposed its spread only because of how it would affect the economic fortunes of poor northern whites.

The Democrats suffered a North-South cleavage that Lincoln exploited in the 1860 election against Douglas. Southern Democrats were intent on protecting slavery, and control of Congress was necessary to their strategy. They believed that extension of slavery to the new states joining the Union was needed to maintain their congressional strength. In short, the extension of slavery was the issue that most divided the Democratic Party.

Northern Democrats were willing to allow Dixie to maintain its peculiar institution but were scared about their electoral prospects if slavery should expand. At first they rallied to Douglas's doctrine of "popular sovereignty"

(under which the people of new states could decide whether to adopt slavery), but they became nervous when Lincoln hammered away at his argument that any unchecked slavery threatened the freedom of whites as well as blacks. Lincoln argued that Democrats such as Douglas wanted to make slavery a national, rather than an individual state, institution.

Lincoln planted seeds of doubt about partial solutions to the slavery extension question by asserting that slavery could extend to whites if it were nationalized: “If free negroes should be made things, how long, think you, before they will begin to make things out of poor white men?”<sup>32</sup> Lincoln also maintained that the extension of slavery into new territories would close off those areas for whites seeking upward mobility: “The whole nation is interested that the best use be made of these Territories. We want them for homes of free white people. This they cannot be, to any considerable extent, if slavery shall be planted within them.”<sup>33</sup>

Following Lincoln’s lead, the growing movement against the extension of slavery was based on a concern for the upward mobility of labor. Rather than stressing the common interests of blacks and poor, northern, white laborers, the antiextension movement played up the competition between the two groups. Horace Greeley’s vision of the frontier as “the great regulator of the relations of Labor and Capital, the safety valve of our industrial and social engine” left little room for the extension of slavery into the new territories.<sup>34</sup>

Democrat Pierce’s Victory: 1852

Clay’s congressional compromise on slavery in the territories, known as the Compromise of 1850, turned out to be the major reason for the Democrats’ 1852 victory. The compromise addressed the slavery question in all of the new U.S. territories by making concessions to both sides of the struggle. For the North, California would be admitted as a free state, and the slave trade (but not slavery itself) would be abolished in the District of Columbia. For the South, fugitive slave laws would be strengthened, and the New Mexico territory would be divided into two states where the voters, exercising popular sovereignty, would decide the slave issue.

The compromise was designed to settle the issue of slavery in new territories once and for all. But the slavery issue could not be contained by region; it had an increasingly important “spillover” effect. Because of concerns about the congressional balance of power and the difficulties of enforcing slavery provisions such as the fugitive slave law in states that opposed slavery, it was impossible to isolate the slavery question into particular regions as Clay intended.

President Zachary Taylor had stalled action on the compromise for months and even suggested that California and New Mexico might become independent nations. But his successor, Fillmore, had thrown his support behind the compromise. The Whigs were divided on the proposal.

General Scott won the Whig nomination in 1852 after platform concessions to the party’s southern delegation. Scott’s appeal was always limited to the North, while Fillmore appealed to the South and Daniel Webster appealed to New England. Scott won on the fifty-third ballot.

Pierce, governor of New Hampshire, a dark-horse candidate who gained fame with his Mexican War record, won the Democratic nomination in 1852. His vice-presidential running mate was Sen. William Rufus de Vane King of Alabama. The party held together a coalition of groups with contradictory positions on the slavery issue and regional affairs. The convention, meeting in Baltimore, pledged to “abide by, and adhere to” Clay’s compromise and to do what it could to smother the slavery issue.

Attempts to inject issues of economics and foreign affairs into the election failed, and the campaign degenerated into squabbles over personalities. Pierce easily won with 1.6 million popular votes (50.8 percent) to Scott’s 1.4 million (43.9 percent). Pierce carried twenty-seven states and 254 electoral votes to Scott’s four states and 42 electoral votes. Free-Soil candidate John P. Hale took 4.9 percent of the popular vote and won no electoral votes.

The Democrats’ Bruising Victory: 1856

By 1856 the national parties were coming apart. The North-South split had eliminated the Whigs as a national party and was rendering the Democrats into two camps, damaging the party’s chances for winning national elections in the decades ahead. A new national party, the Republican Party, emerged from the remnants of the Whigs and dissatisfied members of other factions.

Congress had opened the slavery issue by passing the Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854. The act declared “null and void” the Missouri Compromise of 1820, which had prohibited slavery in new territories north of the 36°30’ parallel except in Missouri. The 1854 legislation created two territories (Kansas and Nebraska) from the original Nebraska territory and left the slavery issue to be determined by popular sovereignty there and in the Utah and New Mexico territories.

The Kansas-Nebraska Act was a vehicle to spur the development of the West. Such development was part of a long-standing American approach to creating opportunity and freedom via growth. Senator Douglas of Illinois—the promoter of the law and the main advocate of popular sovereignty—held that the law was necessary if the country was to be bound together by rail and telegraph lines and was to drive Great Britain from the continent. The latter goal was based on the widely held suspicion that Britain was exploiting the slavery issue to distract American politics and stunt the growth of the nation.

Whatever the economic motives for unification, the Kansas-Nebraska Act was bitterly divisive. Northern state legislatures passed resolutions denouncing the law. The development of sectional parties continued. A flood of new settlers into Kansas, and the violence that accompanied balloting over whether Kansas was to be a free or a slave state, further inflamed passions. Neighboring Missourians took part in the controversy, arguing that their status as slave owners would be undermined if Kansas voted to be free.

After an 1854 meeting in Ripon, Wisconsin, where the party was first proposed, the Republican Party developed quickly. The Republicans had developed a strong grassroots organization in the Northwest after the Kansas-Nebraska Act passed in 1854 and attracted disgruntled abolitionists, Whigs, Know-Nothings, Northern Democrats, and members of the Liberty and Free Soil parties who were troubled by the possible extension of slavery. Uncertainty about how the extension of slavery would affect laborers who sought opportunity in the territories also helped to unite the new coalition.

The first Republican nominating convention met in Philadelphia in 1856 with delegates from all of the free states, four border states, three territories, and the District of Columbia. The party's opposition to slavery was far from unanimous, but its willingness to address rather than suppress the issue enabled it to redefine the political dialogue. Besides strong antislavery statements, the party platform contained proposals for several internal improvements advantageous to the North. The party did not offer anything to the solidly Democratic South. To win a national election, it would have to sweep the North. Col. John Charles Fremont was named the Republicans' first presidential candidate. Former Whig senator William Dayton of New Jersey received the vice-presidential nomination.

The Democrats, in endorsing the Kansas-Nebraska Act in 1856, continued rapidly on the path of becoming a southern party. Meeting in Cincinnati, Ohio, after seventeen roll-call votes, the party nominated the pro-South Buchanan as presidential candidate. John Breckinridge of Kentucky, who later served as a Confederate general, was Buchanan's running mate. The Democrats' platform stressed limited federal government and sought compromises on slavery. Benefiting from close wins in Buchanan's home state of Pennsylvania and in New Jersey, and in western states such as Illinois, Indiana, and California, the Democrats won the White House. But the only strong region for the Democrats was the South. Buchanan won all the slave states except Maryland. Overall, Buchanan won 1.8 million popular votes (45.3 percent) to Fremont's 1.3 million (33.1 percent). The electoral college gave Buchanan a 174–114 victory.

The nativist American Party—or the “Know-Nothings,” as they were called—nominated former Whig president Fillmore, but the party was never able to move beyond an urban strength based on parochial resistance to immigration and Catholicism. Fillmore won only the state of Maryland; overall, he got 873,000 popular votes (21.5 percent) and 8 electoral votes.

The Fateful Election: 1860

When the time came for the 1860 presidential campaign, the Democrats had become hopelessly split over slavery. The biggest sticking point was the Supreme Court's infamous 1857 Dred Scott decision, which, by decreeing that Congress had no power to prohibit slavery in a territory, was just what Southerners favoring popular sovereignty wanted. Yet it also created uncertainty about any legislature's authority over slavery. If Congress could not regulate slavery, could state legislatures? Illinois senator Douglas insisted on state resolution of the slavery issue. However, the Democratic administration of President Buchanan had waged war on Douglas earlier by ousting his allies from the federal bureaucracy for opposing the administration's pro-southern stance on the Kansas issue. Jefferson Davis of Mississippi, who later became president of the Confederate States of America, led Southern Democrats in Congress who argued that Congress had the right to promote and protect slavery in new territories.

At the Democratic convention in Charleston, South Carolina, Douglas managed several moderate platform victories, defeating resolutions that called for acceptance of the Dred Scott decision and protection of slavery in the territories. But Douglas's success prompted delegates from ten southern states to bolt the convention. After disputes over quorum rules and fifty-seven ballots, the Democrats were unable to muster the necessary two-thirds majority for Douglas. The convention therefore adjourned, reassembled in Baltimore in June, and faced disputes about the seating of delegates that caused further defections from the South. With southern radicals effectively eliminated from the convention, Douglas swept to a unanimous nomination victory.

Meanwhile, the southern defectors held their own Democratic convention in June and nominated Vice President Breckinridge for the presidency. The Southern Democrats insisted that they were the backbone of the party and could win the White House as they had been strong enough to elect Buchanan four years before. The Constitutional Union Party, which developed as a futile attempt to repair the nation's geographic divisions, nominated moderate John Bell of Tennessee.

With the Dred Scott decision as a rallying point for popular control of government, and the Democrats in disarray, the Republicans held a frenzied convention in Chicago. After the convention blocked several radical candidates, Lincoln, the former U.S. representative of Illinois, emerged as the compromise choice. Although Lincoln had lost the 1858 Senate race to Douglas two years earlier, his stance against the expansion of slavery into the territories had made him a national figure. The fact that Lincoln was widely supported throughout Illinois also had improved his chances at the Chicago convention.

None of the four major candidates seeking the presidency, however, could compete seriously throughout the nation. The two Southerners, Breckinridge and Bell, were doomed from the start, because the South's electoral vote total was significantly below that of the North. The presidential winner was likely to be a candidate from the North, the region with the most electoral votes—that is, either Lincoln, a Republican, or Douglas, a Democrat.

Lincoln won easily with a total of 180 electoral votes to Breckinridge's 72, Bell's 39, and Douglas's 12. Lincoln's closest competitor in the popular vote was Douglas. Lincoln had 1.9 million northern popular votes (40.0 percent); Douglas had 1.4 million (29.5 percent) spread out geographically. The two other principal candidates received much less support, which was concentrated in the South: Breckinridge won 848,000 popular votes (18.1 percent); Bell, 591,000 (12.6 percent).

Thanks to the wide-ranging Republican coalition—one that eluded the Whigs in their last years of existence—Lincoln was able to count on strength in the areas that Fremont had won in 1856: New England and the upper Northwest, as well as New York and Ohio. Lincoln's political ties to Illinois, where he practiced law and began his public career, would help in Illinois and Indiana, and his background as a former Whig was a plus in the Ohio valley. The coal and iron regions of Pennsylvania and Ohio were attracted to the party's high-tariff policy. Urban immigrants, particularly Germans, were attracted by the Republican support of homestead (frontier settlement) legislation and the Lincoln campaign's "Vote Yourself a Farm" appeal.<sup>35</sup> The vice-presidential selection of Hannibal Hamlin of Maine, a former Democrat, broadened the coalition beyond partisan lines. Lincoln's oft-stated desire not to challenge slavery where it then existed was an appeal to border states.

The Republicans succeeded in 1860 because they were able to pull together a variety of potentially warring factions. But above all else the Republicans stood against the extension of slavery into new territories. By accepting slavery where it already existed but warning against the spread of the system, the Republicans divided the Democrats and picked up support from a diverse array of otherwise contentious factions—abolitionists, moderate abolitionists, and whites who feared for their position in the economy. Moreover, the Dred Scott decision enabled the Republicans to rail publicly against the high court in the tradition of Jefferson and Jackson. While opposing the Democratic doctrine of popular sovereignty, the Republicans picked up some states' rights sympathizers by having a middle-ground slavery stance.

Because some Southerners had vowed to secede from the Union if Lincoln won the election, in the period before Lincoln's inauguration congressional committees sought to put together a compromise that would save the nation from civil war. They failed, however, because of Lincoln's refusal to abandon his policy of containing slavery. He rejected proposals for popular sovereignty or a slave-free geographic division of western states, and he would not comment on proposals for constitutional amendments or popular referenda on the issue.

After Lincoln was elected, South Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Texas, and Florida seceded from the Union and on February 7, 1861, adopted a constitution forming the Confederate States of America. After a protracted standoff between Union soldiers who held Fort Sumter and the Confederate soldiers who controlled South Carolina, the Confederates fired on the fort. Virginia, Arkansas, North Carolina, and Tennessee then joined the Confederacy on April 13, 1861, and the Civil War was under way.

The Civil War Election: 1864

The Union's military difficulties in 1861 and 1862 created resentment against and impatience with President Lincoln. The splits that developed in the Republican Party seemed to imperil his chances for renomination and reelection.

From the beginning of his administration, Lincoln suffered because of the difficulty he had finding a general who could successfully prosecute the war. Repeated military setbacks and stalemates—such as the Battles of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, Confederate general Robert E. Lee's escape after the battle of Antietam (Sharpsburg), and heavy casualties in the drive to Richmond—hurt the Republicans. Publicized conflicts with Union generals such as George McClellan caused further damage. In addition to the military problems, the president's announcement in September 1862 of the emancipation of slaves in rebellious states (the Emancipation Proclamation) created legal and political controversy.

In the 1862 midterm elections, the Republicans experienced widespread losses in congressional and state elections. Among the more bitter defeats for Lincoln was Democrat John Stuart's victory in the president's old congressional district in Illinois. By the time of the presidential election, Stuart, a former law partner of the president, was an ardent political foe.

The military frustrations gave rise to deep divisions within Lincoln's cabinet. Treasury Secretary Salmon P. Chase was a constant critic of Lincoln's capacity to serve as commander in chief, and the Philadelphia banker Jay Gould briefly led a movement for Chase's nomination for president in 1864. Chase withdrew only after the Lincoln forces dealt him a severe blow at the party caucus in his home state of Ohio. Other radicals met in Cleveland in May 1864 and

PRESIDENT OF THE CONFEDERACY

In 1861, two weeks before Abraham Lincoln was inaugurated in Washington, D.C., as the sixteenth president of the United States, another president was inaugurated in Montgomery, Alabama. On February 18, 1861, Jefferson Davis became the first and only president of the Confederate States of America.

Davis was born in Christian (now Todd) County, Kentucky, on June 3, 1808. He was the youngest of the ten children of Samuel and Jane Davis, who moved their family to a small Mississippi plantation when Jefferson was a boy. He attended private schools and Transylvania University in Lexington, Kentucky, before his oldest brother, Joseph, secured his appointment to West Point in 1824.

After graduating from the academy, Davis was stationed in Wisconsin under Col. Zachary Taylor. There he saw action in the Black Hawk War during the early 1830s and fell in love with Taylor's daughter, Sarah Knox. In 1835 he left the army, married Sarah, and settled on a one-thousand-acre plantation in Mississippi, which was given to him by his brother Joseph. Tragically, Sarah died from malaria three months after the wedding, and for several years Davis devoted himself to developing his land and wealth.

In 1845 Davis married Varina Howell, a member of the Mississippi aristocracy, and was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives. He served in Washington less than a year before the Mexican War began, and he gave up his seat to accept a commission as a colonel. He became a national hero when his company made a stand at the Battle of Buena Vista that was said to have saved Gen. Zachary Taylor's army from defeat.

In 1847 he left the army and was elected to the Senate. He served there until 1851, when he ran unsuccessfully for governor of Mississippi. He returned to Washington in 1853 after being appointed secretary of war by President Franklin Pierce. Davis was credited with strengthening the armed forces during his time in office. He also was influential in bringing about the Gadsden Purchase from Mexico in 1853, which added southern areas of present-day Arizona and New Mexico to the United States.

In 1857 Davis was reelected to the Senate. Although he became a leading spokesperson for the South, he did not advocate secession until 1860 when it had become inevitable. Davis hoped to be appointed commanding general of the South's army, but instead he was chosen as president by a convention of the seceding states.

Davis believed his first priority as president was to preserve Southern independence. He tried to secure French and British assistance for the Confederacy, but he was largely unsuccessful. Similar to what Lincoln did with the Northern army, Davis helped develop military strategy and on occasion interfered with the plans of his generals. In managing the war effort, Davis was hampered by his paradoxical position. The South could fight most effectively as a unified nation run by the central government in Richmond, but the Southern states had succeeded in part to preserve their rights as independent states. Davis took actions, including the suspension of habeas corpus and the establishment of conscription, that were regarded as despotic by many Southerners.

When the Union's victory appeared imminent in early 1865, Davis fled south from Richmond and was captured by federal troops. He was indicted for treason and imprisoned for two years, but he never stood trial. He lived in Canada and Europe for several years before retiring to Mississippi. There he wrote his Rise and Fall of the Confederate Government, which was published in 1881. He died in New Orleans on December 6, 1889.

named John Fremont to run against Lincoln in the fall. Fremont withdrew only after a series of Union military victories strengthened Lincoln's political standing.

The president manipulated the Republican convention in Baltimore brilliantly, ensuring not only his renomination but also the selection of pro-Union governor Andrew Johnson of Union-occupied Tennessee—a lifelong Democrat—as the vice-presidential candidate. Lincoln professed indifference about a possible running mate. "Wish not to interfere about V.P. Cannot interfere about platform," he said in a letter. "Convention must judge for itself."<sup>36</sup> Nevertheless, he maneuvered to build support for Johnson. Johnson's selection was in accord with the desire of the party, which also called itself the Union Party as a way to attract Democrats and to develop nationwide unity. Yet Lincoln's reelection drive was so uncertain that he obliged his cabinet in August 1864 to sign a statement pledging an orderly transition of power if he lost. The statement read: "This morning, as for some days past, it seems exceedingly probable that this Administration will not be reelected. Then it will be my duty to so cooperate with the President-elect, as to save the Union between the election and the inauguration; as he will have secured his election on such ground that he cannot possibly save it afterwards."<sup>37</sup>

The man for whom Lincoln anticipated arranging a wartime transition was Democratic nominee George McClellan, whom Lincoln had fired as general in January 1863. McClellan had won the Democratic nomination with the strong backing of "peace Democrats" such as Clement L. Vallandigham of Ohio, who was arrested by Union general Ambrose E. Burnside after making a series of antiwar speeches. (Vallandigham later took up exile in Canada.) McClellan's running mate was Rep. George Pendleton of Ohio, who after the war would sponsor landmark civil service reform legislation.

Although popular with his soldiers, General McClellan had not won a single major battle of the war despite many infusions of extra troops. Yet he blamed Lincoln for the losses. Indeed, he was a vocal critic of the administration. McClellan's presidential campaign was built around a call for a cease-fire and a convention to restore the Union. He and his fellow peace Democrats also criticized the administration's violation of civil liberties and other unconstitutional actions.

Lincoln's fortunes improved in the two months before the election. When Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman took Atlanta after a scorched-earth march through the South, the Confederacy was left badly divided geographically. The military victory cut off the Gulf states from the Confederate capital of Richmond. Gen. Philip Sheridan had had important successes in the Shenandoah Valley, and Gen. Ulysses S. Grant had fared well in Virginia.

Not only did the Democrats face a Republican Party reconstituted for the war election as the Union Party and united by recent military victories, but McClellan also had a difficult time developing consistent campaign themes. He was at various times conciliatory toward the Confederacy and solicitous of the soldiers who fought for the Union. The balancing problem was underscored by the inclusion of both war and peace songs in the McClellan Campaign Songster, a piece of campaign literature.<sup>38</sup> McClellan also had a difficult time selling his message to northern industrialists who were profiting from munitions procurement.

Not until the arrival of election results from three state elections on October 11 were Lincoln and the Unionists confident that they would win the national election in November. Republican victories in Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania were the first concrete indications that Lincoln's fortunes had turned around.

Lincoln overwhelmed McClellan by winning all of the loyal states except Delaware, Kentucky, and New Jersey for a 212–21 electoral vote victory. Lincoln garnered 2.2 million popular votes (55.0 percent) to McClellan's 1.8 million (45.0 percent). The electoral votes of Louisiana and Tennessee, the first Confederate states to return to the Union, were not accepted by Congress.

POSTWAR RADICALISM

The end of the Civil War left the nation almost as divided as it had been in the antebellum years. Concerns about punishment of the rebel states, the status of the freedmen, and economic development replaced slavery as the principal sources of disagreement.

The nation undoubtedly would have experienced bitter splits no matter who had served as chief executive, but the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln on April 14, 1865, shortly after the Confederate surrender, created a crisis of leadership. Lincoln's vice president, Andrew Johnson, ascended to the presidency and quickly came into conflict with the radical Northern Republicans who controlled Congress. Johnson, a Democrat from Tennessee, was stubborn, which only aggravated the troubles that were inevitable anyway because of his party and regional background.

Johnson intended to continue Lincoln's plans for the reconstruction of the North and South "with malice toward none"; he chafed at the notion of the South as a conquered territory. A states' rights politician, Johnson attempted to put together a coalition of moderates from all parts of the country that would bring about a quick reconciliation between his administration and Congress.

But Congress was intent on establishing political institutions that would respect the rights of former slaves and promote economic growth and vowed to use military occupation to destroy the South's old political elite.<sup>39</sup> Thus Johnson and Congress fought over bills that would extend the life of the Freedmen's Bureau (an agency established to help blacks make the transition from slavery to citizenship) and guarantee the franchise and equal protection to blacks, with the result that Johnson vetoed both bills. Johnson also opposed the Fourteenth Amendment, which guaranteed equal protection, as well as the stipulation that Confederate states approve the amendment as a condition of their readmission to the Union.

When the Radical Republicans took over Congress in the 1866 midterm elections, the war with Johnson began in earnest. In March 1867 Congress established limited military rule in recalcitrant Southern states and in May passed the Tenure of Office Act limiting the president's right to dismiss his appointees. Johnson contemptuously disregarded the tenure act and fired Edwin Stanton, his secretary of war. For this action Johnson was impeached by the House and tried by the Senate. When the Senate voted in May 1868, he avoided the two-thirds total needed for conviction by a single vote (35–19).

The Grant Victories: 1868 and 1872

Ulysses S. Grant was more than a concerned citizen during the dispute between Johnson and Congress. Despite its portrayal in many history books as a clear instance of congressional abuse of power, the affair was more complicated. All of the players in the drama negotiated their way with care, and almost none of them escaped without major scars. Grant was a central figure, and his style of maneuvering was dictated by his ambition to succeed Johnson as president.

Radical Republicans in Congress achieved a lasting victory when they secured passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 over President Johnson's veto, but they were increasingly disturbed by reports that the statute was not being enforced. A congressional investigation of violence against blacks in Memphis concluded that the Freedmen's Bureau could not enforce civil rights without help. Radicals began to look to Secretary of War Stanton to enforce the law that the president clearly disliked and repeatedly subverted. When Stanton indicated that he would carry out the law in the Confederacy as Congress intended, Johnson began to think about replacing him. At this point Congress passed the Tenure of Office Act over Johnson's veto in May 1867, reasoning that its constitutional "advise and consent" powers over appointments could be extended to removal as well. Johnson, however, decided to test the law's constitutionality.

In replacing Stanton, Johnson's concern—and indeed the concern of all involved—was who could assume the secretary of war post with minimal threat to Johnson's position. The president first considered General Sherman but decided to appoint Grant on a temporary basis. Originally a Democrat and supporter of moderate policies toward the South, Grant worried about appearing too close to the unpopular president. As a result, after vaguely assuring Johnson that he would accept a temporary appointment, Grant hedged. He increasingly expressed support for the notion that appointees should interpret and obey laws according to congressional intent. Eventually Grant told the president in a letter that he could not accept the appointment.

After the drama of Johnson's impeachment in 1868, Grant was in a good position to seek the White House. He had avoided allying himself with controversy during both Johnson's search for a replacement for Stanton and the ensuing impeachment battle. In fact, he and Chief Justice Salmon Chase were the only ones not tainted by the affair. Grant even managed to maintain his public posture of disinterested duty. Thus during one of the nation's ugliest political episodes, Grant looked clean. He was ready for a presidential campaign.

As Johnson endured his Senate impeachment trial in March, Grant won his first electoral victory. A New Hampshire congressional campaign, which normally would favor the Democrat, became an early Grant referendum when Republican candidate Donald Sickles told voters that a vote for a Republican was a vote for Grant; Sickles won. Just before the Republican convention in May, a Soldiers and Sailors Convention "nominated" Grant. Yet he avoided an excessively military image when he vowed to reduce the size of the standing army. Grant was on his way.

Grant won the presidential nomination without opposition. The real battle at the 1868 Republican convention was for the vice-presidential nomination. Schuyler Colfax of Indiana, the Speaker of the House, won on the sixth ballot; eleven candidates received votes on the initial roll call.

The Democrats had a difficult time finding a nominee. Johnson sought the Democratic nomination, but his appeal was to the South. (Because many Southern states were still outside the Union, Northern politicians were selecting the nominee.) Chief Justice Chase, highly regarded for his fairness during Johnson's Senate trial, was a possibility, but his strong stand for black suffrage was a barrier. Sen. Thomas A. Hendricks of Indiana was strong in the East, and George Pendleton of Ohio, the party's vice-presidential candidate four years earlier, was strong in the West. Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock of Pennsylvania presented the opportunity of running one military hero against another.

After twenty-three bitter ballots in a sweltering New York City, Horatio Seymour, the national party chair and popular war governor of New York, accepted the Democratic nomination against his will. Gen. Francis P. Blair Jr. of Missouri was the vice-presidential nominee. The party platform called for the rapid reentry of Confederate states to the Union, state authority over suffrage questions, and the "Ohio Idea," which promised an inflationary money supply that would help the indebted South.

Both sides were well financed in the election, but the Republicans had the edge. The Republican Party's probusiness positions on the tariff, railroad grants, and the currency attracted millions of dollars. Newspapers and magazines tended to be pro-Republican because of their urban business orientations.

Grant, who ran his campaign from his home in Galena, Illinois, was vague about issues ranging from the currency to voting rights. Appearances in Colorado with fellow generals Sherman and Sheridan were taken to be endorsements. Everything seemed to go Grant's way. Even the traditional campaign gossip about the sexual activities of candidates did not hurt him. Charges that Grant was excessively problack—"I am Captain Grant of the Black Marines, the stupidest man that was ever seen" were the lyrics of one ditty<sup>40</sup>—helped him with the recently enfranchised citizens. Without the black vote, Grant probably would have lost the popular vote and perhaps the electoral vote. Results from October state elections that favored the Republicans created a brief movement for Seymour and Blair to quit the contest so that the Democrats could name a new ticket. Instead, Seymour took the October results as an incentive to get on the campaign stump. Seymour was a good speaker, but he still came up short.

Grant defeated Seymour by 3.0 million (52.7 percent) to 2.7 million votes (47.3 percent). The electoral vote tally was 214 for Grant and 80 for Seymour. Finally, Grant won all but eight of the thirty-four states taking part in the election. He benefited from Radical Republican reconstructionist sentiment in the North and newly enfranchised blacks in the South.

With Grant's ascension to the presidency in 1869, the Republican Party entered a new era—what the German sociologist Max Weber would have called a shift from "charismatic" to "rational" institutional authority. In other words, the party shifted its devotion from a great moral cause to its own survival as an organization. It had begun as a coalition of activists fervently opposed to the expansion of slavery (many opposed slavery itself) and to the rebellion of Southern states from the Union. The Republicans' 1868 victory under Grant was the first not dominated wholly by crisis conditions.

The Republicans had a strong base of support: eastern bankers, manufacturers, railroad tycoons, and land speculators. With the old Confederacy under the control of military governments and with blacks given the franchise, the Republicans had strength in the South. The West was restive, however, because of depressed farm prices, high taxes, and debt. The industrial-agrarian split between North and South before the Civil War would be resumed as an East-West split in the years after the war.

The Republican leadership itself was changing. Age was claiming a number of the early Republican leaders, such as Thaddeus Stevens, William Seward, Benjamin Wade, Charles Sumner, James Grimes, Stanton, and Chase. New party leaders included Senators Roscoe Conkling of New York, Oliver Morton of Indiana, Simon Cameron of Pennsylvania, and Zachariah Chandler of Michigan, and Representatives Benjamin Butler of Massachusetts, John Logan of Illinois, James A. Garfield of Ohio, and James G. Blaine of Maine.

As for the new Grant administration, it was undistinguished. The new president's inaugural address—spoken without the traditional company of the outgoing president because Grant had neglected to respond to Johnson's polite letters—was decent but uninspiring. Grant vowed that "all laws will be faithfully executed, whether they meet my approval or not," that debtors would not be tolerated, and that blacks should get the vote throughout the country and Indians should be offered "civilization and ultimate citizenship."<sup>41</sup> With a few important exceptions, cabinet positions went to old Grant cronies.

In 1869 the nation experienced a financial panic when financiers Jay Gould and Jim Fisk attempted to corner the world's gold market. Their scheme led to "Black Friday," September 24, 1869. Gould and Fisk had met with President Grant and had urged him not to sell government gold, therefore keeping the price of gold high. At the last minute, however, Grant decided to reject their advice and dumped $4 million worth of gold on the market. That dumping caused a severe drop in gold prices, breaking up the Gould-Fisk conspiracy but also causing tremendous losses for thousands of speculators. It was the worst disaster on Wall Street up to that time. Although it did not cause a depression, the South and West were hard hit by the financial retrenchment program that followed. Tariff rates remained high on most manufactured goods, despite tentative efforts to reform the system.

The spoils system was in full swing during the Grant years. Grant himself was not involved in the scramble for booty, but his family and aides were often shameless in their greed. When Grant learned that liberal Republicans were planning an independent presidential campaign against him in 1872, he took the edge off the spoils issue by creating the Civil Service Reform Commission, but his neglect of the commission made it ineffective.

Before the 1872 election, the New York Sun exposed the Crédit Mobilier scandal. The newspaper reported that the firm's board of directors had many of the same members as the Union Pacific Railroad Company, which hired it to build a transcontinental route, and that Crédit Mobilier had paid its board exorbitant profits. To avoid a public investigation, Crédit Mobilier offered stock to Vice President Colfax and Representative (later president) Garfield. Colfax lost his place on the Republican ticket for his role in the scandal; Sen. Henry Wilson of New Hampshire took his position as the vice-presidential candidate in 1872.

Liberal Republicans, unhappy with protective tariffs, spoils, and the uneven administration of the Southern states, bolted the party in 1872. The group was interested in policies such as civil service and free trade that would promote individual virtue in a laissez-faire economic system. The reformers thought they had a chance to win. The German-born senator Carl Schurz of Missouri wrote to a friend that "the administration with its train of offices and office-mongers [is] the great incubus pressing upon the party.... The superstition that Grant is the necessary man is rapidly giving way. The spell is broken, and we have only to push through the breach."<sup>42</sup>

Candidates for the nomination from this group of Republicans included former ambassador to Great Britain Charles Francis Adams, son of President John Quincy Adams and grandson of President John Adams; Supreme Court Justice David Davis; Chief Justice Salmon Chase; Sen. Lyman Trumbull of Illinois; and Horace Greeley, editor of the New York Tribune. Greeley won the nomination on the sixth ballot and ran as a Democrat and Liberal Republican. The Democrats were so weak that they did not field a candidate of their own. They endorsed the Greeley ticket. (Charles O'Connor of New York was nominated by a group of "Non-coalition Democrats" for president. He did not accept the nomination.)

Since his early days as a newspaper reporter, when he described President Van Buren as an effeminate failure, Greeley had won fame as a pungent social critic. He was a crusading, abolitionist editor and a dedicated reformer, but his rumpled appearance and unpolished speaking style made him appear "unpresidential." Greeley was unable to parlay an amalgam of promises to various interest groups—blacks, soldiers, immigrants, and laborers—into a victory over Grant. Groups that Greeley actively courted found him wanting for a variety of reasons, and even though Greeley advocated the tariff favored by the North, he could not cut into Grant's northeastern strength. One Republican cartoon that revealed Greeley's difficult task showed a fence on which sat a laborer, skeptical because of Greeley's stand against strikes, and a black, concerned because of Greeley's advocacy of amnesty for Confederates. Sitting on the sidelines was a German, upset with Greeley's prohibitionist stance: "Oh! Yaw! You would take my Lager away, den you must get widout me along!"<sup>43</sup>

Even though he went on the stump and delivered a series of impressive speeches, Greeley never had a chance. Republican gubernatorial victories in North Carolina in August and in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana in October were clear harbingers that the Republican Party would do well in November. Grant took the entire North and the newly admitted South with 3.6 million popular votes (55.6 percent). Greeley won three border states, as well as Tennessee, Texas, and Georgia, with 2.8 million popular votes (43.9 percent). Less than a month after the election, Greeley died. Of the electoral votes, which were cast after Greeley's death, Grant received 286; the Democrats' 63 electoral votes were scattered among various candidates, and 17 Democratic electoral votes were not cast.

Compromise: 1876

The pattern of Republican, northern, and business domination of presidential politics was institutionalized in the 1876 election. Republican Rutherford B. Hayes, the three-time governor of Ohio, lost the popular vote and had a questionable hold on the electoral college vote, but he managed to beat Democrat Samuel J. Tilden for the presidency when the election was settled by a special commission created by Congress. (Hayes won 4.0 million votes to Tilden's 4.3 million—48.0 and 51.0 percent of the popular vote, respectively.) Perhaps the most controversial election outcome in history, some feared it would set off a second civil war.

The problem arose when the vote tallies in Florida, South Carolina, and Louisiana were called into question. Violence had accompanied the voting in all three states, but President Grant had not sent in federal troops to ensure fair balloting. On those states hung the electoral outcome. There was good reason to be suspicious of any vote count in those and other Southern states. While the Republicans had controlled the balloting places and mounted vigorous drives to get blacks to the polls, the Democrats had used physical intimidation and bribery to keep blacks away. The bitterness between northern interests and southern whites was apparent in the violence that often took place at polls.

When state election board recounts and investigations did not settle the question of the vote tallies, Congress took up the matter. An electoral commission made up of five senators (three majority-party Republicans, two minority Democrats), five representatives (three majority-party Democrats, two minority Republicans), and five Supreme Court justices (two from each party, one independent) assembled to hear complaints about the disputed states. At the last minute the independent justice disqualified himself, and his place was taken by a Republican who was accepted by Democrats because they considered him to be the most independent of the Republican justices. Weeks of bargaining followed, during which the Republican vote totals of the disputed states were confirmed and the Southern Democrats extracted promises of financial aid and political independence from the federal government.

When the validity of the Florida vote count for Hayes was challenged, the commission responded that it did not have the capacity to judge the actual conduct of the balloting, only the validity of the certificates presented to Congress. That decision gave the state to Hayes. Challenges to the vote counts of Louisiana, South Carolina, and Oregon were dismissed in a similar way, so Hayes was awarded the presidency by a single electoral vote, 185 to 184.

The compromise not only settled the partisan dispute between Hayes and Tilden but also established a rigid alignment of political interests that would dominate U.S. politics for the next half-century. Although Democrats won occasional victories, the Republican, eastern, conservative, business-oriented establishment held sway over the system until Franklin Roosevelt's election in 1932.

The institutional form of the regional splits created by the compromise remained much longer. Historian C. Vann Woodward has argued that secret wheeling and dealing among congressional and party leaders institutionally divided the political system by party, region, economic interest, and governmental branches. Northern Republican industrial interests were given control of the presidential election process, and southern Democratic agricultural interests were given autonomy over their regional politics, which led to domination of Congress.<sup>44</sup> This alignment was not completely dislodged until the passage of important civil rights legislation in the 1960s.

To reward southern Democrats for throwing the 1876 election to the Republican Hayes, northern politicians agreed to pull federal troops out of the South and to allow southern whites to take over the governments. Within months Southern states were erecting a powerful edifice of racial discrimination that would last until the 1960s. Former South Carolina governor Daniel H. Chamberlain, a Republican, later summed up the deal:

What is the president's Southern policy? [I]t consists in the abandonment of Southern Republicans and especially the colored race, to the control and rule not only of the Democratic Party, but of that class of the South which regarded slavery as a Divine Institution, which waged four years of destructive war for its perpetuation, which steadily opposed citizenship and suffrage for the negro—in a word, a class whose traditions, principles, and history are opposed to every step and feature of what Republicans call our national progress since 1860.<sup>45</sup>

AGE OF REPUBLICANISM

From 1860 to 1908, the Republicans won eleven elections; the Democrats won only two. Only Grover Cleveland could put together Democratic wins, and he was as conservative on most issues as the Republicans of the period. Presidential election winners after the Great Compromise were Rutherford B. Hayes (1876), James A. Garfield (1880), Cleveland (1884), Benjamin Harrison (1888), Cleveland (1892), William McKinley (1896 and 1900), Theodore Roosevelt (1904), and William Howard Taft (1908).

The political aspirants of the day were required to adhere to the creed of high tariffs, laissez-faire economics, and tight money. Tight money policies—the restricted issuance of currency, which favored bankers and other established interests but hurt debtors and those seeking more rapid expansion of some kinds of investment and spending—provided rare openings for effective Democratic resistance to Republican hegemony. Resistance did develop, however, when the scramble for tariff protections created obvious inequities among businesses and hardships for the consumer. Yet populist uprisings, such as Democrat William Jennings Bryan's 1896 campaign, faltered because of strong mobilization by the Republicans and divisions within the Democratic ranks. Bryan failed to bring a likely Democratic constituency—the worker—into the fold. Eastern business owners were able to portray their interest in industrial growth as a common concern with labor and Bryan's western agrarian alliance as a danger to that growth.

Although the Republican Party dominated presidential politics, the parties were well balanced in Congress and in state governments until the class and sectional cleavages of the 1890s. The Senate was split evenly in 1881, 37–37, and two years later the Republicans had a 38–36 edge. The Democrats had made gains in northern congressional races, and Republicans were making smaller gains in the South. The House tended to provide a majority for whichever party held the White House.

Garfield Carries the Republican Banner: 1880

Hayes honored his pledge to serve only one term, setting off a scramble for both parties' nominations in 1880. When the early momentum for a third term for Grant faltered, the Republican contest became a battle between Grant, Sen. James G. Blaine of Maine, and Treasury secretary John Sherman of Ohio. Grant was able to muster a first-ballot plurality but could not attract new supporters as the balloting proceeded. A stalemate between Blaine and Sherman ensued.

Rep. Garfield of Ohio, a former preacher who was impressive in his oratory and organization for Sherman, was the compromise choice for the nomination. He selected as his running mate Chester A. Arthur, the collector of the Port of New York, an important patronage job.

The Democrats named Gen. Winfield Hancock of Pennsylvania and former Indiana representative William English to head their ticket. The Democratic platform advocated the gold standard, a low tariff designed to raise revenue, civil service reform, restrictions on Chinese immigration, and a belated criticism of the 1876 deal that gave the presidency to Hayes. Except for the tariff and 1876 questions, the Democrats' platform was close to the Republicans' statement of principles.

The regional breakdown of support, with most of the North and West falling in Garfield's camp and the South lining up behind Hancock, gave the presidency to Garfield. The popular vote was close—4.45 million (48.27 percent) to 4.44 million (48.25 percent)—but Garfield won a 214–155 electoral vote victory.

The festering issue of patronage and civil service came to a head shortly after Garfield's inauguration. On July 2, 1881, Charles Guiteau, a man later described as a “disappointed office-seeker,” shot Garfield while he was en route to Williams College to deliver a commencement address. Garfield died in September, and Arthur became president.

The outstanding feature of Arthur's presidency was the easy passage of the Pendleton Act—legislation that set up a commission to regulate the provision of federal jobs and the behavior of civil servants. The number of federal workers removed from the patronage system was at first small, but successive presidents widened the coverage of nonpartisan workers so that today less than 1 percent of all federal workers are appointed by the president.<sup>46</sup> The tariff question also emerged as crucial during the Arthur presidency. The Tariff Act of 1883 “gave little or no relief to the consumer and took care of every important industrial interest.”<sup>47</sup> The Democrats opposed the bill and later worked for the gradual lowering of rates, but they failed. The tariff would be a major issue in later elections.

Democrat Cleveland Wins: 1884

Arthur wanted the Republican nomination in 1884, and his record as stand-in for the assassinated Garfield arguably should have earned him the nod—even though no successor president during the nineteenth century had been nominated by his party. Not only was he an important player in civil service reform and the tariff issue, but he initiated modernization of the navy and vetoed the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882, which prohibited Chinese laborers from entering the United States for ten years. His veto of the $19 million rivers and harbors bill was a model of fiscal probity.

Blaine of Maine—secretary of state in Arthur's administration—stood in the president's way. After months of public appeals by old-line Republicans interested in stronger leadership and more generous patronage from their party, Blaine quit his administration position and opposed Arthur for the nomination.

The fiery oratory of 1884 Republican candidate James G. Blaine captured the imagination of the political establishment, but it was not enough to win him the election over Democrat Grover Cleveland.

Blaine was the most charismatic figure of the period. A former teacher, editor, state legislator, and member of Congress, Blaine's fiery oratory captured the imagination of the political establishment. He had made a national name for himself when he opposed an 1876 congressional resolution expressing forgiveness to Civil War rebels including the Confederate president, Jefferson Davis. Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, a rising political figure in the Republican Party, said of Blaine: “Like an armed warrior, like a plumed knight, James G. Blaine marched down the halls of the American Congress and threw his shining lance full and fair against the brazen forehead of every traitor to his country.”<sup>48</sup> The sobriquet “Plumed Knight” caught on.

The Republican convention in Chicago praised Arthur’s administration and fudged the tariff issue. The tariff that passed in 1883 was the product of the efforts of swarms of lobbyists for private interests. The Republican platform promised better protection for raw wool interests, angered by their treatment in 1883, and a generally protective stance for domestic industry. The platform also called for an international currency conference, railway regulation, a national agency for labor affairs, and further improvements in the navy.

At a frenzied convention, Blaine took the lead over Arthur on the first ballot. Old-line party leaders quickly united behind Blaine, while Arthur was unable to consolidate the support of reform Republicans still skeptical of his leadership abilities from his days as a patronage politician and collector of the Port of New York. Blaine won the nomination on the fourth ballot. Gen. John Logan of Illinois received the vice-presidential nomination.

The Democrats nominated Cleveland after skirmishes with Sen. Thomas F. Bayard Jr. of Delaware and Sen. Thomas A. Hendricks of Indiana. Hendricks, whose liberal expansionist currency stance would balance the more conservative stance of Cleveland, was named the vice-presidential candidate. The Democratic platform vaguely promised reform of the tariff laws to make them fairer and, even more vaguely, promised a more honest and efficient administration.

Cleveland was a former teacher, lawyer, assistant district attorney, and reform mayor of Buffalo who had won the governorship of New York only two years before. Members of both parties consistently underestimated Cleveland’s intellect and resolve. As governor, he had made enemies through his vetoes of low public transit fares and aid to sectarian schools. He also had defied Tammany Hall, the Democratic Party organization that dominated New York politics, especially in New York City.

Cleveland’s nomination signaled a triumph for the “educational politics” characteristic of urban progressivism. (Progressives took a patriarchal view of politics in which elites assumed an obligation to better their social underlings through education and various social services.) In a move away from the highly partisan and vitriolic campaigns of the post–Civil War era, Cleveland and other disciples of former New York governor Samuel Tilden promoted their program through a “literary bureau” that distributed pamphlets describing the party’s policy positions. Campaign themes were developed at the national level and disseminated via the mails and meetings with the many professional and community organizations. The educational style was adopted by Republican candidate Harrison in 1888.<sup>49</sup>

In contrast, Blaine’s campaign was one of the dirtiest in U.S. history. He first attempted to spark sectional antagonisms with his “bloody shirt” warnings that the South was trying to reassert its rebel ways through Cleveland. Blaine also tried to rouse the fears of business with claims that Cleveland would institute free trade policies damaging to domestic industries. But that appeal failed because the Democratic platform’s plank on the tariff laws specifically supported protection of those interests. Finally, Blaine tried to make a scandal of Cleveland’s admission that he had fathered a child out of wedlock years before. Cleveland was charged, among other things, with kidnapping and immuring both the mother and child to cover up the story.

The campaign eventually turned on Cleveland’s victory in New York, which resulted from a number of blunders by Blaine. One blunder had occurred years before, when Blaine mocked New York party boss Roscoe Conkling: “The contempt of that large-minded gentleman is so wilted, his haughty disdain, his grandiloquent swell, his majestic, supereminent, overpowering, turkey-gobbler strut, has been so crushing to myself that I know it was an act of the greatest temerity to venture upon a controversy with him.”<sup>50</sup> Conkling was so peeved by the turkey image that he spent his whole career battling Blaine, including the presidential campaign of 1884. Even Blaine’s running mate, Logan, sympathized with Conkling in the dispute.

The other Blaine faux pas occurred a week before the election when a Protestant minister praised Blaine and proclaimed, “We are Republicans, and do not propose to leave our party and identify ourselves with the party whose antecedents have been rum, Romanism, and rebellion.” Blaine did not divorce himself from the remark, which angered New York Democrats—and ethnic voters everywhere—and cost him many votes. Later the same day Blaine attended a formal dinner with a number of wealthy persons that became known as “the millionaires dinner.” That event belied Blaine’s claim to speak for ordinary people.

Of Irish background, Blaine appealed to Irish immigrants in New York for their votes. But Cleveland countered Blaine’s Irish tactic by obtaining the last-minute endorsement of the powerful Tammany leader Edward Kelly. On the Saturday before the election, he attended a parade in New York City that attracted 40,000 people chanting: “Blaine, Blaine, James G. Blaine, the Monumental Liar from the State of Maine!” With the help of an economic downturn and the “Mugwumps”—independents and liberal Republicans offended by Blaine—Cleveland won the presidency.

The race, however, was close. Cleveland received 4.9 million votes (48.5 percent) to Blaine’s 4.8 million (48.3 percent). He won the solid South, Indiana, Connecticut, New Jersey, and, most important, New York (although by only 1,047 out of 1.13 million votes cast). Still, the election controversy did not end with the balloting. The New York Tribune originally reported that Blaine had won the race, fueling fears about an election deadlock similar to the Hayes-Tilden contest of 1876. But Cleveland received 219 electoral votes to Blaine's 182, making the Democrat the clear winner.

Cleveland's first two years in the White House were productive. His inaugural address and cabinet selections elicited wide praise. His style of leadership—examined closely in the newspapers—appeared refreshingly unassuming. The Cleveland agenda included issues such as tariff reform (cutting rates on the “necessaries of life”), modernization of the navy, civil service, expansion, and land law reform. The president oversaw passage of the Presidential Succession Act and the Electoral Count Act, changes in currency policy, and labor controversies.

Just as he had done during his terms as mayor of Buffalo and governor of New York, Cleveland icily refused to compromise his values. This steadfastness proved to be a problem, however, when Cleveland entered the White House. Thousands of Democratic Party workers went to Washington seeking jobs in the new administration only to be disappointed. “Ah, I suppose you mean that I should appoint two horse thieves a day instead of one,” Cleveland said in response to one party leader.<sup>51</sup> In vetoing pension bills, Cleveland called their sponsors “blood-suckers,” “coffee-boilers,” “pension leeches,” and “bums.”<sup>52</sup> The president appeared just as aloof to labor when a record number of strikes and disturbances swept the nation in 1886; the federal troops that Cleveland sent to the Haymarket riot in Chicago killed thirty people.

When Cleveland did bend to political realities, his timing was off. After standing firm against patronage when party enthusiasm for reform was at its height, Cleveland disappointed reformers when he allowed lieutenants such as First Assistant Postmaster Adlai E. Stevenson to distribute favors.

The biggest controversy of the Cleveland administration involved tariffs. Concerned about federal budget surpluses that threatened to stall economic activity, Cleveland prodded the House of Representatives to pass tariff reductions. The Senate responded with a protective (high) tariff measure.

The Republican Recovery: 1888

The tariff issue propelled the two parties into the 1888 election. At their national convention the Democrats nominated Cleveland by acclamation and chose seventy-five-year-old judge Allen G. Thurman of Ohio for the vice presidency. The Democrats tried to soften their low-tariff image by promising that open trade would open world markets to domestic industries. Lower tariffs were said to be necessary for avoiding disastrous federal budget surpluses, preventing the development of monopolies, and ensuring consumers reasonable prices for basic goods.

Captioned “Another Voice for Cleveland,” this 1884 cartoon played on Cleveland’s admission that he had fathered an illegitimate son.

As for the Republicans, a politics-weary Blaine sent word from Florence and Paris that he would not be a candidate in 1888, leaving the race open to some lesser political lights, including Sen. John Sherman of Ohio, Gov. Russell Alger of Michigan, Sen. William Allison of Iowa, and Sen. Harrison of Indiana. At the Republican national convention Sherman led the early balloting but quickly lost ground to Alger and Harrison. After extensive backroom maneuvering, including a last-minute plea by party members to Blaine to accept the nomination, Harrison, who had the backing of state party bosses, won on the ninth ballot. Levi Morton, a banker, got the vice-presidential nomination.

Harrison, a senator from Indiana, was a former Civil War brigadier and the grandson of President William Henry Harrison. Characterized by a scandal-free if colorless demeanor, Harrison was a good speaker, but he often appeared aloof. One historian wrote: “Those who talked with him were met with a frigid look from two expressionless steel grey eyes; and their remarks were sometimes answered in a few chill monosyllables devoid of the slightest note of interest.”<sup>53</sup> Harrison pledged a modernized navy, civil service reforms, and the traditional Republican policies to protect trusts and restrict U.S. markets.

The election turned, as in 1884, on New York and Indiana—both states with extensive evidence of voter intimidation and manipulation of vote counts. Harrison won the two states narrowly—New York by only 14,373 votes out of the 1.3 million cast—and captured the White House. Except for Connecticut and New Jersey, Harrison swept the North and West. Cleveland won the South. Overall, Harrison won 5.4 million popular votes (47.8 percent) and 233 electoral votes; Cleveland won 5.5 million popular votes (48.6 percent) and 168 electoral votes.

Cleveland left the White House with an unusual amount of good will among the public because of his honest tariff campaign. His popularity increased during the next four years as the economy hit slumps and as the former president, while practicing law, delivered speeches calling for a more egalitarian brand of politics. Cleveland would be back in 1892 for vindication.

With a majority in Congress and a president in the White House—the first time the party had accomplished such a feat in a dozen years—the Republicans went about their business briskly after the election. Postmaster General John Wanamaker dispensed patronage with zeal. President Harrison signed into law the McKinley Tariff Act and the Sherman Silver Purchase Act. The former raised duties on manufactured goods to their highest level ever but also included provisions for negotiating with other countries to bring the rates down. The silver act loosened the money supply, which stimulated economic activity but angered creditors and bankers (money, when it is more readily available, is worth less).

Cleveland's Comeback: 1892

The 1890 midterm elections brought huge Democratic gains. Voters all over the country—but especially in the depressed farm belt—rebelled against the inflation that high tariffs brought. The Republicans held on to the Senate, but the new House of Representatives had 235 Democrats, 88 Republicans, and 9 Farmers' Alliance members. The brief experiment with party government ended with two years of stalemate.

President Harrison evoked widespread discontent in 1892 for both his demeanor and his policies, but no Republican could mount an effective challenge. Through their strong party government, Republicans had cast their lot with Harrison and had few places to turn for an alternative. Political wizard Mark Hanna, a wealthy coal magnate who had become a powerful behind-the-scenes Republican strategist, promoted Ohio governor William McKinley, and Secretary of State Blaine became an alternative when he abruptly quit the administration just before the Republican convention. But Harrison received a first-ballot nomination. Former minister to France Whitelaw Reid of New York got the vice-presidential nomination.

In the battle for the Democratic nomination, Cleveland enjoyed widespread backing among rank-and-file voters, but party leaders were suspicious. New York governor David B. Hill got a head start when he called a “snap” state convention and won the delegation. An “anti-snapper” convention from New York sent a rival delegation to the national party convention. Democrats across the country rebelled at Hill's move and rapidly switched their support to Cleveland.

Another problem for Cleveland was the rising sentiment in agrarian states for free and unlimited coinage of silver—a way of boosting sagging farm prices by inducing inflation in the overall economy. Cleveland always had opposed this solution. The former president's consistent, principled stance on the issue not only added to his reputation for integrity but also kept business- and finance-dominated northeastern states in the Democratic camp. Cleveland defeated Hill for the nomination on the first ballot and selected his former first assistant postmaster Adlai Stevenson of Illinois as his running mate.

The fall campaign was uneventful. Historian Eugene Roseboom wrote: “Honest bearded Benjamin Harrison confronting honest mustached Grover Cleveland in a tariff debate was a repeat performance that did not inspire parades with torches or the chanting of campaign ditties.... Democrats, out of power, could assail Republican tariff policy without clarifying their own position.”<sup>54</sup>

Cleveland won easily. He received 5.6 million popular votes (46.1 percent) to Harrison's 5.2 million (43.0 percent) and 277 electoral votes to Harrison's 145. Populist general James B. Weaver, advocating expansion of currency and limits on interest rates, won 1.0 million popular votes (8.5 percent) and 22 electoral votes.

AGE OF REFORM

Throughout the period dominated by Republican conservatism—from Ulysses S. Grant's election in 1868 to William McKinley's 1896 win—movements for the reform of political and economic institutions gathered strength at all levels of the American political system. The so-called populists and progressives did not overturn the system, as their rhetoric sometimes suggested, but over time they made major changes in the operation and discourse of U.S. politics.

Depending on the time and place, Americans who called themselves “populists” and “progressives” promoted such contradictory notions as strict morals and free spirits, tight money and loose money, redistribution to the masses and control of the economy by elites, federal intervention and local control of politics, the opening and closing of electoral participation, technological progress and a return to a long-gone pastoral ideal, individualism and community action, ethnic celebration and immigration barriers, scientific investigation and religion, and internationalism and isolationism.

Reformism was the response to the pressures of national expansion, urban development, and growth. Both major parties had adopted probusiness, laissez-faire policies in the latter part of the nineteenth century; indeed, the parties seemed to exist mainly to ensure the terrain was suitable for economic expansion. But the lack of any program to deal with the undesired consequences of explosive growth led to an accumulation of problems that demanded attention. The most obvious problems evolved on the opposite ends of the rural-urban continuum: on the farms and in the cities.

The farm problem developed as the United States became a major economic power in the world. Agriculture expanded on a vast scale to feed the booming cities and, with international trade, to bring foreign capital to the United States. By 1880 the value of U.S. wheat and flour exports nearly equaled that of cotton exports.<sup>55</sup> As agriculture became part of the international market, farmers became dependent not only on the vagaries of the weather but also on the fluctuations of currency in the larger economy.

In the thirty years after the Civil War, prices for farm staples fell steadily. A debt that could have been paid by producing one thousand bushels of grain immediately after the war required three thousand bushels in 1895. The more farmers produced to meet their obligations, the more prices fell to exacerbate their problems. A solution to the problem required confronting a wide array of issues, including tight money, bankers who charged 20 percent interest for loans, monopolies among farm equipment producers, high tariffs, railroad price gouging, shipping inflation, warehouse monopolies, and land speculation. Throughout the farm belt, particularly in the West, tens of thousands of farmers developed an "intense class consciousness."<sup>56</sup>

All these issues received attention from a variety of third parties and independent organizations, but the two major parties usually were inattentive. The Granger Movement of the 1870s, for example, took hold in several farm states and elected new legislatures and high state officials. The Greenback Party attempted to merge a labor-farmer alliance with a doctrine of silver use for public debts. Later, the Farmers' Alliance politicized the same issues. In 1892 the Populist Party had won 8.5 percent of the vote on a platform calling for free coinage of silver.

Another site of growing reformist strength was the city. The dominance of machines of both parties in the cities established an electoral system based on patronage but stubbornly opposed to any coherent program for addressing urban ills such as poverty, poor housing, unsanitary conditions, transportation, education, and unfair workplace practices. Electoral fraud spurred mostly middle-class reformers to devise new electoral and city government machinery, while social problems incited some insurgent class politics.<sup>57</sup> The labor movement developed strength during this period.<sup>58</sup>

Other parts of the progressive agenda developed with a greater understanding of the nationalization of the economic and political systems. The wider sphere of economic activities created calls for regulation of corporations, railroads, and banks, as well as attention to health and environmental concerns and product safety.

Until the ascendance of William Jennings Bryan, the Democratic presidential nominee in 1896, 1900, and 1908, the reformers had been unable to capture a major party. Partly because political activism was based at the state and local level, neither national party had adopted the reformers' widely variegated program as its own. But the depression of 1888 caused the populist forces to pull together more than they had during previous economic downturns, probably because of the accumulated effects of inaction. The earlier panic of 1873 had created a sectional rather than a party split, with the Democrats eventually adopting a more conservative stance on the debate over whether the currency should be expanded to spur economic activity and redistribute social burdens.<sup>59</sup>

The Republican presidential candidates in the post-Civil War years steadfastly opposed the class-oriented proposals of the progressive movement, especially the loose-money demands. The only Democrat to win the presidency since the Civil War was Cleveland, a stubborn advocate of hard money and other conservative economic policies, in 1884 and 1892. President Cleveland vetoed dozens of private pension bills, only grudgingly accepted railroad regulation, and did not address domestic problems in any comprehensive way. Cleveland's public statements on the currency question were especially strong. He called the use of silver "a dangerous and reckless experiment" that was "unpatriotic."<sup>60</sup> On the question of labor, Cleveland was just as conservative: he called out federal troops to put down the Pullman strike of 1894 and regularly preached about the evils of disorder that the labor movement seemed to foster.

Despite the complexity of the agriculture issue, the most concerted populist action concentrated on the currency question. The drive to overturn the prevailing conventional economic thought by moving from a gold (tight) to a gold and silver (loose) money standard captured the imagination of the entire farm belt stretching from the Southeast to the prairie and silver-producing states of the West. The silver standard was a very simple answer to the problem of farm prices: "If money was scarce, the farmer reasoned, then the logical thing was to increase the money supply."<sup>61</sup>

Republican McKinley Triumphs: 1896 and 1900

Gold runs on banks, manipulation of the gold crisis by J. P. Morgan and other leading financiers, Supreme Court decisions favoring corporations, and antilabor actions all stirred up resentment in the South and West. The silver sentiment escalated. The Democratic convention in 1896 called for the issuance of silver and rejected a resolution praising President Cleveland.<sup>62</sup> The movement for a silver currency found an eloquent advocate in Bryan, a member of the House of Representatives from Nebraska, who defeated Richard P. Bland of Missouri for the 1896

Democratic presidential nomination on the strength of his fiery “Cross of Gold” speech.

The speech was one of the most emotional and successful in U.S. history. Bryan attacked eastern financiers and businessmen who exploited farmers. Using a theme to which his fall campaign would return, Bryan sought to expand the traditional Democratic conception of the independent working man to include farmers and factory workers.<sup>63</sup> In his speech’s fortissimo, Bryan declared: “You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns, you shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold.”<sup>64</sup>

In 1896 the Republicans nominated Ohio governor McKinley after brilliant maneuvering by his manager, Mark Hanna. Hanna’s chief strengths were fund-raising and his mastery over state party organizations.

McKinley had little difficulty defeating Bryan. McKinley outspent the prairie populist by as much as ten-to-one, and he attracted the disaffected progold wing of the Democratic Party.<sup>65</sup> The Grand Old Party (or GOP as it was by then called) platform called for retention of the gold standard unless international negotiations could produce a bimetallic (silver and gold) currency system. The platform also called for restored tariff protections and an aggressive foreign policy in the Western Hemisphere.

Bryan’s campaign was a political hurricane. He spent just $650,000, most of it donated by silver interests, compared with the millions McKinley spent. But Bryan traveled 18,000 miles and gave 600 speeches, and his campaign staffers put out an impressive quantity of literature. Several million copies of Coin’s Financial School, a prosilver pamphlet, were distributed during fall 1896. Other silverites also maintained busy speaking schedules in the fall.

Bryan’s appeal to industrial workers to join his coalition of independent businesspeople failed, largely because they depended for their livelihoods on the very eastern interests that Bryan attacked. McKinley won not only the East but also the small cities and towns in Bryan’s southern and western belt of support. Bryan was unable to win rural areas in the East. McKinley won the popular vote 7.1 million (51.0 percent) to 6.5 million (46.7 percent) and the electoral vote 271–176.

The effect of the 1896 presidential election was lasting. James Sundquist wrote: “For 20 years the two-party system had been based on dead issues of the past. It had offered the voters no means of expressing a choice on the crucial issues of domestic policy around which the country had been polarizing.... Then suddenly, with the nomination of Bryan in 1896, the party system took on meaning once again.”<sup>66</sup>

The new Republican coalition included residents of cities, where capital and labor were both reasonably content with the economic growth that the GOP tariff policy promoted; farmers in the East and Midwest, who had strong ties to the “party of Lincoln” and who had come to favor high tariffs; Catholic, German Lutheran, and other liturgical Christian denominations; and some border states. Sundquist noted: “It was the persistence of the Civil War attachments that made the realignment of the North so largely a one-way movement—pro-Republican.”<sup>67</sup>

After 1896 the competitive party balance that had prevailed for years gave way to lopsided party strength according to region—Democrats in the South, Republicans in the North. Strong opposition parties disappeared in all regions of the country, vesting political power in the hands of those already part of the system.

As political scientist E. E. Schattschneider has observed:

The 1896 party cleavage resulted from the tremendous reaction of conservatives in both major parties to the Populist movement.... [S]outhern conservatives reacted so strongly that they were willing to revive the tensions and animosities of the Civil War and the Reconstruction in order to set up a one-party sectional southern political monopoly in which nearly all Negroes and many poor whites were disenfranchised. One of the most important consequences of the creation of the Solid South was that it severed permanently the connection between the western and the southern wings of the Populist movement.<sup>68</sup>

Conservative Republicans won the White House in all but two (1912 and 1916) of the nine elections from 1896 to 1928. During this period the country experienced economic prosperity that blunted the possible activism of workers and the previous activism of farmers. With good harvests and rising commodity prices, the agrarian revolt fizzled. The development of new ore extraction methods and discovery of new gold deposits made calls for silver to expand the currency supply superfluous. The Spanish-American War in 1898, which McKinley reluctantly entered and the burgeoning mass media publicized, created a patriotic fervor.

McKinley’s reelection in 1900 was even stronger than his 1896 election. He won 7.2 million popular votes (51.7 percent) to Bryan’s 6.4 million (45.5 percent), and 292 electoral votes to Bryan’s 155. McKinley swept to victory with all states except the South and the silver states of the West (Colorado, Montana, Idaho, and Nevada).

Rise of Theodore Roosevelt: 1904

Because Vice President Garret A. Hobart died in office in 1899, the Republicans selected New York’s progressive governor, Theodore Roosevelt, to share the ticket with McKinley in the 1900 election. Roosevelt, an independent-minded environmentalist and trust-buster, was promoted for vice president by New York GOP boss Thomas Platt, who wanted to rid the state of him and his progressive politics. Roosevelt was reluctant to take the job: “I am a comparatively young man yet and I like to work.... It would not entertain me to preside in the Senate.”<sup>69</sup> He accepted, however, when a convention movement and McKinley prevailed on him.

When McKinley was assassinated in 1901 and Roosevelt became president, presidential politics came under the influence of a variant of the progressive movement. As Gabriel Kolko and other historians have demonstrated, Roosevelt's administration was friendly to many of the GOP's traditional conservative allies. But Roosevelt's rhetoric and his legacy of regulation and conservation had strong progressive or reformist elements.<sup>70</sup>

Roosevelt's leadership of the progressives was an example of generational politics. (As each generation assumes control over political and social structures, it stamps those institutions with its distinctive style and ethos.) The new president grew up in an era in which economic expansion was straining the nation's fabric, causing political figures to seek idealistic but pragmatic solutions to a wide variety of problems. The previous generation had grown up in a simpler age when "politics were devoid of substance, built around appeals to tradition and old loyalties and aimed at patronage."<sup>71</sup>

Roosevelt steered his party toward conservation of natural resources, enforcement of antitrust laws, promotion of the concerns of labor, and railroad regulation. The government's suit to dissolve the Northern Securities Company under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act and Roosevelt's intervention in the anthracite coal miners' strike, both in 1902, established the tenor for an activist presidency. TR (the first president identified by his initials) also used his office as a "bully pulpit" to promote his progressive ideology.

Facing his first election at the top of the ticket, Roosevelt had no trouble winning the Republican nomination in 1904. The party's convention, arranged in advance at the White House, unanimously voted for Roosevelt and his platform of trust-busting, tariffs, labor relations, and activist foreign policy. Sen. Charles W. Fairbanks of Indiana was the GOP vice-presidential nominee.

To oppose the rambunctious Roosevelt, the Democrats selected a sober-visaged judge. Alton Parker, the chief justice of the New York State Court of Appeals, received the backing of the Democratic Party's conservative establishment when former president Cleveland turned down entreaties to make a fourth presidential run. Parker was opposed by William Randolph Hearst, a member of Congress and newspaper magnate. Bryan forced the party to adopt a liberal platform, as a balance to the conservative judge.

The Roosevelt victory was a landslide. He won 7.6 million votes (56.4 percent) to Parker's 5.1 million (37.6 percent) and carried all but the southern states. Roosevelt won 336 electoral votes to Parker's 140. Both houses of Congress were overwhelmingly Republican. President Roosevelt pledged not to seek another term because he had already served most of McKinley's second term. He occupied himself with his progressive agenda and groomed his secretary of war, William Howard Taft, as his successor.

Roosevelt Picks Taft: 1908

Roosevelt appeared to be genuinely dismayed by talk in 1907 of a possible third term, so he made public shows of his support for Taft. Because he also was able to line up state delegations for Taft, the nomination was never in doubt. Taft, through Roosevelt, was particularly strong among Republicans in the South. Attempts to restrict southern representation and pass a more liberal party platform were defeated.

Taft had impressive governmental experience. Before joining Roosevelt's cabinet, he had been a Cincinnati judge, U.S. solicitor general, federal circuit judge, head of the U.S. Commission on the Philippines, and the first civil governor of the Philippines.

Roosevelt's only problem in pushing Taft at the convention was avoiding a stampede in his own favor. Despite a highly disciplined convention, the galleries demonstrated wildly for Roosevelt. But Taft—a newcomer to electoral politics—easily won the nomination on the first ballot. He had 702 votes to the runner-up Philander C. Knox's 68. Rep. James S. Sherman of New York was selected as his running mate.

The Democrats nominated William Jennings Bryan for the third time. The electoral disaster that befell Judge Parker in 1904 was said to be evidence that the party needed an aggressive challenger to the Republicans rather than another conservative candidate. The Democrats were bereft of new talent, especially in competitive states in the East and Midwest, and turned to Bryan despite his disastrous campaign record and the warnings of former president Cleveland.

Taft campaigned on the Roosevelt record. Bryan called for government ownership of railroads and other liberal measures—such as a lower tariff, campaign finance reform, a graduated income tax, labor reforms, and greater enforcement of antitrust and other business regulations.

With Roosevelt and Taft promoting much of the progressive agenda, Bryan's message was no longer distinctive, and Taft won easily. He gathered 7.7 million popular votes (51.6 percent) to Bryan's 6.4 million (43.1 percent), and 321 electoral votes to Bryan's 162. The North, most of the West, and the border states went into the Republican column.

Wilson and the Divided Republicans: 1912 and 1916

Taft was not, by temperament, an ideal executive. His lifelong ambition had been to serve on the Supreme Court, and his disciplined legal mind and collegial nature eventually would enable him to become one of the high court's most able chief justices. (He was appointed to the Court by President Warren G. Harding in 1921.) But Taft foundered in the presidency. He carried out Roosevelt's program of business regulation and conservation, yet Roosevelt responded not with gratitude but with a series of nasty statements and plans for a campaign against Taft.

The tariff issue proved to be Taft's early trouble spot. Taft was committed to reducing tariffs, but he was less cautious than Roosevelt, who had fudged the divisive issue. As a result, Taft quickly became embroiled in a fight with Congress, which wanted to raise tariffs. The Senate remolded House legislation to push up various duties, and Taft publicly promoted the legislation after he managed to secure new corporate taxes and tariff reductions for raw materials. Overall, then, Taft proved ineffective and indecisive on the tariff issue and, as a consequence, began losing his party.

The Glavis-Ballinger affair further muddled the image of the administration. The scandal broke when the chief forester of the Interior Department, Gifford Pinchot, charged that Secretary Richard A. Ballinger had betrayed the cause of conservation and had even engaged in corrupt practices regarding minerals and water power. Pinchot also charged that Ballinger had wrongly fired another Interior official, Louis Glavis, for trying to expose the scandal. Pinchot took his complaints directly to Taft, but Taft sided with Ballinger and urged Pinchot to drop the matter. After an indignant Pinchot went public with the issue, Taft fired him, fueling suspicion of a cover-up at Interior. The incident was a major embarrassment to Taft because of the priority that conservation had received under Roosevelt and because of the inevitable complaints that Taft was betraying his mentor on the issue.<sup>72</sup>

Divisions within the Republican Party eventually created rival Taft and Roosevelt factions. Tariffs, Arizona's new state constitution (which included a provision for recall of the governor which Taft opposed), treaties, and antitrust issues split the former president and the sitting president. In many ways, the dispute was over personalities. Taft carried out Roosevelt's program but lacked his fervor and decisiveness. In a still conservative age, progressives felt they needed more aggressive leadership than the judicially tempered Taft would ever give them.

Roosevelt spent more than a year of Taft's term hunting in Africa, but he was an active speaker and campaigner when he returned to the United States. He gave a detailed accounting of his philosophy of government in a 1912 speech in Columbus, Ohio, calling for binding votes on public issues, recall of elected officials, and curbs on judicial power. When a dump-Taft movement decided in 1911 that Wisconsin senator Robert La Follette had no chance to defeat the president for the GOP nomination, party discontents turned to the energetic and still young (fifty-two years) Roosevelt.

Roosevelt made an all-out effort for the Republican nomination, entering twelve primaries and winning all but three. More specifically, Roosevelt won 278 delegates in states with primaries to Taft's 48 and La Follette's 36. In today's system, Roosevelt probably would have marched to a first-ballot nomination. (Today, more delegates are allocated by popular votes than by the party organizations, which then dominated the process.) Three crucial Republican states—Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Ohio—went for Roosevelt. He clearly, then, had great popular appeal and vote-getting ability—perhaps more than ever.

But Taft won the nomination. The president controlled the party machinery, and most of the convention's delegates were sent by the state party machines. Roosevelt challenged the credentials of Taft delegates at the Chicago convention, and the nomination's outcome turned on battles over almost one-fourth of the delegates. The fight went to the floor of the convention, but Taft's smooth operation defeated Roosevelt. Roosevelt appeared at the convention to buoy his forces and cry foul.

After the defeat, Roosevelt urged his supporters to continue their fight, which motivated some bolting progressive delegates to organize a convention in August to mount a third-party effort. The bolters formed the Progressive Party. When Roosevelt remarked to a reporter during the GOP convention, "I'm feeling like a bull moose," his vigorous campaign had a symbol.

With the Republicans divided, the Democrats saw their first opportunity to win the presidency since Cleveland in 1892. As the 1912 Democratic convention in Baltimore neared, several national candidates and favorite sons were vying for the nomination. The front-runner was House Speaker James Beauchamp “Champ” Clark of Missouri, a party regular who had party organization support and years of experience to recommend him.

Gov. Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey—who held a doctorate in political science and who had moved into politics after a distinguished career as professor and president at Princeton University—was another strong candidate. Wilson’s virtues were the opposite of Clark’s. He did not have an extensive political record for opponents to attack, and he was supported enthusiastically because of his dynamic presence and reformist rhetoric. Although the New Jersey machine had brought Wilson into politics, he quickly asserted his independence and became something of a crusader.

As a newcomer to national politics, Wilson both refreshed and alienated Democratic crowds in speeches before the convention. He came out strongly for the “radical” platform of referendum, initiative, and recall, prompting a newspaper to report: “The boldness, the directness, the incisiveness, the fearlessness, and the force of the ‘Virginian-Jerseyan’s’ words crashed at times through the throng like a series of thunderbolt jolts.”<sup>73</sup> But Wilson’s embrace of the progressive agenda and attacks on business alienated many southerners; even the delegates from Wilson’s home state of Virginia opposed him at the convention.

Other Democratic candidates were the conservative representative Oscar Underwood of Alabama, author of a historic tariff act; another conservative, Gov. Judson Harmon of Ohio; and four favorite-son governors. Clark appeared to have won the nomination when a Tammany bloc of delegates moved to support him after he won a tenth-ballot majority. The requirement for a two-thirds majority, however, gave other candidates time to maneuver. Wilson almost dropped out of the race, but Bryan’s late transfer of his support from Clark to Wilson created a bandwagon effect for Wilson. On the forty-sixth ballot, Wilson accumulated the necessary two-thirds of delegates for the nomination. Gov. Thomas Marshall of Indiana, one of the favorite-son candidates, was picked to be the vice-presidential nominee because Underwood, Wilson’s choice, would not accept it.

The Democratic platform was progressive. It called for tariff reduction, utility regulation, banking reforms, legislation to curb monopolies, a national income tax, direct election of senators, campaign finance reforms, and a national presidential primary. Roosevelt actually praised Wilson as “an able man” in the early fall and said he might not have started a third-party effort if he had known Wilson would be the Democrats’ candidate. But Wilson and Roosevelt eventually criticized each other’s approach to government, especially after Wilson expressed reservations about government activism.<sup>74</sup>

Wilson easily won the election, receiving 435 electoral votes to Roosevelt’s 88 and Taft’s 8. The Republican split obviously helped Wilson; if Roosevelt and Taft had combined their totals of 4.1 million votes (27.4 percent) and 3.5 million votes (23.2 percent), they would have topped Wilson’s 6.3 million (41.8 percent). Yet even though Wilson was a minority president, there was a clear Democratic trend since the Democrats had taken over the House and replaced several Republican governors in the 1910 midterm elections. It was the worst showing ever for an incumbent president—third place with only two states.

Whatever the strength of Wilson’s “mandate,” he acted as though he had won by a landslide. His first term was one of the most productive in U.S. history. With the Democrats in control of Congress, and with a shrewd political adviser in Col. Edward M. House, Wilson adopted a reform agenda that had been percolating at various levels of government for years. He broke precedent by delivering his first State of the Union message to Congress in person. At the center of the message was a call for reductions in tariff rates. After a bitter fight that raged for a month, Wilson went public with a demand that members of Congress reveal their property holdings. The revelations, in response to public pressure, showed close links between their holdings and the kinds of tariff protections on the books. Congress soon was shamed into passing tariff cuts of 15 percent. More than 100 items were placed on a free-trade list for the first time.

Wilson also addressed other areas successfully: taxes (institution of a graduated income tax in 1913, which replaced reliance on tariffs and various excise and user taxes); banking regulation (the Glass-Owen Act of 1913, which created the Federal Reserve system); antitrust legislation (the Clayton Anti-Trust Act of 1914, creation of the Federal Trade Commission in 1914); labor relations (Section 6 of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, which exempted unions from antitrust strictures); agriculture (the Smith-Lever Act of 1914, the Federal Farm Loan Act of 1916); conservation (creation of the National Park Service in 1916); and the judiciary (the appointment of Louis Brandeis to the Supreme Court).

Despite his strong leadership—highlighted by his stirring oratory—Wilson still faced the prospect in 1916 of a tough reelection. He had won the presidency in 1912 with only 41.8 percent of the popular vote, and the escalating war in Europe was beginning to disturb the American process of steady economic growth.

Public opinion on the Great War was volatile, largely because more than a third of the U.S. population was either foreign born or the offspring of foreign-born parents. Some 11 million Americans surveyed in the 1910 census were of direct German or Austrian descent, and another five million were from Ireland. Many other immigrants were Russian, Italian, Hungarian, British, and French. Wilson sought to diffuse feelings for the immigrants' native lands when he denounced "hyphenism"—the tendency of many citizens to identify themselves with appellations that linked their ethnic origins and American status—but politicians at lower levels tailored their campaigns to specific nationality voting blocs.<sup>75</sup>

Wilson and Vice President Marshall won renomination without any opposition. The most significant event of the Democratic convention was the passage of the platform, which indicated the party's main campaign theme. By calling for national universal suffrage, Wilson helped himself in the eleven western states where women already had won the vote. The platform praised "the splendid diplomatic victories of our great president, who has preserved the vital interests of our government and its citizens, and kept us out of war." The latter phrase would be repeated endlessly during the fall.<sup>76</sup>

The Republicans gave the presidential nomination to Supreme Court Justice Charles Evans Hughes. Hughes was silent in the months before the convention, but a number of party leaders lined up enough delegates for him to win a third-ballot nomination. Other potential candidates in 1916 included former president Roosevelt, former senator Elihu Root of New York, former vice president Fairbanks, and Senators John Weeks, Albert Cummins, and Lawrence Sherman. Fairbanks won the vice-presidential nomination.

Prosperity and reformism limited the campaign themes available to the Republicans. The GOP railed against Wilson's foreign policy as "shifty expedients" and "phrasemaking" that put the United States in danger of entering the war. Hughes turned out to be a bad campaigner, but he bridged the gap between conservative and progressive Republicans that had cost the party the 1912 election. Wilson was occupied with Congress throughout the summer of 1916, but he emerged to give a series of speeches in the fall. Democratic strategists, meanwhile, conceived and executed a masterful strategy to return Wilson to the White House. The Democrats concentrated all their resources on "swing states" and ignored states they thought Wilson was sure to lose. Illinois, for example, was ignored since it was a certain Republican state. Bryan, Wilson's secretary of state, toured the West.

Wilson won one of the closest elections in history. California, an uncertain state, ensured Wilson's victory when, because of the urban vote, it went the president's way late in the campaign. The margin of victory was 3,420 votes in that state. The president defeated Hughes by a margin of 9.1 million (49.2 percent) to 8.5 million popular votes (46.1 percent). The electoral college gave Wilson 277 votes and Hughes 254.

Even though Wilson's campaign in 1916 was based on his determination to stay out of the Great War, the United States entered the war in 1917. Wilson's conduct of the war won him the status of war hero, but his diplomatic efforts after the war failed. Wilson was the architect of the Treaty of Versailles, which created a League of Nations to prevent future wars. But Wilson was unable to induce the Senate to approve the treaty, and he left office in 1921 a broken and dispirited man.

"RETURN TO NORMALCY" AND THE ROARING TWENTIES

After the tumult of Woodrow Wilson's domestic reforms, World War I, and the divisive battle over the Versailles treaty, the time was ripe for a period of conservatism and Republican government. Deep resentment had developed toward Wilson and the Democratic Party, and the Democrats themselves were divided over many issues, including economic regulation, Prohibition, and race relations.

Blessed with good luck, substantial financial backing, and a strong trend toward split-ticket voting, beginning in the 1920s the Republicans were able to resume their dominance over national politics with three successful presidential campaigns: Warren G. Harding in 1920, Calvin Coolidge in 1924, and Herbert C. Hoover in 1928.

The 1920s are usually pictured as a time of steady, unexciting politics. The conservatives dominated the federal government, and occupying the White House were men who spoke of "normalcy" and a noninterventionist brand of politics in both domestic and foreign affairs. One of the symbols of the age was President Coolidge's program of tax cuts, which reduced the rates on the wealthy. The wartime Revenue Act of 1918 had driven tax rates to the highest point in U.S. history—77 percent in the highest brackets. In 1921, 1923, and 1926, Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon presented to Congress proposals to cut taxes, the most controversial being the reduction in the maximum surtax from 77 to 25 percent. Congress eventually cut the surtax to 40 percent in 1924 and 20 percent in 1926.<sup>77</sup>

But the sober men who filled the presidency in the twenties met challenges from progressives of both parties in Congress and in the state governments. On a wide range of issues—including relief of the poor, subsidies for the depressed farm sector, regulation of utilities, immigration, race relations, states' rights, tax cuts, and Prohibition—the conservative presidents encountered strong challenges. They frequently responded by vetoing legislation, but such an expedient would not prevent the pressures for a more activist government from developing.

Harding and "Normalcy": 1920

Harding, a product of the GOP machine of Ohio, emerged from a crowded and largely unknown pack to win the Republican nomination in 1920 at a convention dominated by economic interests such as oil, railroads, and steel. The early candidates were Gen. Leonard Wood, an old Roosevelt ally; Gov. Frank Lowden of Illinois, who married into the Pullman family and therefore had ample financing for a campaign; and Sen. Hiram Johnson of California, whose progressive and isolationist stances put him in good stead with voters in many states. A dozen favorite sons hoped that a deadlocked convention might bring the nomination their way. All of the candidates were on hand in Chicago to maneuver for the nomination.

They lost to Republican presidential candidate Warren G. Harding and his running mate, Gov. Calvin Coolidge of Massachusetts.*

While Wood, Johnson, and Lowden performed reasonably well in the primaries, Harding won only his home state of Ohio and did not arouse much popular enthusiasm. But under the direction of a shrewd campaign manager, Harry Daugherty, Harding gained the support of the party's bosses and won the nomination on the tenth ballot after a brief interview with them in the "smoke-filled room" that was synonymous with boss control. Governor Coolidge of Massachusetts, a favorite-son contender for president, became Harding's vice-presidential candidate.

The Democrats selected Gov. James Cox, also from Ohio, after lengthy platform battles and balloting for the nomination. Early ballots put former Treasury secretary William G. McAdoo and Attorney General Mitchell Palmer in the lead, but Cox gained steadily and had the nomination by the forty-fourth roll call. The convention then rapidly selected thirty-eight-year-old Franklin D. Roosevelt of New York, the assistant secretary of the navy, to be Cox's running mate.

The image of Wilson hung over the convention and would hang over the fall campaign. The Democratic platform praised Wilson's conduct of the war and his domestic reform program. But the results in the November election indicated deep unease over the Democratic administration.

Harding amassed 16.1 million popular votes (60.3 percent) to Cox's 9.1 million (34.2 percent), and 404 electoral votes to Cox's 127. Harding carried the North and West including Oklahoma and all of the southern and border states except Tennessee and Kentucky.

Harding's landslide victory was termed "election by disgust" by political analysts. The wartime sacrifices demanded under Wilson were widely perceived as the cause of Harding's victory rather than a desire for the ideology or policy proposals that Harding was offering. The New York Post editorialized: "We are in the backwash from the mighty spiritual and physical effort to which America girded herself when she won the war for the Allies.... The war has not been repudiated, though the administration that fought it has been overwhelmed. We are now in the chill that comes with the doctor's bills."<sup>78</sup>

The electorate's ability to shift allegiances from the Republicans to the Democrats and back again—from one period to the next, and from one level of government to the next—suggested a dissolution of partisan alignments. The addition of women to the electorate after passage of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920 and the increasing independence among all voters induced uncertainty. National exhaustion from the war and the lack of sharp ideological differences between the candidates produced apathy. The electorate's instability was suggested by the divisions within both parties on high-profile issues such as Prohibition, the League of Nations, agricultural policies, and other social and economic matters—among them, technical assistance and trust busting. The appearance of numerous “blocs” in both parties represented “little if anything more than a transitory alignment upon a particular vote or issue.”<sup>79</sup>

The shifts in control of congressional and state offices also indicated electoral instability. The Democrats had had comfortable control of Congress under Wilson, but in 1920 the Republicans gained a majority of 301 to 131 in the House and 59 to 37 in the Senate. Impressive liberal gains in congressional and state elections in the midterm election of 1922 appeared to be a slap at the Harding administration. The high turnover of votes also indicated unstable party affiliations: the 14.2 percentage point increase in the Republican vote between the 1916 and 1920 presidential elections was the largest since the Civil War, another time of turmoil.<sup>80</sup>

President Harding died on August 2, 1923, of a heart attack, just as revelations of kickbacks and favoritism in the administration began to surface and several members of the administration quit and two committed suicide. The investigation into the so-called Teapot Dome scandal—so named after the site of naval oil reserves that were transferred to private hands in exchange for bribes—would last five years. The Democrats hoped to make the scandal a major issue in the 1924 election, but Democratic complicity in the wrongdoing and the personal integrity of Harding's successor, Calvin Coolidge, defused the issue.

Coolidge Cleans Up: 1924

President Coolidge fired Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty and other members of Harding's clique and projected an image of puritan cleanliness. Coolidge—a taciturn man who had slowly climbed the political ladder in Massachusetts from city council member to city solicitor, mayor, state legislator, lieutenant governor, and governor before he became vice president—expounded a deeply individualistic Yankee philosophy that helped to separate him from the corrupt men in the Harding White House.

Except for appointing as attorney general Harlan Fiske Stone, former dean of the Columbia University School of Law, Coolidge allowed others to finish cleaning up the mess left behind by Harding. The new president was concerned about unnecessarily alienating himself from party leaders.

By the time Coolidge sought the presidency on his own in 1924, the economy had rebounded. One of the most conservative presidents ever, Coolidge's platform called for additional tax cuts but said nothing substantive about increasingly salient agriculture and labor issues. Coolidge also pushed an isolationist foreign policy plank. He won the nomination on the first ballot.

While the Republicans were able to “Keep Cool with Coolidge,” the Democrats spent sixteen days in a seemingly endless attempt to pick a nominee in New York's sweltering Madison Square Garden. A fight developed because the party was badly split between its northeastern urban bloc and its more conservative southern and western rural bloc. New York governor Alfred E. Smith and former Treasury secretary William McAdoo of California were the key combatants at the convention until the delegates were freed from the instructions of party bosses on the one-hundredth ballot.

Suspensions between the two regional blocs were intense. A platform plank denouncing the Ku Klux Klan created the most controversy. Northerners wanted an explicit repudiation of the society that preached hatred of blacks, Catholics, and Jews; in the end, southerners would settle only for a vaguely worded rebuke. (The Klan had infiltrated the party in many rural areas.) Another divisive issue was Prohibition, with northerners attacking the initiative and southerners supporting it. These sectional splits would cripple the Democrats in the 1924 and 1928 elections.

After the delegates were freed from instructions, a stampede developed for John W. Davis of West Virginia, a lawyer with Wall Street connections. The ticket was balanced with the vice-presidential selection of Charles W. Bryan of Nebraska, the younger brother of three-time presidential candidate William Jennings Bryan.

The Progressive candidacy of Robert La Follette complicated the calculations of voters, particularly those on the liberal end of the political spectrum. Because the Democrats had a nearly impenetrable hold on the South, La Follette was not given a reasonable chance of winning. But the conservatism of both Coolidge and Davis meant that La Follette was the only liberal in the race. Still, many liberals voted for Davis or even Coolidge because of the fear of an inconclusive election that would have to be resolved in the House of Representatives.

Coolidge won the election easily, with the Democrats polling their smallest percentage ever. Coolidge won 54.1 percent of the vote, Davis won 28.8 percent, and La Follette won 16.6 percent. Coolidge attracted 15.7 million popular votes and 382 electoral votes; Davis, 8.4 million and 136; and La Follette, 4.8 million and 13.

On August 2, 1927, when Coolidge announced his decision not to seek reelection by passing out a brief note to reporters and then refusing further comment, the Republicans began jockeying for the nomination for the 1928 election.

Hoover Succession: 1928

Secretary of Commerce Hoover was the obvious choice to replace Coolidge at the head of the GOP ticket. A native of Iowa who learned mining engineering at Stanford University, Hoover was immensely popular with most of the party. Hoover's administration of Belgian relief and food distribution programs during World War I had earned him the status of statesman and humanitarian.

Hoover began working for the nomination soon after Coolidge dropped out, spending $400,000 in the nominating phase of the election. He won the nomination on the first ballot over Governors Frank Lowden of Illinois and Charles Curtis of Kansas. Curtis was named Hoover's running mate.

Hoover was religious in his zeal for what he called "the American system" of free enterprise and individualism. He did not see any inconsistency in having the government vigorously support businesses with tax breaks, tariffs, public provision of infrastructures, and police protection, while at the same time denying relief to people in need. Hoover appeared to be less rigid than Coolidge, however. He proposed creation of a special farm board and said he would consider legislation to protect labor unions from abuses in the use of court injunctions.

Al Smith, the Tammany-schooled governor of New York, was the Democratic nominee. Smith had the support of all the party's northern states, and he won a first-ballot nomination. Sen. Joseph T. Robinson of Arkansas was the vice-presidential candidate.

Smith's candidacy polarized the electorate, particularly the South. He was the first Catholic to be nominated for president by a major party, and he endured religious slurs throughout the fall. Moreover, he favored repeal of Prohibition, still a divisive issue, and he was an urbanite, a problem for a nation that had nurtured a rural ideal since Thomas Jefferson. Because he also was a machine politician, he presented a problem for anyone outside (and many people inside) the nation's great cities. He also was a strong opponent of the Klan, which put him in trouble in the South. Finally, he was an unabashed liberal who proposed public works, farm relief programs, stronger protection of workers, and regulation of banking and industry.

During the fall campaign, Hoover acted like the incumbent and Smith barnstormed the country, trying in vain to pick up support in the South and West. The 1928 campaign was the first with extensive radio coverage, and

In 1932 World War I veterans, seeking early receipt of their service bonuses, staged a protest by setting up camps near the Capitol. President Herbert C. Hoover ordered federal troops, headed by Gen. Douglas MacArthur, to disperse the veterans with tear gas.

Hoover generally fared better than Smith on the airwaves. Hoover, the small-town boy who made good, represented fulfillment of the American Dream; Smith, the inner-city boy who made good, also embodied that ideal, but he had too many ethnic traits for much of the nation to realize it.

The November election produced another Republican landslide. Hoover carried forty states with 21.4 million popular votes (58.2 percent) and 444 electoral votes, while Smith carried only eight states with 15.0 million popular votes (40.8 percent) and 87 electoral votes. As disastrous as the election appeared to be for the Democrats, it put them in position to build a wide-ranging coalition in future years.

Smith carried only six southern states, but the defection of the others was temporary. More important to the Democrats' long-range fortunes was the movement of cities into the Democratic column, where they would stay for the rest of the century. Immigrants in cities were expanding their vision from local politics to the national stage for the first time. In all, Smith diverted 122 northern counties from the GOP to the Democratic Party. Catholics, whose turnout previously had been low, turned out in record numbers. Smith also seemed to pick up some of the Progressive farm vote that La Follette had tapped before; in Wisconsin, for example, the Democratic vote jumped from 68,000 to 450,000 from 1924 to 1928. Finally, Smith's candidacy put the Democrats solidly in the "wet" column, just as the national temper began to resent Prohibition.

President Hoover impressed political observers with his managerial skills and "coordinating mind." With passage of the Agricultural Marketing Act in June 1929, the administration appeared to address the most pressing economic problem for the business-minded president. He met some legislative setbacks, but, overall, the Great Engineer appeared to be in good political condition as the nation looked back over his record when Congress began its recess in summer 1929.

The national economic and social fiesta that had begun at the close of World War I came to an abrupt end on October 29, 1929. After climbing to dizzying new heights for months, the stock market crashed. First described by economists and politicians as a temporary interruption of the good times, the crash quickly led to a wave of business and bank failures, mortgage foreclosures, wage cuts, layoffs, and a crisis of political leadership. By the end of Hoover's term in 1933, more than 12 million workers had lost their jobs; the unemployment rate was approximately 25 percent. An October 1931 advertisement for 6,000 jobs in the Soviet Union brought 100,000 American applications.<sup>81</sup>

President Hoover, who had celebrated his inauguration with a prediction that poverty and hunger were near an end, did not know how to cope with the crisis. In a special session that Hoover called, Congress created the Federal Farm Board to coordinate marketing of agricultural products, but Hoover steadfastly opposed further moves, especially subsidies. In 1930 Hoover signed the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act to protect manufacturers, but, true to the predictions of economists and bankers, the tariff only aggravated economic conditions by hurting foreign trade.

Hoover later approved agricultural relief and public works programs and established the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The president refused to approve direct relief to the unemployed and businesses, but he did approve some loans and aid to specific sectors of the economy.

Despite his earnest and tireless efforts, Hoover became a figure of widespread enmity. The low point of his distinguished career came when World War I veterans petitioned for early receipt of their service bonuses, which, by contract, were not to be paid until 1945. They set up camp in Washington, singing old war songs and carrying placards that bore their pleas. The "Bonus Army" numbered 20,000 at its height. When Hoover feared a protracted protest, he ordered federal troops to take over buildings where some veterans were camping. In two skirmishes, two veterans were killed. The president then sent in Gen. Douglas MacArthur with tanks, infantry, and cavalry soldiers. (MacArthur's junior officers included Dwight D. Eisenhower and George Patton.) After successfully removing the veterans, the military forces overran nearby veterans' camps in a rain of fire and tear gas. Thousands of veterans and their families fled the burning district.

The administration's tough stance against a defeated, ragtag band of former war heroes shocked and embittered the nation. The barricaded White House and administration statements about "insurrectionists" symbolized a dangerous gulf between the government and the people.

Partly because of the economic crisis he did not create, but also because of his dour and unimaginative demeanor, Hoover probably never had a chance to win reelection. The 1930 midterm elections indicated a loss of confidence in the administration. The House went Democratic, 219 to 214, and the Senate came within a seat of going Democratic as well.

Those election results did not convey the bitterness and despair that the Depression would aggravate before the next presidential campaign. Hoover was mercilessly ridiculed in newspapers and in Democratic speeches. The Democratic Party coordinated a comprehensive anti-Hoover campaign that made the president politically impotent.

"The New Deal" Election: 1932

Franklin D. Roosevelt, fifth cousin to Theodore Roosevelt, was the perfect candidate to oppose Hoover. The New York governor had been an activist in state politics, first opposing the state's Tammany machine and then pioneering many relief and reconstruction programs that Hoover refused to expand to the national scale. Roosevelt had been the party's vice-presidential candidate twelve years earlier, and he had served in the federal government as assistant secretary of the navy.

Perhaps more important than any of his political accomplishments were FDR's image of strength and optimism and his deft handling of hot issues and disparate members of the potential Democratic coalition. Although he was a polio victim, Roosevelt often smiled—a devastating contrast to Hoover. (Gutzon Borglum, the sculptor, wrote: "If you put a rose in Hoover's hand, it would wilt."<sup>82</sup>) Roosevelt was able to campaign for the presidency without putting forth a comprehensive program: the simple promise of a change in leadership was enough.

Some observers found the man from Hyde Park wanting. Journalist Walter Lippmann, for example, complained that Roosevelt was "a pleasant man who, without any important qualifications for the office, would like very much to be president."<sup>83</sup> But those detractors and a large field of Democratic candidates were not able to keep Roosevelt from his "rendezvous with destiny."<sup>84</sup>

The Democratic field included the 1928 Democratic standard-bearer, Smith; Speaker of the House John Nance Garner; Gov. Albert Ritchie of Maryland; Gov. George White of Ohio; Gov. Harry Byrd of Virginia; and former senator James Reed of Missouri. Most considered Smith more of a "stalking horse" for the anti-FDR forces than a serious candidate on his own. Garner had impressive backing from the newspaper magnate William Randolph Hearst and former Democratic candidate William McAdoo.

The many favorite sons in the race threatened to deadlock the convention and deny the nomination to the front-runner, as they had done so often in the past. Roosevelt had difficulty with his region of the country because of his opposition to the Tammany machine in New York. Acquiring the required two-thirds vote of delegates for the nomination was difficult for Roosevelt or any other candidate, but FDR eventually won on the fourth ballot when he promised the vice-presidential slot to Garner.

In U.S. political history, Franklin Roosevelt was the first candidate to appear before the convention that nominated him. In an acceptance speech to the conventioners who had staged wild rallies in his support, Roosevelt made passing reference to the "new deal" that his administration would offer Americans. That phrase, picked up in a newspaper cartoon the next day, came to symbolize the renewal for which Americans yearned as riots and radicalism seemed to threaten the nation's spirit and the legitimacy of its institutions.

Roosevelt conducted an active fall campaign, traveling 23,000 miles in forty-one states to quell suspicions that his physical handicaps would deter him from performing his job. Besides barnstorming the nation, Roosevelt took to the radio airwaves—he was the first sophisticated electronic media candidate—where he conveyed a sense of warmth and confidence. He also showed an intellectual bent and an open mind when he called on academics and professionals—the famed "brain trust"—for their expert advice on the issues.

Roosevelt won 22.8 million votes (57.4 percent) to Hoover's 15.8 million (39.6 percent). Forty-two of the forty-eight states and 472 of the 531 electoral votes went for Roosevelt. The election was a landslide and a realignment of the major forces in U.S. politics.

NEW DEAL COALITION

The profound effect of Franklin D. Roosevelt's victory on U.S. politics can hardly be overstated. The New Deal coalition that Roosevelt assembled shaped the political discourse and electoral competition of the United States until the late 1960s. In many respects, that coalition is a central element of politics today.

The new Democratic coalition brought together a disparate group of interests: southerners, African Americans, immigrants, farmers, capital-intensive producers, international businessmen, financiers, urbanites, trade unions, intellectuals, Catholics, and Jews. Rexford Tugwell called it "the most miscellaneous coalition in history."<sup>85</sup> These blocs were not always in perfect harmony—for example, the Democrats juggled the demands of blacks and white southerners with great difficulty—but they were solid building blocks for national political dominance.

The dominance was impressive. Between 1932 and 1964, the Democrats won seven of nine presidential elections. The only successful Republican, Dwight D. Eisenhower, could just as easily have run as a Democrat. Party leaders in fact asked him to run as a Democrat in 1948 and 1952, and his name was entered in some Democratic primaries in 1952.

The strength of Roosevelt's rule was attributable partly to the president's personality. He could be soothing. When he gave his first "fireside chat" about the banking crisis, the nation responded with cooperation; the raids and violence at banks ended in a matter of weeks. More important than his soothing nature was his ability to experiment and shift gears. Professor James David Barber described Roosevelt's many public postures:

Founder of the New Deal, modern American democracy's closest approximation to a common political philosophy, Roosevelt came on the scene as the least philosophical of men—"a chameleon in plaid," Hoover called him. Firm fighter of yet another Great War, Roosevelt appeared to H.L. Mencken in 1932 as "far too feeble and wishy-washy a fellow to make a really effective fight." Architect of world organization, he introduced himself as totally concerned with America's domestic drama. His name is inseparable from his generation's great social revolution; in 1932, nearly all the heavy thinkers scoffed at him as just another placebo politician—a "pill to cure an earthquake," said Professor [Harold] Laski.<sup>86</sup>

More important than personality was what Roosevelt had to offer the many groups in his coalition. As historian

Richard Hofstadter has noted, the New Deal was "a series of improvisations, many adopted very suddenly, many contradictory."<sup>87</sup> The Roosevelt credo was: "Save the people and the nation, and if we have to change our minds twice a day to accomplish that end, we should do it."<sup>88</sup>

Until the vast expenditures of World War II, there was not enough pump-priming to end the Depression, but Roosevelt's initiatives touched almost everyone affected by the slump.<sup>89</sup> For the jobless, there were unemployment insurance and public works programs such as the Works Progress Administration and the Civilian Conservation Corps. For the poor, there were categorical aid programs. For westerners, there were conservation measures. For the banks, there was the famous holiday that stopped runs on holdings, and there were currency and securities reforms. For farmers, there were incentives and price supports and cooperatives. For the aged, there was Social Security. For southerners, there was the Tennessee Valley Authority. For southern whites, there was a hands-off policy on race matters. For blacks, there were sympathy and jobs programs. For those living in rural areas, there was electrification. For families, there were home loans. For the weary worker eager for a few rounds at the local tavern, there was the repeal of Prohibition. For laborers, there was acknowledgment of the right to negotiate for their share of the national wealth. For business, there were the Federal Emergency Relief Act and the National Industrial Recovery Act, as well as diplomatic negotiation to reduce trade barriers.

The remarkably divergent interests in the coalition were underscored by the politics of race. Blacks moved en masse to the Democratic Party from their traditional position in the "Party of Lincoln," partly because of Hoover's failure but also because of the inclusive rhetoric of the New Deal. Yet Roosevelt was too concerned about his bloc of southern support to accept even antilynching legislation.

Scholars have argued that the New Deal coalition did not indicate a wholesale shift in existing political loyalties, but rather that new groups such as urbanites and blacks had joined an already stable alliance to tip the competitive balance of U.S. parties. The political discourse in the United States changed not because all or even most groups changed their behavior but because new groups and issues became involved.<sup>90</sup>

The core of Roosevelt's winning coalition was easy to describe: "Southern white Protestants, Catholics, and non-Southern white Protestants of the lowest socioeconomic stratum together accounted for roughly three-fourths of all Americans of voting age in 1940 who thought of themselves as Democrats. By way of contrast, these three groups provided only about 40 percent of the smaller cadre of Republican identifiers."<sup>91</sup> Within the Democratic coalition, there were both new and old elements.

Although the Democratic Party encompassed new constituencies and addressed new issues, it retained many of its traditional supporters. The segregated “Jim Crow” South had consistently been in the Democratic column; in 1896, for example, the South’s percentage support for Democrat William Jennings Bryan exceeded that of the rest of the nation by 15.3 points. Even in 1928, when Al Smith’s Catholicism reduced support for the Democrats to under 50 percent for the first time, the Deep South supported the Democrats more than the border South did.<sup>92</sup> To the South, the Democrats were reliably the party of white supremacy and agricultural interests, while Republicans favored the industrial interests of the North.

Outside the South, the Democratic Party was the party of immigrants and Catholics. Since Andrew Jackson’s day, the overwhelmingly Democratic voting patterns of Catholics had contrasted with the split vote of Protestants in the United States. The Catholic-Protestant divisions represented “not so much religious as more general ethnocultural traditions.”<sup>93</sup> The Democratic hold on the Catholic vote was reinforced by the heavy immigration into northern cities in the last half of the nineteenth century. While the anti-Catholic Ku Klux Klan received Democratic backing in the South, it received Republican backing in the North, pushing northern Catholics decisively into the Democratic Party.

A steady base in the Democratic Party consisted of laborers and the poor. From the first party machines in the early nineteenth century to Bryan’s campaign on behalf of the depressed farm belt in 1896 to Woodrow Wilson’s acceptance of labor bargaining in 1914, the Democrats had shown sympathy for the less-privileged classes. Such sympathies often were constricted by prejudice or conservatism, but the Democrats offered more hope of representation than the business-oriented Republicans. Roosevelt solidified the support of the poor and laboring classes.<sup>94</sup> Sundquist has written: “The party system undoubtedly reflected some degree of class before the realignment, but there can be little doubt that it was accentuated by the event. It was in the New Deal era that tight bonds were formed between organized labor and the Democratic Party, that ties equally close if less formal and overt were formed between business and the GOP, and that politics for the first time since 1896 sharply accented class issues.”<sup>95</sup> Roosevelt consistently received the support of more than two-thirds of the voters of low socioeconomic status.<sup>96</sup>

New converts to the Democratic Party included blacks and Jews. The inclusion of blacks into the New Deal coalition underscored a “multiplier effect” at work within thriving interest group politics. The Republicans received the black vote in the seventeen elections from Reconstruction to 1932. That year, Roosevelt received 35 percent of the black vote, but his black support was as low as 23 percent in Chicago and 29 percent in Cincinnati.<sup>97</sup> Even though Roosevelt did little to promote black interests in the South, where most blacks lived but could not vote, the black vote for him increased to 70 percent in 1936 and 1940. Migration of blacks to the North and the spillover effects of Roosevelt’s many domestic programs brought blacks to the Democratic Party.

Jews, who had voted Republican since their numbers swelled during immigration around the turn of the century, turned to the Democrats as they became the more liberal party. Roosevelt got 85 percent of the Jewish vote in 1936 and 84 percent in 1940. New Deal assistance programs and Roosevelt’s efforts to fight Nazism appealed to Jews, but perhaps more important was “the historic pattern of discrimination which forced or disposed Jews to oppose conservative parties.”<sup>98</sup> The class division that split other social groups was absent in the Jewish population.

In many ways, the whole of the New Deal was greater than the sum of its parts. Political scientist Samuel Beer has argued that two long-competing visions of U.S. politics—the national idea and the democratic idea—at last came together during Roosevelt’s administration. With the New Deal, the Democratic Party was able to combine its traditional concern for local, individualistic interests with a national vision. By bringing “locked-out” groups into the system, the Democrats enhanced both nation building and individual freedoms. The parts, put together, created a stronger whole. Beer quotes the French sociologist Emile Durkheim: “The image of the one who completes us becomes inseparable from ours.... It thus becomes an integral and permanent part of our conscience...”<sup>99</sup>

The political genius of “interest-group liberalism”<sup>100</sup> was not just that it offered something to everyone, but that it created a new age of consumerism in which everyone’s interest was in economic growth rather than structural change. The general good was defined as growth. The potentially divisive competition over restricted and unequally distributed resources was avoided with a general acceptance of growth as the common goal. When there was growth, everyone could get a little more. That public philosophy became a permanent part of American political discourse.

Roosevelt’s First Reelection: 1936

Roosevelt’s coalition and leadership were so strong that he became the only president to win more than two elections. He won four elections and served a little more than twelve years in the White House before dying in office at the start of his fourth term.

Roosevelt’s four electoral triumphs caused Republicans to fume about his “imperial” presidency; all they could do in response to FDR was to promote a constitutional amendment to limit presidents to two terms. But more important than this perception was the way Roosevelt shaped the U.S. political agenda. For many people of the time, it was difficult to imagine the United States under any other leader.

President Franklin D. Roosevelt's Republican opponents during his three successful reelection campaigns were, from left: Gov. Alfred M. Landon of Kansas in 1936; former Democrat and business executive Wendell L. Willkie in 1940; and Gov. Thomas E. Dewey of New York in 1944. Dewey ran again and lost against President Truman in 1948.

It is possible that Roosevelt could have forged an even stronger liberal coalition than he did. But Roosevelt was a pragmatist above all else and alternately angered and wooed such groups as business, labor, farmers, and the military. For example, Roosevelt kept his distance from Upton Sinclair's populist campaign for governor of California in 1934. Because he threatened business interests, Sinclair was the target of a sustained personal attack by business and other conservative forces in the state in what one authority has called the first media campaign in American history. Sinclair's losing effort, the historian Greg Mitchell argued, undermined the power of reformers nationally.<sup>101</sup>

Roosevelt's three successful reelection drives evoked a changing response from Republicans. Roosevelt's first reelection opponent, in 1936, was Gov. Alfred M. Landon of Kansas, who strongly criticized every aspect of the New Deal. After 1936, Republican candidates did not criticize federal intervention in economic and social affairs but rather the speed and the skill of Democratic intervention. In the third election the Republicans argued that Roosevelt was a "warmonger" because he tilted toward Great Britain in World War II. The GOP also argued in the third and fourth elections that Roosevelt threatened to become a "dictator" by exceeding the traditional two-term limit.

Landon was the early favorite for the Republican nomination in 1936. Sen. Charles McNary of Oregon, Sen. Arthur Vandenberg of Michigan, and Chicago Daily News publisher Frank Knox provided weak opposition. A Republican bolter for Theodore Roosevelt's "Bull Moose" candidacy in 1912, Landon was consistently to the left of the GOP. Historian James MacGregor Burns observed: "Landon had just the qualities of common sense, homely competence, cautious liberalism and rocklike 'soundness' that the Republicans hoped would appeal to a people tiring, it was hoped, of the antics and heroics in the White House."<sup>102</sup>

In 1936 the Republicans could not have stated their opposition to the popular New Deal in any stronger terms. The platform read: "America is in peril. The welfare of American men and women and the future of our youth are at stake. We dedicate ourselves to the preservation of their political liberty, their individual opportunity, and their character as free citizens, which today for the first time are threatened by government itself."<sup>103</sup>

The Republicans called for ending a wide range of government regulations, returning relief to state and local governments, replacing Social Security, balancing the budget, and changing tariff and currency policies. Landon's only innovation was to call for a constitutional amendment allowing the states to regulate the labor of women and children; the Supreme Court had struck down a New York minimum wage law in 1935. After Landon won the nomination on the first ballot, he selected Knox as his running mate.

The only time the two presidential candidates met was at a meeting Roosevelt called with state governors in Des Moines to discuss farm relief and a recent drought. FDR hoped to put Landon on the spot about farm relief. But Landon turned out to be the aggressor, demanding that FDR address the dire situation of 100,000 starving farmers in Oklahoma. FDR responded that he had some federal agencies working on programs "just as fast as the Lord will let them." When Landon said that such an answer was small consolation, Roosevelt retorted: "What more can you say to the hungry farmer, governor? The machinery will be put in gear just as fast as the Lord will let you?"<sup>104</sup>

Landon's campaign possessed a lavish war chest of $9 million, benefited from the defections of Democratic stalwarts such as John Davis and Al Smith (the party's presidential nominees in 1924 and 1928) and well-coordinated campaign work by business lobbies, and engaged in smear campaigns that portrayed Social Security as a simple "pay reduction" measure and Roosevelt as physically and mentally ill. Landon also argued that New Deal spending was just another form of spoils politics, a charge Roosevelt addressed by folding postmasters into the civil service system.

The only important innovation at the Democratic convention was the repeal of the party's requirement that a candidate receive two-thirds of the delegates to win the nomination. After some arm twisting, southern delegates backed the change, but the governor of Texas wondered aloud if the change was designed for a third Roosevelt run in 1940. Roosevelt was renominated without opposition. He asked Vice President John Nance Garner to run with him a second time.

In response to Landon's GOP nomination and agitation by leaders of the left and right—including Huey Long of Louisiana, Father Charles E. Coughlin of Detroit, Dr. Francis Townsend of California (who espoused a federal pension plan for senior citizens), and the Socialist Norman Thomas of New York—President Roosevelt in his acceptance speech launched a rhetorical war against "economic royalists" who opposed his programs. He dropped the idea of a "unity" campaign in favor of a partisan ideological attack intended to gain a mandate for a variety of stalled programs rather than a personal vote of confidence.<sup>105</sup>

At first, Roosevelt had planned a low-key campaign of "conciliation," but when Landon got the GOP nomination he decided to wage the more aggressive campaign. After all, Landon had run an impressive nominating campaign and was thought to appeal to American pinings for governmental stability. In the early stages of the fall campaign, Roosevelt pretended not to be a partisan politician. He crisscrossed the country making "official" inspections of drought states and public works programs and delivering speeches on electrical power, conservation, and social welfare programs, among other topics. Roosevelt assigned Postmaster General James Farley the task of addressing party rifts and Republican charges of spoils.

At the end of September, Roosevelt assumed the role of partisan leader. The president answered Republican charges point by point, then lashed out at the Republicans in biting, sarcastic terms. As the campaign progressed and Roosevelt sensed a strong response from the large crowds to his attacks, the attacks became stronger. At the close of the campaign, he said:

We have not come this far without a struggle and I assure you that we cannot go further without a struggle. For twelve years, our nation was afflicted with a hear-nothing, see-nothing, do-nothing government. The nation looked to the government but the government looked away. Nine mocking years with the golden calf and three long years of the scourge! Nine crazy years at the ticker and three long years at the breadlines! Nine mad years of mirage and three long years of despair! And, my friends, powerful influences strive today to restore that kind of government with its doctrine that that government is best which is most indifferent to mankind.... Never before in all of our history have these forces been so united against one candidate as they stand today. They are unanimous in their hate for me—and I welcome their hatred.<sup>106</sup>

Especially to sophisticated campaign technicians of the modern age, a poll that predicted a big Landon victory provides some amusement. The Literary Digest, which had predicted past elections with accuracy, conducted a postcard poll of its readers that pointed toward a Landon landslide. But the heavy middle- and upper-class bias of the magazine's readership meant that the views of the voters on the lower rungs of the economic ladder were left out of the sample. To this day, the poll is cited as the prime example of bad survey group selection.

The failure of the Literary Digest's survey pointed to the most salient aspect of the election results: the heavy class divisions among the voters. Polls showed that class divisions widened starting around the midpoint of Roosevelt's first term. The broad support Roosevelt had enjoyed because of a common economic disaster had hardened along class lines by the time of the 1936 election.

In the 1936 election, Roosevelt won 27.7 million popular votes (60.8 percent) to Landon's 16.7 million (36.5 percent). Roosevelt carried all but two of the forty-eight states, and he took 523 of the 531 electoral votes. In addition, the Senate's Democratic majority increased to 75 of 96 seats, and the House majority increased to 333 of 435 seats. Roosevelt even ran ahead of candidates—such as gubernatorial candidate Herbert Lehman of New York—who had been recruited to boost his vote totals in various states. In fact, the Democratic victory was almost too overwhelming, Roosevelt suggested, because it would encourage Democrats to fight among themselves rather than with Republicans.

Roosevelt's Third Term: 1940

Soon after his 1936 landslide, Roosevelt tempted fate with a proposal that would have increased the size of the Supreme Court from nine to fifteen members in order to "pack" the Court with justices closer to the president's political philosophy. In 1935 and 1936 the high court had struck down important New Deal initiatives such as the Agriculture Adjustment Act, the National Recovery Administration, and the tax on food processing.

Roosevelt shrouded his proposal in statements of concern about the capacities of some of the Court's older justices. In a fireside speech, Roosevelt said the Court's failure to keep pace with the other "horses" in the "three-horse team" of the federal government constituted a "quiet crisis."<sup>107</sup> The elderly chief justice, Charles Evans Hughes, belied that charge with the energy he brought to the tribunal. But Roosevelt refused to compromise on the bill, and it became an executive-legislative dispute. The proposal was widely seen as a brazen power play, and Congress defeated it by summer 1937.

Nevertheless, President Roosevelt eventually got the judicial approval he wanted for his initiatives—what was called "the switch in time that saved nine." The Court appeared to shift its philosophy during the court-packing affair, and, before long, enough justices had retired so that Roosevelt could put his stamp on the Court.

Other problems awaited Roosevelt in the second term. Splits in the labor movement gave rise to violence during organizing drives, and the president responded haltingly. After his rift with business over the full range of New Deal policies, Roosevelt appeared to be drifting. Conservatives in Congress were more assertive than ever in opposing the "socialist" measures of the Roosevelt years. The only major New Deal legislation in the second term was the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, which abolished child labor and set a minimum wage and an official rate of time-and-a-half for overtime.

As Roosevelt looked toward a third term in 1940, the widening war in Europe posed a difficult problem. Nazi Germany had invaded the Rhineland, Poland, France, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and Luxembourg and had made alliances with Italy and the Soviet Union. Japan had invaded China. Adolph Hitler launched the Battle of Britain in summer 1940; all-night air raids of London came soon afterward.

British prime minister Winston Churchill desperately petitioned Roosevelt to provide fifty naval destroyers. Britain's need for the destroyers was so great that Roosevelt balked at asking Congress for help. He reasoned that congressional action probably would take three months, and isolationists might even block action, dealing a crippling blow to Britain. After lengthy debate within the administration, Roosevelt agreed to send Churchill the destroyers as part of a "lend-lease" agreement. The United States received British bases in the Caribbean as part of the deal.

A favorite parlor game as the 1940 election approached was guessing whom Roosevelt might tap as his successor. Roosevelt publicly maintained that he did not want another term, but he refused to issue a definitive statement begging off the race. Despite the historic precedent against third terms, Roosevelt wanted to remain president. To avoid the appearance of overzealousness, however, Roosevelt wanted the Democrats to draft him in 1940.

While the nation waited for Roosevelt to act, Vice President Garner announced his candidacy for his boss's job. Postmaster General Farley and Secretary of State Cordell Hull also wanted to be president, and Roosevelt gave both vague assurances of support. Roosevelt, whose relations with Garner had soured since the court-packing episode (which Garner opposed), simply watched the vice president struggle to gain a respectable public profile. The Farley and Hull prospects withered without the help of the old master.

From a distance, Roosevelt watched state Democratic delegations declare their support. Polls showed Roosevelt's fortunes rising with the deepening European crisis. Just before the GOP convention, Roosevelt appointed Republicans Henry Stimson and Frank Knox to his cabinet. But Roosevelt did not reveal his plans for 1940, even to his closest aides. The president did not forbid aides such as Harry Hopkins to work on a draft, but he did not get involved because he wanted the Democrats to call on him and not the other way around.

At the Chicago convention, Sen. Alben Barkley told the delegates: "The president has never had, and has not today, any desire or purpose to continue in the office of president.... He wishes in all earnestness and sincerity to make it clear that all the delegates of this convention are free to vote for any candidate."<sup>108</sup> The statement was followed by an hour-long demonstration and Roosevelt's first-ballot nomination.

The convention mood turned sour, however, when Roosevelt announced that he wanted the liberal secretary of agriculture, Henry Wallace, as his running mate. The announcement disgruntled delegates who already had lined up behind other candidates. But Wallace eventually beat Alabama representative William Bankhead, his strongest opponent for the nomination.

The Republicans mounted their strongest challenge to Roosevelt in 1940, largely based on the charge that Roosevelt was moving the United States toward involvement in the world war. Several moves toward military preparedness had failed at the hands of isolationists in Congress. When Roosevelt asked for increases in defense spending after Gen. Francisco Franco's victory in Spain and Germany's annexing of Austria in 1938, critics asserted that the president was attempting to cover up domestic failures with foreign adventures. Roosevelt pressed on, however, and Congress passed the Selective Service Act and increases in military spending in 1940.

The Republican field in 1940 included several fresh faces: Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio, son of the former president; District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey of New York City; and Sen. Charles L. McNary of Oregon and Sen. Arthur H. Vandenberg of Michigan who had been considered long shots for the Republican nomination in 1936. The freshest face of all was Wendell L. Willkie, a utility executive who had never run for political office. A large, affable man, former Democrat Willkie had barnstormed the country for seven years speaking in opposition to the New Deal.<sup>109</sup> Hundreds of “Willkie clubs” sprang up in summer 1940, and a number of publications, including Henry Luce’s Time magazine, chronicled Willkie’s career and encouraged the Willkie groundswell. Despite concern about Willkie’s lack of political experience, which led to a “stop Willkie” movement, the Indianan won a sixth-ballot nomination by acclamation. Senator McNary, the Republicans’ Senate floor leader, reluctantly accepted the vice-presidential nomination.

Traveling 30,000 miles in thirty-four states, Willkie gave some 540 speeches. By the time his campaign ended, his already husky voice had turned hoarse. The Republicans spent lavishly and organized grassroots clubs for Willkie across the country. “No Third Term” campaign buttons were popular with Willkie supporters. Charges against Roosevelt of managerial incompetence, “warmongering,” and imperial ambitions punctuated the Willkie effort. A dramatic moment came when labor leader John L. Lewis called on workers to back Willkie.

After a period of strictly “presidential” behavior, Roosevelt took to the campaign trail with partisan vigor. He answered Willkie’s warmongering charges with a promise never to involve the United States in “foreign wars” (which left Roosevelt free to respond to a direct attack).

The alienation of some Democratic and independent voters was symbolized by Vice President Garner, who did not even vote. Roosevelt won, but by the slimmest popular vote margin of any race since 1912. He received 27.3 million popular votes (54.7 percent) to Willkie’s 22.3 million (44.8 percent). The electoral vote tally was 449–82.

The War and Its Legacy: 1944

Roosevelt’s third term and fourth election were dominated by World War II. Japan attacked U.S. bases at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on December 7, 1941. The president, speaking before Congress, declared the date of the surprise attack “a day that will live in infamy.” Congress shook off its isolationist inclinations and declared war. A few days after Pearl Harbor, Germany and Italy declared war on the United States, confronting the nation with a two-front war.

The war did for the economy what the New Deal, by itself, could not: it brought economic prosperity. The number of unemployed workers fell from eight million to one million between 1940 and 1944. The boom brought seven million more people, half of them women, into the job market. Inflation, worker shortages, and occasional shortages in raw materials posed problems for wartime agencies. The number of U.S. families paying taxes quadrupled, and by 1945 tax revenues were twenty times their 1940 level. Budget deficits reached new heights.<sup>110</sup>

The fighting in Europe and Asia was grim for the first two years of the president’s new term. Isolationist sentiment again built up in Congress, with the Midwest proving the region most resistant to Roosevelt’s foreign policy. Criticism of how the Roosevelt administration was managing U.S. participation in the wars on both fronts was rampant. The administration won key congressional votes on the war but faced stubborn resistance on domestic measures. In the 1942 midterm elections, the Republicans gained ten seats in the Senate and forty-seven seats in the House—a major repudiation of Roosevelt.

After several setbacks, the Allied forces won impressive victories. Roosevelt and Churchill worked closely together. Allied forces, led by General Eisenhower, routed the Axis powers in North Africa in 1942. The Soviet Union beat back a Nazi assault on Stalingrad in the winter of 1942–1943. The Allies invaded and occupied Italy in 1943 before crossing the English Channel to confront the Nazis in France in 1944. In September 1944 British and American troops entered Germany. In the Pacific war, American offensives protected Australia in 1942 and secured the Philippines in 1944.

Despite the bitter opposition that prevailed through much of his third term, Roosevelt had no trouble winning a fourth term in 1944. The Allies found greater success on the battlefield and on the sea, and the nation did not appear willing to risk untested leadership to prosecute the war. The Republicans turned to the governor of New York, Thomas Dewey. Willkie wanted another shot at the White House, and his best-selling book One World put him in the public eye, but old-line conservatives blamed him for the 1940 election defeat. Governors John Bricker of Ohio and Harold Stassen of Minnesota and Gen. Douglas MacArthur were the other hopefuls.

Dewey’s primary victories over Willkie in the Wisconsin, Nebraska, and Oregon primaries ended Willkie’s public career. Dewey was too far in front to stop. At the convention he won a nearly unanimous first-ballot nomination after Bricker and Stassen dropped out. After Gov. Earl Warren of California refused the vice-presidential nomination, Bricker accepted it.

The party platform extolled the virtues of free enterprise but did not criticize the concept of the New Deal and even made bids for the votes of blacks and women. In his acceptance speech Dewey criticized “stubborn men grown old and tired and quarrelsome in office.”<sup>111</sup>

The 1944 election marked the early resistance of the South to the modern Democratic Party. Roosevelt was a shoo-in for the nomination, but southerners wanted a replacement for Wallace as vice president, restoration of the two-thirds nominating rule, and a platform declaration of white supremacy. Dissatisfied southerners threatened to bolt the party in November, but when the party adopted only a vague civil rights plank in its platform, southern discontent dissipated. The rest of the platform called for an internationalist thrust in foreign policy and further New Deal-style reforms domestically.

Roosevelt expressed support for Wallace but said he would allow the convention to pick his running mate. Wallace gave a stirring convention speech but disturbed conservatives with his stand against the poll tax and for equal opportunity for all “regardless of race or sex.” Sen. Harry S. Truman of Missouri, who had won fame as a critic of defense spending, beat Wallace for the vice-presidential nomination on the second ballot.

The Democratic campaign was dominated by references to the need for wartime unity and reminders of the Republican rule under Hoover. One leaflet bore the words “Lest We Forget” and a photograph of an unemployed man selling apples in front of a “Hoover Club”; an inset photograph showed Dewey conferring with former president Hoover. The Republicans spent nearly as much money in 1944 as they had in the record-setting 1936 election.

Roosevelt won with 25.6 million popular votes (53.4 percent) to Dewey’s 22.0 million (45.9 percent). The electoral vote was 432 to 99. But President Roosevelt, who reshaped U.S. politics at all levels, did not have the opportunity to see the end of the war or to participate in the making of the postwar world. On April 12, 1945, less than three months after his fourth inauguration, he collapsed while sitting for a portrait in Warm Springs, Georgia, and died a few hours later.

Truman Presidency: 1948

The shock of President Roosevelt’s death was perhaps greatest for the former haberdasher and machine politician who succeeded him. Truman had been a last-minute choice as FDR’s running mate the previous year, and he never became a part of Roosevelt’s inner circle. Truman did not know about the most important military program of the age—the Manhattan Project, which, in a race with the Nazis, was developing a nuclear bomb in secrecy in the out-of-the-way places of Oak Ridge, Tennessee; Hanford, Washington; and Los Alamos, New Mexico.

Truman also faced a problem of stature. Roosevelt had done nothing less than redefine the presidency in his twelve years in office. He not only effected a partisan realignment in U.S. politics, but he changed the very scope of government activity. As would become clear during the Eisenhower presidency, even Republicans had come to accept, grudgingly, the notion that the government ought to play an active role in stimulating the economy and addressing the needs of specific constituency groups.

Another problem facing Truman: many people could not fathom a presidency without Roosevelt. One member of the White House staff said later: “It was all so sudden, I had completely forgotten about Mr. Truman. Stunned, I realized that I simply couldn’t comprehend the presidency as something separate from Roosevelt. The presidency, the White House, the war, our lives—they were all Roosevelt.”<sup>112</sup> Other aides could not bring themselves to call Truman “Mr. President,” as if so doing would dishonor the late president.

Truman’s personality could not have presented a greater contrast to that of Roosevelt. Plain-speaking, blunt, middle-class, midwestern, high school educated, wheeling-and-dealing, and surrounded by old pals from the Pendergast machine of Missouri (the Democratic organization that dominated politics in the state), Truman offended people who had been accustomed to the charisma of Roosevelt. The new first lady, Bess Truman, also paled in comparison to her predecessor, the dynamic, more public Eleanor Roosevelt. Nevertheless, Truman showed absolute loyalty to the New Deal, but that would never be enough for many old Roosevelt hands and a nation entering a difficult period of postwar readjustment.

By the time the 1948 election neared, Truman was in grave political shape. He brought former president Hoover back from exile for special projects—one of the many ways he rankled the sensibilities of former Roosevelt aides and Eleanor Roosevelt. Truman also professed a desire to “keep my feet on the ground” and avoid the “crackpots and lunatic fringe” that had surrounded FDR.<sup>113</sup> Toward that end he got rid of Commerce Secretary Henry Wallace and others. The independent journalist I.F. Stone wrote of Truman’s personnel moves: “The little nameplates outside the little doors ... began to change. In Justice, Treasury, Commerce and elsewhere, the New Dealers began to be replaced by the kind of men one was accustomed to meeting in county courthouses.”<sup>114</sup>

The politics of postwar adjustment was difficult. The Republican 80th Congress, elected in 1946, sought to dismantle many New Deal programs, and it frustrated anti-inflation efforts. Truman, then, had to duel with Congress, vetoing 250 bills (eleven vetoes were overridden). Tentative civil rights initiatives disgruntled the South. Labor unrest was on the rise. Truman’s efforts to “contain” Soviet geopolitical ambitions not only created splits among Democrats but also brought attacks from Republican isolationists. To make matters worse, Truman was said to have performed inadequately at Potsdam, the conference of World War II victors held in the summer of 1945 that established many geographic borders in Europe.

The situation was so bad that Roosevelt’s own son promoted General Eisenhower and Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas for a 1948 run for the Democratic nomination against Truman. Truman, in other words, was doing a good job antagonizing both the left and the right. In August 1948 the Democratic convention appeared to reflect a dangerously polarized nation. The convention began with a feeling of desperation when Eisenhower and Douglas refused to run. Then a “states’ rights” plank offered by southern delegates was defeated, and, after strong speeches by Minneapolis mayor Hubert H. Humphrey and others, a strong northern civil rights plank passed. The party's New Deal and northern machine elements decided that southern defection would be less damaging than northern defection.

Defect is just what some southerners did. The "Dixiecrats," under the leadership of South Carolina's governor J. Strom Thurmond, left the convention to conduct their fall campaign. Thurmond's candidacy ran under the Democratic Party label in four states (Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina) and under the States' Rights Democratic Party elsewhere in the South. Meanwhile, the party's left wing, behind Henry Wallace, protested Truman's Marshall Plan (a multimillion-dollar program to rebuild the economies of western Europe), military buildup, and confrontational stance toward the Soviet Union. It, too, ran its own fall campaign under the banner of the Progressive Citizens of America (the Progressive Party).

The seeds of Dixie defection were planted long before the convention. In 1947 the President's Committee on Civil Rights issued a report calling for the protection of the rights of all minorities. It was just the kind of spark southern segregationists needed to begin a dump-Truman drive and to organize their own campaign in 1948. The Southern Governors Conference in March 1948 recommended that southern states send delegates to the Democratic convention and electors to the electoral college who would refuse to back a pro-civil rights candidate.

As political scientist V.O. Key Jr. has shown, the degree of resistance to civil rights in southern states depended on two basic factors: the proportion of blacks in the population and the strength of the two-party system. Key argued that the existence of a large black population led to stronger Democratic measures against black enfranchisement and led whites to support the Democratic Party in greater numbers. "To them [the whites in such districts], a single Negro vote threatened the whole caste system."<sup>115</sup> Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and South Carolina ended up voting for the Thurmond ticket. Other southern states found broader economic and political issues more compelling than race and voted for Truman.<sup>116</sup>

Many of FDR's old political allies eventually got behind Truman, but the president's election prospects looked bleak. Some support was grudging—Eleanor Roosevelt offered a straightforward endorsement only to rebut newspaper reports that she favored the Republicans. While the Democratic Party was badly fractured, the Republican Party united behind Dewey.

Dewey, who had been the 1944 GOP candidate, survived a large field in 1948 to become the nominee once again. Senator Taft of Ohio was the main threat, but his isolationism and dull public demeanor were liabilities. The most spirited opposition came from Governor Stassen of Minnesota, who appealed to the more liberal and internationalist wing of the party. An anathema to party bosses, Stassen proved his strength in a series of primary victories. Other candidates or potential convention contenders included Generals Eisenhower and MacArthur, Governor Warren, and Senator Vandenberg. Polls showed all of the Republicans but Taft beating Truman.<sup>117</sup>

Dewey gained the preconvention momentum he needed with an impressive primary victory over Stassen in Oregon. He spent three weeks in the state, while Stassen frittered away his time and resources with a hopeless challenge to Taft in the Ohio primary. Dewey was especially tough in a primary debate with Stassen about communism. With these successes, as well as his impressive organizational strength and mastery over convention mechanics, Dewey won the presidential nomination on the third ballot. Warren was selected as the vice-presidential nominee.

Dewey was part of a new breed of Republican leaders—pragmatic and accepting of the New Deal and the international role that the United States would play in the postwar era. He expressed support for the basic tenets of postwar liberalism, including Social Security, civil rights, and the United Nations. In the 1948 campaign, Dewey planned to put himself above the slashing attack style of President Truman. His constant calls for national unity—spoken in a baritone voice and perfect English—expressed broad public acceptance of the vast changes in U.S. politics over the previous twenty years.

From the beginning of the campaign, the media and professional politicians gave Truman little chance of retaining the White House. Early polls showed Dewey with such a strong lead that pollsters simply stopped surveying voters. But the polls failed because of a bias in the way the questions were asked and a presumption that the large undecided vote would cast their ballots in the same way as the rest of the population, when it in fact heavily favored Truman.<sup>118</sup>

Dewey was so certain of victory that he ran as if he were the incumbent. He made a series of bland, almost diplomatic statements rather than energetic campaign speeches. Dewey appeared confident that his advice to one audience—“Vote your own interests”—would attract an amalgam of disaffected groups. Never even mentioning the president’s name, Dewey calmly canvassed the country and just smiled when people called him “President Dewey.” Dewey was careful to avoid the overaggressive posture that he thought had ruined his 1944 campaign against Roosevelt. He even made some initial cabinet and policy decisions.

Truman’s strategy from the beginning was simply to mobilize the New Deal coalition. The biggest danger was apathy, he and campaign aide Clark Clifford reasoned, so the best strategy was to give the voters a reason to go to the polling booths. Because the Democrats were the majority party, they had to concentrate mainly on getting their long-time supporters to the polls.

Truman ran a scrappy and blunt underdog campaign that could have been mistaken for an outsider’s effort. Truman was the president, but he ran against the Washington establishment. Crisscrossing the nation on a whistle-stop train tour, Truman traveled 31,000 miles and spoke before six million people. He turned his record of vetoes into an asset, claiming that the “do-nothing” Republican 80th Congress made him do it. He assailed the conservative Republican record on inflation, housing, labor, farm issues, and foreign affairs. The president drew large crowds—sometimes many times the size of Dewey’s crowds—but he was virtually the only political professional who thought he would win.

Truman himself predicted in October that he had 229 solid electoral votes to Dewey’s 109 and Thurmond’s 9; 189 votes, he said, could go either way. The best anyone would say about the Truman campaign was that its fighting spirit improved the Democrats’ chances to win the Senate. Truman answered the Republicans’ claims of liberalism and reformism by criticizing the GOP for obstructing his policies. Truman’s outsider taunt was constant: “that no-account, do-nothing, Republican 80th Congress!”<sup>119</sup>

Despite the Chicago Tribune’s now-famous headline—“Dewey Defeats Truman”—President Truman prevailed. Early returns put Truman in front, but it was expected that the later-reporting western states would give Dewey the win. When California and Ohio went into the Truman column midmorning on Wednesday, Dewey conceded defeat.

Considering the Democratic defections, Truman’s appeal was widespread. He won twenty-eight states with 24.11 million votes (49.51 percent) and might have won more in the South and North with a united party—as it was, Thurmond won 22 percent of the vote in the South. Dewey won 21.97 million votes (45.12 percent), and Thurmond polled 1.17 million votes (2.40 percent). Henry Wallace won 1.16 million votes (2.38 percent) but no electoral votes. Wallace’s candidacy may have cost Truman New York, Michigan, and Maryland. Yet Wallace may have done Truman a favor by freeing him from the taint of being the most liberal candidate in a time when the electorate was weary of liberalism. Particularly because the Republicans did not have a midwesterner on their ticket and talked about cutting back agricultural subsidies, farmers felt safer with Truman. In all, Truman won 303 electoral votes, Dewey, 189, and Thurmond, 39.

The Democratic defections may have helped Truman by making him the candidate of the center. The Wallace campaign freed the president from suspicions on the right, and the Thurmond defection strengthened Truman’s more liberal northern constituency. In addition, the defections may have inspired Democratic voters to turn out in larger numbers than they would have had victory seemed certain.

In the end the election mostly confirmed long-held partisan allegiances. In the words of political scientist Angus Campbell and his colleagues, it was a “maintaining” election: “The electorate responded to current elements in politics very much in terms of its existing partisan loyalties. Apparently very little of the political landscape attracted strong feeling in that year. But what feeling there was seemed to be governed largely by antecedent attachments to one of the two major parties.”<sup>120</sup>

“I Like Ike”: 1952

Truman’s political fortunes worsened during his second term to the extent that he decided belatedly against making a bid for the Democratic nomination. In 1952, for the first time in twenty-four years, neither party had an incumbent president as its nominee.

The Democrats suffered from a weariness that is bound to affect any party that has been in power for twenty years. Problems and opponents’ frustrated ambitions were piling up, and in General Eisenhower the Republicans were able to recruit a candidate with universal appeal who was coveted by both parties. The national mood in the years before the 1952 election was sour. The nation was tiring of price controls, recurring scandals among members of the White House staff, and the Korean War, which the Truman administration had begun in 1950 but did not appear interested in either winning or pulling U.S. troops out of. The Republicans asked for a chance to “clean up the mess” in Washington and punctuated their appeals with the question: “Had enough?”

The Truman administration had met with repeated frustration in dealing with Congress. On civil rights, tariffs, taxes, labor reform, and the sensationalized question of communist sympathizers in the government, Truman had had to cope with a stubborn Democratic Congress, which, in turn, became more stubborn after Republican gains in the 1950 midterm elections. When Truman seized control of the steel mills because he said the steelworkers’ strike threatened the nation’s security, he was rebuffed by the Supreme Court.<sup>121</sup>

Truman’s biggest problems, however, had concerned cronyism and war. Republicans in congressional investigations and on the stump had hammered away at conflict-of-interest scandals in Truman’s administration, creating nationwide sentiment to “clean up” Washington with a new administration. Meanwhile, the United States was mired in a stalemate in Korea—a distant war that was being fought inconclusively under the aegis of the United Nations, with uncertain goals (was it to protect South Korea or to defeat North Korea as well?) and uncertain enemies (was the People’s Republic of China an opponent as well as North Korea?). Truman evoked ire with his firing of General MacArthur, who wanted to take the war into China, and with the slow movement toward a settlement. Just as the nation had tired of sacrifices in World War I under Woodrow Wilson, it had tired of sacrifices under Truman.

General Eisenhower—who had just left the presidency of Columbia University to take charge of the forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO)—was recruited by Republicans to run when it appeared that other GOP candidates lacked the national appeal to win the White House. Senator Taft was running again, but his isolationism was considered a liability in the postwar age of internationalism.

Stassen, MacArthur, and Warren were other likely Republican candidates.

Eisenhower’s popular appeal was revealed when he attracted 50.4 percent of the vote in the New Hampshire primary to Taft’s 38.7 percent and Stassen’s 7.1 percent. Eisenhower performed well in the northeast area primaries, and Taft generally performed well in the Midwest. A write-in campaign for Eisenhower almost upset Stassen in his home state of Minnesota.

When the GOP convention finally met in Chicago, Taft had the lead in convention delegates. In crucial delegate-seating contests, many of them played out on national television, Eisenhower defeated Taft and won the right to seat pro-Eisenhower insurgents from the South. Taft had relied on the old strategy of mobilizing state machines, but such tactics looked unsavory on television. Eisenhower had undisputed popular appeal, and he won on the first ballot after his early lead turned into a stampede.

Eisenhower selected Sen. Richard Nixon of California as his running mate. The thirty-nine-year-old conservative had won national recognition with his activities on the controversial House Committee on Un-American Activities, which investigated the alleged Soviet ties of Alger Hiss, a former State Department official. Hiss would serve time for a perjury conviction.

The Democrats moved haltingly toward putting together a ticket. Truman did not announce his decision to stay out of the race until April, after two primary losses. Sen. Estes Kefauver of Tennessee, who had gained fame with his televised hearings on organized crime, ran an aggressive primary campaign and entered the convention with the lead in delegates. Other candidates included Gov. Averell Harriman of New York, Vice President Alben Barkley, Sen. Robert Kerr of Oklahoma, and Sen. Richard Russell of Georgia.

The eventual nominee was Gov. Adlai Stevenson of Illinois, grandson of Grover Cleveland’s second vice president. Stevenson had had experience in the navy and State departments before running for governor. President Truman had privately recruited Stevenson for the race—at first unsuccessfully. Then Truman and Illinois backers set up a draft movement for Stevenson, which the governor disavowed until the last minute. Kefauver was the early leader in convention balloting, but Stevenson, always close, pulled into the lead on the third ballot.

Stevenson’s campaign was an eloquent call to arms for liberals and reformers. Years later Democrats would recall that the campaign had inspired the generation that would take the reins of power under John F. Kennedy in 1960. Democratic politics at all levels in the 1950s and 1960s would revolve around battles between party regulars and reformers.

Stevenson did not have a chance, however, against the popular Eisenhower. Some southern states bolted the Democratic Party, and the Republicans hammered away at the misdeeds of the Democratic administration under Truman. Such issues as the 1949 communist revolution in China (“Who lost China?”), the protracted Korean War, administration corruption, and the alleged communist infiltration of the government captured the nation’s attention more than Stevenson’s oratory.

More than anything, however, the desire for party change rather than policy change determined the election. The Republican evocation of the theme of “Corruption, Korea, and Communism” did not challenge the policies that the Democrats offered the nation as much as the way they executed those policies. Eisenhower was a proven administrator and was free of the taint of everyday U.S. politics. Stevenson was a reformer himself, but his campaign had the conspicuous backing of President Truman. Stevenson’s divorce and his public support of Hiss were constant if only vaguely stated issues.

The campaign’s biggest controversy developed when newspaper reports alleged that Nixon had used a “secret fund” provided by California millionaires to pay for travel and other expenses. To a Democratic Party weary of charges of impropriety, the revelation offered an opportunity to accuse Nixon of being beholden to special interests. Nixon admitted the existence of the fund but maintained that he used the money solely for travel and that his family did not accept personal gifts.

Nixon originally reacted to the story by asserting that it was a communist smear. When Eisenhower would not publicly back his running mate, speculation developed that Ike would ask Nixon to leave the ticket—and the Republican New York Herald Tribune openly called for him to drop out. When Nixon decided to confront his accusers with a television speech, campaign aides told him he would be dropped if the public reaction was not favorable.

Nixon’s speech was remarkable. He denied any impropriety and stated that the Stevenson campaign was hypocritical in its criticisms because it had similar funds. More specifically, Nixon denied that he had accepted such gifts as a mink coat for his wife, Pat; he said that his wife wore a “Republican cloth coat.” He acknowledged, however, receiving a pet dog named Checkers from a Texas admirer: “And you know, the kids love that dog, and I just want to say this right now, that regardless of what they say about it, we’re going to keep it.”<sup>122</sup> His folksy message and appeal for telegrams created a wave of sympathy, which Eisenhower rewarded with a pledge of support. The crisis was over.

In a personal victory—surveys showed that the nation still favored the programs of the New Deal but simply wanted to put the cronyism, sacrifices, and Korean War behind it—Eisenhower swept to the White House. Ike won the entire North and West, parts of the South, and some border states—a total of thirty-nine states to Stevenson’s nine. His 442 electoral votes and 33.9 million popular votes (55.1 percent) overwhelmed Stevenson’s 89 electoral votes and 27.3 million popular votes (44.4 percent). The election of 1956 would bring more of the same.

Eisenhower’s Reelection: 1956

Despite his age (sixty-six) and having had a heart attack in 1955, Eisenhower was the strong favorite to be the GOP nominee for another term. Close cooperation with the Democratic congressional leadership and a “hidden-hand” leadership style seemed to comport with the electorate’s wishes for normalcy.<sup>123</sup> The White House staff was ably run by the chief of staff, Sherman Adams, and foreign policy was supervised by Secretary of State John Foster Dulles. The genius of Eisenhower’s management style was his use of aides as “lightning rods” for unpopular policies.

Even without lightning rods, Eisenhower probably would have fared well. The economy was booming, and Eisenhower had quickly brought the Korean War to a close. His nuclear policy gave the nation a “bigger bang for the buck” in defense spending and kept the troop requirements low. Federal housing and highway programs gave impetus to suburbanization, now considered part of the middle-class American Dream. Issues that would in the future become divisive, such as civil rights, were muffled.

The only unsettled Republican issue was whether Nixon would again be the vice-presidential candidate. Eisenhower offered him a cabinet post, and Stassen mounted a campaign to replace Nixon with Massachusetts governor Christian Herter. After some hesitation, however, Eisenhower stood by his controversial running mate.

In the Democratic camp, Kefauver challenged Stevenson for the right to face Eisenhower in the fall. After impressive primary victories in New Hampshire and Minnesota for Kefauver, the Stevenson campaign fought back with a string of primary wins in states as varied as California, Florida, and Oregon.

Former president Truman endorsed New York governor Harriman—not Stevenson—at the opening of the Democratic convention. A variety of other favorite sons entered the race. But with the help of Eleanor Roosevelt, Stevenson was able to win the nomination for a second time. Stevenson won on the first ballot.

Stevenson left the vice-presidential slot open to the convention delegates. Kefauver eventually won, after battling Senators John Kennedy, Albert A. Gore, and Hubert Humphrey and New York mayor Robert Wagner. The open contest highlighted the future national political potential of Kennedy, who, according to later accounts, mainly intended not to win the second spot on the ticket but to gain visibility for a 1960 presidential run.

The campaign was bereft of real issues. Eisenhower’s campaigning was a tempered appeal to American values and bipartisan consensus. Nixon was left the job of hacking away at the opposition; he called Stevenson “Adlai the Appeaser” and a “Ph.D. graduate of Dean Acheson’s cowardly College of Communist Containment.”<sup>124</sup> Overall, however, the campaign was an example of what James David Barber has called “the politics of conciliation,” with little conflict or desire for change.

Whether or not the electorate was “asleep,” as frustrated critics charged, Eisenhower nailed down another strong victory. He won forty-two states, 457 electoral votes, and 35.6 million popular votes (57.4 percent), compared with Stevenson’s six states, 73 electoral votes, and 26.0 million popular votes (42.0 percent). In an unprecedented development, however, both houses of Congress went to the opposition.

Kennedy and the Politics of Change: 1960

The periodic national desire for change came at the expense of the Republicans in 1960, when Massachusetts senator Kennedy became the youngest person ever elected president by defeating Vice President Nixon. The presidential election was foreshadowed by the 1958 midterm election, when the Democrats made impressive gains in Congress. An economic recession and generational politics created the first major shift toward liberalism since the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt. The “Class of ’58” decisively changed the discourse of U.S. politics. After the election the Democrats held 64 of 98 Senate seats and 283 of 436 House seats, and thirty-five states had Democratic governors. The time appeared ripe for reopening issues that had long been stifled such as civil rights, urban problems, and education.<sup>125</sup>

The 1960 Democratic field was dominated by senators—Kennedy, Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas, Humphrey of Minnesota, and Stuart Symington of Missouri. Each had important advantages and disadvantages. Kennedy was from a wealthy and politically minded family, but his Catholicism and undistinguished Senate record were liabilities. Johnson was a masterful majority leader, but no southerner had won the White House since James K. Polk in 1844. Humphrey was popular in the Midwest, but he lacked financial backing and was considered too loquacious and liberal. Symington had a strong Senate record and Truman’s backing, but he was considered colorless, and Truman’s backing carried liabilities.

Former Illinois governor Adlai Stevenson, the party’s nominee in 1952 and 1956, stood on the sidelines, hoping that a convention deadlock or draft movement would bring him another chance for the White House. Early speculation was that the convention would be deadlocked and a compromise candidate would have to emerge. It appeared likely that the nomination would go to Symington, Johnson, Humphrey, or to one of the two senior candidates, Stevenson and Kefauver; the other candidates were good bets for the vice-presidential slot.

In the 1960 presidential campaign, John F. Kennedy, seen here greeting supporters in Charleston, worked hard to win the West Virginia primary. His victory in this overwhelmingly Protestant state blunted the issue of his Catholicism and set him on the way to a first-ballot nomination.

Kennedy presented the most intriguing candidacy. He was the son of Joseph P. Kennedy, the millionaire who had been Roosevelt’s ambassador to Britain before their bitter break over U.S. involvement in World War II. John Kennedy also was an Ivy League graduate (of Harvard University), a war hero (described in the book P.T. 109), and a Pulitzer Prize winner (for Profiles in Courage). With an experienced campaign staff, he had won an overwhelming reelection to the Senate in 1958. Moreover, he had been planning a run for the White House for years.

There were Kennedy skeptics, however. No Catholic except Alfred Smith had been a major party nominee, and Smith’s bitter loss and the anti-Catholic sentiments he aroused in 1928 made political professionals wary of naming another Catholic. Some considered Kennedy, at age forty-three, to be too young. Others focused on the influence of Joseph Kennedy, who had bankrolled his son’s political career.<sup>126</sup> Truman’s comment captured the crux of Kennedy’s liabilities: “It’s not the Pope I’m afraid of, it’s the Pop.”<sup>127</sup>

To address the doubts, Kennedy entered political primaries that would enable him to demonstrate vote-getting ability and to confront the religion problem. The two key primaries were Wisconsin and West Virginia. In Wisconsin, Kennedy would answer the charge that he was too conservative. But the Kennedy strategists were divided about whether he should oppose Senator Humphrey of neighboring Minnesota. Wisconsin’s growing independence in party politics eventually convinced them, however, that it would present a low risk in return for the possibility of beating Humphrey in his native region. In West Virginia, Kennedy would attempt to blunt the religion issue by attracting the votes of an overwhelmingly Protestant electorate.

In the end, Kennedy defeated Humphrey in Wisconsin. Kennedy's impressive campaign treasury enabled him to staff offices in eight of the ten congressional districts in the state; Humphrey had only two offices. Humphrey maintained that the defeat stemmed from crossover Republican Catholic votes and was therefore illegitimate. (Most of the state's Catholics, who made up 31 percent of the population, belonged to the GOP.) But to Kennedy and many political observers, it was still an important victory.

Humphrey wanted to even the score in West Virginia. If Humphrey had quit the campaign and left Kennedy with no opponents, as many advised him to do, a Kennedy victory would have attracted little attention.<sup>128</sup> But Kennedy was able to use the Appalachian state as a way to deflect the religion issue as well as the "can't win" problem. Kennedy had a thorough organization in West Virginia, and he worked hard. He had commissioned polls in the state as far back as 1958 in anticipation of the presidential race.

Kennedy's handling of the religion question in the primaries was shrewd and would be repeated in the fall campaign. He framed the question as one of tolerance—which put Humphrey on the defensive because he had never tried to exploit the religion issue. Kennedy had his campaign workers plant questions about how his religious beliefs would affect his loyalty to the nation, to which the candidate replied with a stock answer: "When any man stands on the steps of the Capitol and takes the oath of office as president, he is swearing to uphold the separation of church and state; he puts one hand on the Bible and raises the other hand to God as he takes the oath. And if he breaks the oath, he is not only committing a crime against the Constitution, for which the Congress can impeach him—but he is committing a sin against God."<sup>129</sup>

Kennedy's direct confrontation of the religion issue worked to his benefit. Kennedy had the money to get his message across: his television expenditures alone in the state totaled $34,000, while Humphrey had only $25,000 for the whole primary campaign in West Virginia.<sup>130</sup> Early polls gave Humphrey wide leads, and interviews elicited strong reservations about Kennedy's Catholicism. As the commercials aired and the primary neared, the lead became smaller, and voters privately said they would vote for Kennedy.

JFK, as he asked headline writers to call him instead of the youthful-sounding "Jack," easily won the primary, taking 61 percent of the vote to Humphrey's 39 percent. He was on his way to a first-ballot nomination.

The Kennedy campaign staffers managed the Democratic convention with consummate skill. Had they failed to gain a majority on the first ballot, pressure might have developed for another candidate. But the Kennedy team efficiently lobbied delegations to augment support; the vice-presidential slot was vaguely offered to several politicians. In the end, Lyndon Johnson was the surprise choice for running mate. Even Kennedy supporters had doubts about Johnson, but the selection of the southerner was a classic ticket-balancing move.<sup>131</sup>

Central to Kennedy's winning campaign was his younger brother Robert F. Kennedy. A former counsel to Republican senator Joseph McCarthy, Robert developed into the consummate political operative. He was JFK's confidant, chief strategist, delegate counter, fund-raiser, taskmaster, and persuader. Biographer Arthur M. Schlesinger Jr. wrote that Robert Kennedy's strength "lay in his capacity to address a specific situation, to assemble an able staff, to inspire and flog them into exceptional deeds, and to prevail through sheer force of momentum."<sup>132</sup>

Vice President Nixon was the overwhelming choice for the Republican nomination. Nelson A. Rockefeller, elected governor of New York in 1958, was a liberal alternative, but he announced in 1959 that he would not run. There was a brief surge for Rockefeller when he criticized the party and its "leading candidate," but meetings with Nixon settled the differences. Some conservatives were disgruntled with Nixon, but their efforts for Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona would have to wait until 1964.

Nixon selected United Nations Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge as his running mate, and the party platform and rhetoric stressed the need for experience in a dangerous world. Nixon promised to continue President Eisenhower's policies. He attempted to portray Kennedy as an inexperienced upstart, even though he was Kennedy's senior by only four years and the two had entered Congress the same year. Nixon led in the polls at the traditional Labor Day start of the fall campaign.

Kennedy's campaign was based on a promise to "get the nation moving again" after eight years of calm Republican rule. Specifically, he assured voters that he would lead the nation out of a recession. The gross national product increased at a rate of only 2.25 percent annually between 1955 and 1959. Economists puzzled over the simultaneously high unemployment and high inflation rates.<sup>133</sup> Kennedy repeatedly called for two related changes in national policy: pump up the economy and increase defense spending dramatically.

The Democrat faced up to the religion issue again with an eloquent speech before the Greater Houston Ministerial Association, and he attracted attention from civil rights leaders when he offered moral and legal support to the Reverend Martin Luther King Jr. after King was arrested for taking part in a sit-in at an Atlanta restaurant. While Kennedy appealed to the party's more liberal and moderate wing, Johnson toured the South to appeal to regional pride and to assuage fears about an activist government.

The high point of the campaign came on September 26, 1960, when the candidates debated on national television before 70 million viewers. Kennedy was well rested and tanned; he had spent the week before the debate with friends and associates. Nixon was tired from two solid weeks of campaigning; he had spent the preparation period by himself. Their appearances alone greatly influenced the public's perception of the debates.

Kennedy's main objective had been simply to look relaxed and "up to" the presidency. He had little to lose. Nixon was always confident of his debating skills, and he performed well in the give-and-take of the debate. But the rules of debating—the way "points" are allocated—are not the same for formal debating and televised encounters. Kennedy's managers prepared their candidate better for the staging of the debate. Nixon's five-o'clock shadow reinforced the cartoon image of him as darkly sinister. As a result of all these factors, polls of radio listeners found that Nixon had "won" the debate, but polls of the more numerous television viewers found that Kennedy had "won." Historian Theodore H. White wrote: "It was the picture image that had done it—and in 1960 it was television that had won the nation away from sound to images, and that was that."<sup>134</sup>

While Kennedy called for a more activist and imaginative approach to world problems, Nixon stressed the candidates' similarities so much that their differences paled into insignificance. Kennedy called for a crusade to eliminate want and to confront tyranny. Nixon responded: "I can subscribe completely to the spirit that Senator Kennedy has expressed tonight."<sup>135</sup> With ideology an unimportant part of the debate, the images of personal character the candidates were able to project gained in importance.

The candidates held three more debates, addressing issues such as Fidel Castro's Cuba, whether the United States should defend the Chinese offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu in the event of a military strike by China, and relations with Nikita Khrushchev's Soviet Union. None of the debates had the effect of the first, which neutralized Nixon's quasi-incumbency advantage. Nor was Nixon greatly helped by President Eisenhower, who did not campaign for his protégé until late in the campaign.

The election results were so close that Nixon did not concede his defeat until the afternoon of the day after the election. After a vacation in Florida and Nassau, Nixon returned to Washington on November 19 to consider a series of charges that voter fraud had cost him the election. A shift of between 11,000 and 13,000 votes in a total of five or six states could have given Nixon the electoral vote triumph. Nixon said he decided against demanding a recount because it would take "at least a year and a half" and would throw the federal government into turmoil.<sup>136</sup> Other commentators have pointed out that had Nixon, for instance, challenged voting irregularities in Illinois in Democratic precincts in Chicago, irregularities in Republican rural areas of the state could have been challenged by Kennedy.

When the electoral college voted, Kennedy won 303 electoral votes to Nixon's 219. Democratic senator Harry F. Byrd of Virginia attracted 15 electoral votes. Kennedy won twenty-three states to Nixon's twenty-six. (Six Alabama electors and all eight Mississippi electors, elected as "unpledged Democrats," as well as one Republican elector from Oklahoma cast their votes for Byrd.) The overall popular vote went 34.2 million for Kennedy and 34.1 million for Nixon. The margin was about two-tenths of 1 percent, or 118,574 votes. Moreover, the margins in many states were close. Kennedy won Illinois by 8,858 votes and Texas by 46,242 votes. Despite statements that the religion question would hurt Kennedy, it probably helped him by mobilizing Catholics on his behalf. Gallup polls showed that 78 percent of Catholics voted for JFK. Although Catholics were a traditional Democratic constituent group—supporting the party by margins of three or four to one—they had shown support for Republicans Eisenhower and Senator McCarthy.<sup>137</sup> In addition, Kennedy put together a predictable coalition: he won the support of voters in the Northeast, in most of the South, and in cities, plus blacks and union workers. Upper New England, the Midwest, and the West went primarily to Nixon.

After the election, Kennedy and Goldwater discussed, in an informal way, how they would conduct their campaigns for the presidency in 1964. The two expected to win their parties' nominations easily, and they talked about crisscrossing the nation in head-to-head debates, which would set a new standard for national campaigns.<sup>138</sup>

The Kennedy-Goldwater campaign never came to be, however. On November 22, 1963, while riding in a motorcade in Dallas, Texas, President Kennedy was assassinated by a gunman named Lee Harvey Oswald.<sup>139</sup> Vice President Johnson assumed the presidency.<sup>140</sup>

In his brief administration, Kennedy had compiled a record disappointing even to many of his supporters. The Bay of Pigs fiasco in which a Central Intelligence Agency plan—begun under Eisenhower—to overthrow the Cuban government failed miserably, the inability to obtain passage of landmark civil rights legislation, budget deficits and a drain of gold supplies from the United States, confrontations with the Soviet Union in Cuba, Hungary, and Berlin, and the nascent U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War created doubts about the young president's control of the government.

Kennedy had, however, made a start on many important issues. Arms control initiatives such as the test ban treaty, economic growth through tax cuts, modernization of the military, the successful management of the Cuban Missile Crisis, civil rights and other domestic initiatives, the Peace Corps and Alliance for Progress, and growing world stature all offered hope for the second term. It would fall to Johnson, the legendary former Senate majority leader, to bring the Kennedy plans to fruition. First acting as the loyal servant of the slain president, then on his own, Johnson was able to bring to legislative enactment many of the initiatives long cherished by liberals—most notably the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which was considerably stronger than the Kennedy bill that had stalled in Congress.

“All the Way with LBJ”: 1964

From the time of his sad but graceful ascension to the White House, Johnson was never in doubt as the Democrats’ 1964 nominee. He was expected to select an eastern or midwestern liberal as his running mate, and he did so when he tapped Senator Humphrey of Minnesota at the convention, which his campaign organization stage-managed down to the last detail. The only dissent from Democratic unity was provided by Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama, whose segregationist campaign took advantage of a backlash against the civil rights movement. Wallace entered three primaries against Johnson-allied favorite sons, and he polled 43 percent of the vote in Maryland. Wallace talked about mounting a third-party bid in the fall, but he backed off.

The Republicans were divided into two bitter camps led by Senator Goldwater of Arizona, the eventual nominee, and by Governor Rockefeller of New York. The nomination contest was a struggle for the soul of the party. Other active and inactive candidates included Ambassador to Vietnam Henry Cabot Lodge, former vice president Nixon, and Gov. William Scranton of Pennsylvania. After a New Hampshire primary victory by Lodge, achieved through a well-organized write-in drive while he was still ambassador to Vietnam, Goldwater and Rockefeller scrapped through a series of primaries. The moderate Lodge later helped Scranton in a late effort to recruit uncommitted delegates to stop Goldwater, but by then it was too late. Goldwater lined up strong delegate support to get the nomination before the primary season even began, but he needed to use the primaries to show that he had vote-getting ability. The state organizations that backed him also needed evidence that his conservative message would find popular acceptance.

In the “mixed” nominating system then in place, candidates were able to pick and choose the primaries that best suited their strategies. Front-runners avoided risks, and long shots entered high-visibility and often risky contests as a way to attract the attention of party professionals. As expected, Goldwater won widespread support in the southern state conventions and had strong primary showings in Illinois and Indiana. Rockefeller beat Lodge in Oregon, but the decisive test came when Goldwater narrowly upset Rockefeller in California.

In accepting the 1964 Republican nomination, Sen. Barry Goldwater called for a moral crusade, declaring, “Extremism in defense of liberty is no vice; moderation in pursuit of justice is no virtue.”

More important than the confusing preconvention contests was the rhetoric. Both the conservative Goldwater and the liberal Rockefeller vowed to save the party from the other’s ideology. Goldwater, who rode the bestseller success of his Conscience of a Conservative to hero worship among conservatives, made a vigorous case against New Deal politics and for American sway in world politics: “I don’t give a tinker’s damn what the rest of the world thinks about the United States, as long as we keep strong militarily.”<sup>141</sup> Rockefeller implied that Goldwater would risk nuclear war and would recklessly dismantle basic social programs.

The nominating contest was a regional as well as an ideological struggle. The westerner Goldwater—backed by labor-intensive manufacturers, small business and agricultural enterprises, and domestic oil producers—opposed internationalist banking and commercial interests.<sup>142</sup> Goldwater made eastern media the objects of scorn. Rockefeller and his family, of course, represented the apex of the eastern establishment. Because of his strategy, Goldwater isolated his campaign from the manufacturing and financial interests that had been at the center of American economic growth for a generation.

Bitter battles over the party platform and unseemly heckling of Rockefeller displayed the party’s divisions at the convention. When the conservatives won the nomination and the platform, there was no reconciliation. Goldwater selected Rep. William Miller of New York, another conservative, as his running mate and vowed to purge the party of liberal and moderate elements.

In a defiant acceptance speech, Goldwater painted a picture of the United States as inept in international affairs and morally corrupt in domestic pursuits, and he vowed an all-out crusade to change the situation: “Tonight there is violence in our streets, corruption in our highest offices, aimlessness among our youth, anxiety among our elderly, and there's a virtual despair among the many who look beyond the material successes toward the inner meaning of their lives.... Extremism in defense of liberty is no vice; moderation in pursuit of justice is no virtue."<sup>143</sup>

To a nation experiencing prosperity and unaware of the true proportions of its involvement in Vietnam, the "choice, not an echo" that Goldwater offered was a moral crusade. But the American consensus was built on material, consumer foundations, and an "outsider" appeal would have to wait until the system's foundations became unstable.

The divided GOP made for easy pickings for Johnson. The fall campaign was dominated by Goldwater's gaffes, which started long before the campaign began. He said, for example, that troops committed to NATO in Europe probably could be cut by at least one-third if NATO "commanders" had the authority to use tactical nuclear weapons in an emergency.<sup>144</sup> Goldwater also proposed a number of changes in the Social Security system, called for selling off the Tennessee Valley Authority, criticized the civil rights movement, and denounced the Supreme Court, the National Labor Relations Board, and the federal bureaucracy. Except for the use of nuclear weapons and changes in Social Security, most of Goldwater's proposals when taken alone were not shocking. But the sum of his proposals—and his sometimes halting explanations—scared many voters.

President Johnson campaigned actively to win a mandate for an activist new term. He traveled throughout the country making speeches to build a consensus for his domestic programs as well as his reelection. Johnson resisted Goldwater's frequent calls for televised debates. The nation's prosperity was probably enough to keep the president in the White House.<sup>145</sup>

Johnson desperately wanted a personal mandate to pursue a variety of domestic programs that fell under the rubric of the "Great Society"—a term that Johnson used in a 1964 commencement address (borrowed from a book of the same title by British socialist Graham Wallas). The desired landslide—underscored by his campaign slogan, "All the Way with LBJ"—was essential to initiatives in civil rights, health care, community action, education, welfare, housing, and jobs creation. Central to the landslide was not only economic prosperity but also peace in the world's trouble spots. Johnson therefore ran as a "peace" candidate.

But while he was trying to build a coalition that would sustain his domestic initiatives, Johnson faced an increasingly difficult dilemma about the U.S. role in Vietnam. The United States had been involved in opposing Ho Chi Minh's revolution against French colonial rule in the 1940s and 1950s, and under Presidents Eisenhower and Kennedy the United States had made a commitment to the leaders of South Vietnam (created after the failure of the 1954 Geneva accord) as a bastion against communist expansion in Asia. But talk of war would likely imperil the domestic initiatives of the Great Society.

So while Johnson was campaigning as the peace candidate in 1964, he also was preparing for a major increase in U.S. involvement in Vietnam. As early as February 1964, the administration began elaborate covert operations in Southeast Asia and prepared a resolution to give the president a "blank check" in Vietnam.<sup>146</sup> By June the resolution was ready, and the Pentagon had chosen ninety-four bombing targets in North Vietnam and made provisions for bombing support systems on the ground. But on June 15, Johnson decided to delay major offensives until after the election.<sup>147</sup> In August Johnson sent to Congress what would be known as the Tonkin Gulf resolution, which granted the president broad authority to wage war in Vietnam. The resolution passed quickly and nearly unanimously—after all, the president had instructed congressional leaders to get an overwhelming majority so his policy would be bipartisan.

Johnson also seized on Rockefeller's use of the peace issue during the Republican primaries against Goldwater. He alluded to some of Goldwater's scarier statements about war, and he pledged that "we are not about to send American boys nine or ten thousand miles away from home to do what Asian boys ought to be doing for themselves."<sup>148</sup> A week before the election Johnson said: "The only real issue in this campaign, the only one you ought to get concerned about, is who can best keep the peace."<sup>149</sup>

Johnson's popular vote landslide was the largest in U.S. history. He won 61 percent of the popular vote to Goldwater's 38 percent (or 43.1 million to 27.2 million votes). In the electoral college Johnson received 486 votes to Goldwater's 52, and he carried forty-four states—all but Goldwater's home state of Arizona and five deep South states. In addition, the Democratic Party amassed huge majorities in both the Senate (67–33) and the House of Representatives (295–140).

On election day, Johnson created a working group to study "immediately and intensively" the U.S. options in Southeast Asia.<sup>150</sup> The war was increasing far beyond what most supporters of the Tonkin Gulf resolution or "peace" supporters of the president imagined. In 1965 alone the number of U.S. troops in Vietnam increased from 15,000 to nearly 200,000.<sup>151</sup>

BREAKUP OF CONSENSUS

A long period of uncertainty in American politics began sometime after Lyndon B. Johnson's landslide victory over Barry Goldwater in 1964. By 1968 some 30,000 Americans had been killed in action in Vietnam, and television was bringing the war into the living rooms of American families. Despite repeated assertions that the United States was defeating the North Vietnamese enemy, U.S. bombing efforts and ground troops did not break the resolve of the communists in the North or their sympathizers who had infiltrated the South. The corrupt South Vietnamese government and army appeared to lack the will to fight the war on their own.

In the United States, the opposition to the war developed as the casualties mounted, and the administration experienced a “credibility gap” because of its statements about the war. Before the United States left Vietnam in 1975, 55,000 Americans had died in combat. Perhaps more important than the number of casualties—about the same as in the Korean War—was the long-term commitment that the United States appeared to have made with little evidence of progress. The “quagmire,” as New York Times reporter David Halberstam called the war, was perhaps typified by the program of intense U.S. bombing raids that were judged by many experts to be ineffectual against the North’s guerrilla warfare strategy.<sup>152</sup>

As opposition to the war grew among an increasingly vocal and well-organized minority, strains developed in Johnson’s economic and domestic programs. Starting with the riots in the Watts section of Los Angeles in 1965, urban areas sizzled with resentment of the mainstream liberal establishment. Detroit, Newark, and many major U.S. cities erupted in other riots that burned miles of city streets and caused millions of dollars in damage. The assassination of civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. in Memphis in April 1968 led to riots throughout the nation. Even before the riots, however, a conservative reaction against the Great Society had developed.

The activities of the Great Society were many and varied. Most prominent were the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, Head Start, Model Cities, mass transit legislation, food stamps, Medicare and Medicaid, the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, college loans, and housing programs that included subsidies for the poor.

The conservative backlash was apparent before many programs had time to do their work. Efforts such as the Model Cities program and the Community Action Program, which mandated that poverty programs promote “maximum feasible participation” by the poor themselves, often were badly organized. The programs also created new struggles over jurisdiction in cities that already were notorious for divisive politics. Liberal efforts that predated the Great Society, such as school desegregation, only added to the tensions in cities.

The alarming increase in street crime in the late 1960s contributed to changing political attitudes. Even though African Americans and the poor were the chief victims of the increase, the issue was salient for conservative whites. Many tied the breakdown in order to the growth of the welfare state caused by the Great Society. The crime rate seemed to many to be nothing less than ingratitude on the part of the poor. James Sundquist wrote: “While increasing millions were supported by welfare, rising state and local taxes made the citizen more and more aware of who paid the bill. And while he armed himself for protection against thieves or militants, the liberals were trying to pass legislation to take away his guns.”<sup>153</sup>

The crime problem was an important element in both national and metropolitan politics. Polls taken in the late 1960s showed that half the women and a fifth of the men in the country were afraid to walk alone in their own neighborhoods at night.<sup>154</sup> In Alabama, Gov. George Wallace was drawing increased support from groups rooted in prejudice and resentment. The fear of crime also would be an important element in Richard Nixon’s 1968 campaign.

“Nixon Now”: 1968

With the nation divided over the war and domestic policy, the Democrats entered the 1968 campaign in an increasingly perilous state. In December 1967 Sen. Eugene McCarthy of Minnesota challenged President Johnson for the Democratic nomination, a campaign driven by McCarthy’s antiwar stance. McCarthy did unexpectedly well against Johnson’s write-in candidacy in the New Hampshire primary on March 12, 1968, drawing 41.9 percent of the vote to Johnson’s 49.6 percent. Seeing the president’s weakness, Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York declared his antiwar candidacy on March 16. Anticipating a devastating defeat in the upcoming Wisconsin primary, Johnson unexpectedly announced his withdrawal from the campaign in a televised address March 31.

Vice President Hubert Humphrey took Johnson’s place as the administration’s candidate. Humphrey, however, did not enter the primaries, which quickly turned into a duel between McCarthy and Kennedy. In April McCarthy won three primaries where Kennedy was only a write-in candidate. In May Kennedy won the Indiana and Nebraska primaries before losing Oregon to McCarthy. Appearing to gain the upper hand when he won in California on June 4, Kennedy was shot after making his acceptance speech in Los Angeles and died June 6. Kennedy’s death threw the Democratic Party into turmoil.

At the chaotic party convention in Chicago, a site Johnson had chosen for what he thought would be his renomination, Humphrey emerged as the Democratic Party’s candidate on the strength of endorsements from state party organizations. Although he did not participate in the party’s primaries (the last major party nominee to do so), the vice president took the nomination on the first ballot after Chicago Mayor Richard Daley committed the Illinois delegation to him. Humphrey won with support from the traditional elements of the Democratic coalition—labor, African Americans, urban voters—plus the backers of President Johnson. Humphrey appealed to many of the party's "moderates" on the issue of the Vietnam War.

Preliminary battles over rules and delegate seating, the representativeness of the party, and the Vietnam War caused ugly skirmishes on the convention floor. The party's platform eventually endorsed the administration's war policy, including bombing, but strong opposition to this plank left the Democrats divided.<sup>155</sup>

The real story of that convention, however, was outside the convention halls where demonstrations for civil rights and an end to the war met brutal rejection from the police. After three days of sometimes harsh verbal and physical battles with antiwar demonstrators in city parks, graphically broadcast on television and extensively reported in newspapers, the police charged a group of protesters who planned a march on the convention. Theodore H. White described the scene that played on national television:

Like a fist jolting, like a piston exploding from its chamber, comes a hurtling column of police from off Balbo into the intersection, and all things happen too fast: first the charge as the police wedge cleaves through the mob; then screams, whistles, confusion, people running off into Grant Park, across bridges, into hotel lobbies. And as the scene clears, there are little knots in the open clearing—police clubbing youngsters, police dragging youngsters, police rushing them by their elbows, their heels dragging, to patrol wagons, prodding recalcitrants who refuse to enter quietly.<sup>156</sup>

Humphrey and his running mate, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine, faced an uphill fight.

The Republicans united behind Richard Nixon, the 1960 nominee whose political career had seemed at an end after he lost the 1962 California gubernatorial election. The GOP did not have to deal with any of the divisiveness of the 1964 Goldwater-Rockefeller battle.

Nixon outspent Humphrey two-to-one. He also followed a carefully devised script that avoided the exhausting schedule of his 1960 campaign and capitalized on the national discontent created by the Vietnam War, urban riots, political assassinations, and popular concern about the speed of change wrought by the Great Society. Nixon traveled the high road in his own campaign by calling for the nation to unite and heal its wounds. Nixon's main offer was change. "I must say the man who helped us get into trouble is not the man to get us out."<sup>157</sup> Nixon gave few major addresses, preferring instead interviews with local newspapers and broadcasters.

As President Johnson resisted calls for a halt in the bombing of North Vietnam, Nixon said he had a "secret plan" to end the war. He appealed to weary Democrats with his pledge of an activist administration and alternative approaches to dealing with some of the problems the Great Society addressed. Nixon promised to give African Americans, in his words, "a piece of the action with a program to encourage entrepreneurial activity in cities." The "new Nixon" appeared willing to deal with the Soviet Union, which he had scorned earlier in his career. Meanwhile, his vice-presidential nominee, Gov. Spiro T. Agnew of Maryland, offered a slashing critique of the Democrats to middle-class and blue-collar Americans who resented the civil rights laws, government bureaucracy, Vietnam War protesters, and the young protest generation.

Alabama governor Wallace, heading up one of the strongest third-party campaigns in U.S. history, ran as an antiestablishment conservative, railing away at desegregation, crime, taxes, opponents of the war in Vietnam, social programs, and "pointy-head" bureaucrats and "intellectual morons." His American Independent Party, mainstream politicians feared, might win enough states to deny a majority to either Nixon or Humphrey, throwing the contest into the House where Wallace could have held the balance of power.<sup>158</sup>

Humphrey, however, made steady inroads into Nixon's support by disassociating himself from Johnson's Vietnam policies. Johnson on November 1 ordered a halt to all bombing of North Vietnam, but this change in policy was not enough to win the election for Humphrey.

The 1968 election was one of the closest in U.S. history. Nixon's victory was not confirmed until the day after the election when California, Ohio, and Illinois—each with close counts—finally went into the Nixon column. Nixon attracted 31.8 million votes (43.4 percent of all votes cast); Humphrey, 31.3 million votes (42.7 percent); and Wallace, 9.9 million votes (13.5 percent). Nixon won thirty-two states and 301 electoral votes, compared with Humphrey's thirteen states and 191 electoral votes. Nixon won six southern states (Wallace won five others), all of the West except Texas, Washington, and Hawaii, and all the midwestern states except Michigan and Minnesota. Humphrey won all of the East except New Hampshire, Vermont, New Jersey, and Delaware, plus West Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia.

The turmoil of 1968 transformed the nominating process. Democrats, in the aftermath of the chaos of their 1968 convention, adopted rules to make primaries the center of the nominating process. The Chicago convention, dominated by party professionals at the expense of many important constituencies—African Americans, women, youth—had nominated a candidate who did not compete in any primaries. The key reform was a limit on the number of delegates that state committees could choose—after 1968, no more than 10 percent of the delegation.

Nixon's Reelection: 1972

Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota was the miracle candidate of 1972, but his miracle did not last long enough. Maine Sen. Edmund Muskie, the vice-presidential nominee in 1968, was the early favorite to win the Democratic nomination.

No fewer than fifteen entered the race, twelve with serious hopes of winning or influencing the final selection. Some twenty-two primaries to choose 60 percent of the party's delegates—a third more than in 1968—were scheduled over four months. The marathon would be decided by accidents, media strategy, and a confusing array of voter choices that changed with each new development.

Muskie was badly damaged before the New Hampshire primary when he appeared to cry while lashing back at the Manchester Union Leader's strong and unrelenting attacks on his campaign and on his outspoken wife, Jane. Muskie won New Hampshire's primary with 46.4 percent of the vote, which was considered a "disappointing" showing. McGovern, the antiwar candidate, won 37.1 percent of the vote. Political pundits anointed him the real winner.

After New Hampshire, the Democrats battled through the summer. In the popular primary vote before the late summer California primary, McGovern actually stood in third place behind Wallace and Humphrey but delegate allocation rules gave him edge. McGovern had 560 delegates to Humphrey's 311. Wallace had 324 delegates, but he was paralyzed after being shot in a Maryland shopping center on May 15, 1972, essentially taking him out of contention.

The big McGovern-Humphrey showdown was California, which McGovern won by five percentage points. McGovern also won a majority of the delegates in New Jersey, South Dakota, and New Mexico on the last day of the primary season.<sup>159</sup>

After platform battles over welfare, busing, and the Vietnam War, McGovern won the nomination handily. But the unfocused organization of the conventions at the time, which parties in later years were to correct, prevented McGovern from delivering his acceptance speech—one of the best speech of his career—until almost three o'clock in the morning, when most television viewers already were in bed.

He selected Sen. Thomas Eagleton of Missouri as his running mate after several others declined. This was another public relations disaster. Rumors began circulating that Eagleton had been hospitalized for exhaustion in the early 1960s. Eagleton finally told the McGovern campaign that he had been hospitalized three times for nervous exhaustion and fatigue, and his treatment included electroshock therapy. Despite McGovern's public statement that he was "1,000 percent for Tom Eagleton, and I have no intention of dropping him," Eagleton left the ticket less than two weeks after his nomination. McGovern eventually replaced Eagleton with his sixth choice, R. Sargent Shriver, former executive of the Peace Corps and Office of Economic Opportunity. But the aura of confusion that surrounded the Eagleton affair and the search for a new vice-presidential candidate hurt the campaign badly. The columnist Tom Braden likened it to a school teacher who could not control the class: "Nice people, too. One looks back with sympathy and a sense of shame. But at the time—was it that they were too nice?—their classes were a shambles. The erasers flew when they turned their backs."<sup>160</sup>

President Nixon and Vice President Agnew were easily renominated and Nixon was in full command of the fall campaign. He paraded a litany of accomplishments—peace talks in Paris over the Vietnam War, a diplomatic opening to China, an arms limitation treaty with the Soviet Union, and a number of domestic initiatives.

Nixon won all but Massachusetts and the District of Columbia in the fall election. His popular vote margin was 47.2 million to McGovern's 29.2 million; the electoral college cast 520 votes for Nixon and only 17 for McGovern. Nixon's 60.7 percent share of the popular vote stood second only to Johnson's 61.1 percent in 1964.

On the surface, it appeared in 1972 that American politics was entering an age of calm consensus. At the time of the election, the economy was temporarily strong. Moreover, opposition to the Vietnam War had faded as the two sides negotiated in Paris to end the conflict, and the United States had signed an important nuclear arms treaty with the Soviet Union and had made important diplomatic moves with that country and the People's Republic of China. Nixon's landslide victory appeared to be a mandate and a vote of confidence.

But trouble loomed. The war in Vietnam continued, as did the antiwar protests, and generational cleavages remained. The economy experienced the first of many "shocks" in 1973 when the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) agreed to ban oil exports to the United States. The economic turmoil that resulted in the United States was topped off with a wage and price freeze. In addition, a warlike atmosphere existed between the White House and the media, as well as other individuals and organization that the administration, and Nixon himself, perceived as enemies. But none of these issues compared to the developing Watergate scandal. All of these tensions combined to create a dark side to U.S. politics in the 1970s.<sup>161</sup>

The Watergate affair, most observers thought, was the worst political scandal in U.S. history. For the first time, a president was forced to leave office before his term expired. President Nixon resigned on August 9, 1974, when it became apparent that the House of Representatives would impeach him for "high crimes and misdemeanors" and the Senate would convict him. In addition, a number of Nixon aides, including his first attorney general and campaign manager, John Mitchell, would spend time in jail because of the scandal.

At its simplest, the Watergate affair was a simple burglary, followed by a cover-up by President Nixon and his aides. In the summer of 1972, several employees of the Committee to Re-elect the President were arrested when breaking into and bugging the Democratic National Committee's offices at the posh Watergate complex in Washington. The break-in was not a major issue in the 1972 election, but the next year a Senate committee began an investigation of the entire affair.

During the investigation, a presidential aide revealed that Nixon had secretly taped Oval Office conversations with aides. These tapes became the center of the Watergate battle with Nixon resisting their release and investigators demanding them. Nixon did eventually hand over some of the tapes but not all. Then, in summer 1974, the Supreme Court ruled that Nixon had to surrender even more tapes, which indicated that he had played an active role in covering up the Watergate scandal. Nixon resigned the presidency when his impeachment and conviction appeared certain after he lost all semblance of Republican support in Congress. The impeachment articles charged him with obstruction of justice, abuse of presidential powers, and contempt of Congress.

Many scholars of the Watergate affair maintain that the illegal campaign activities were just part of a tapestry of illegal activities in the Nixon administration—including secretly bombing Cambodia, accepting millions of dollars in illegal campaign contributions, offering government favors in return for contributions, "laundering" money through third parties, wiretapping and burglarizing a wide variety of people thought to be unsupportive of the president, offering executive clemency to convicted campaign workers, engaging in "dirty tricks" to discredit other political figures, compromising criminal investigations by giving information to the people under scrutiny, and using government funds to renovate the president's private residence.<sup>162</sup>

In 1973 Nixon's vice president, Spiro Agnew, resigned after pleading "no contest" to charges of taking bribes while he was governor of Maryland. After Agnew's resignation on October 10, 1973, Nixon named House Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford, a longtime GOP stalwart, to become vice president under the Twenty-fifth Amendment. Ford, who had never entered a national election, then became president after Nixon's resignation and quickly attracted the support of the American public with his modest, earnest disposition. He responded to the widespread feeling that Nixon's isolation in the Oval Office had contributed to his downfall by promising to work closely with Congress and to meet with the press regularly.

One month after becoming president, however, Ford granted Nixon a full pardon for all crimes he may have committed while president. Ford testified before Congress that he believed Nixon had suffered enough and that the nation would have been badly torn if a former president were brought to court to face criminal charges. Critics asserted that Ford had made a "deal" in which Nixon resigned the presidency in exchange for the pardon.<sup>163</sup> Ford selected former New York governor Nelson Rockefeller to be his vice president. Rockefeller received Senate and House confirmation on December 10 and 19, respectively. Ford's pardon, which drew widespread public condemnation, was later seen as a significant factor in his loss in the presidential race of 1976, which was won by Georgia Gov. Jimmy Carter.

Election of "Jimmy Who?": 1976

With the benefit of the Watergate scandal and Ford's pardon of Nixon, the Democrats won resounding victories in the 1974 midterm elections. The Democrats gained fifty-two House seats and four Senate seats creating stronger majorities and reducing the number of members with allegiance to the old system of organizing congressional business.

The moralistic zeal of the "Watergate class" forced major changes on Congress as well as on the presidency and the nation's process of pluralistic political bargaining. The new crop of legislators was so large that it was able to undermine the seniority system that had ordered the way Congress had operated for years. The new system of committee assignments led to a proliferation of subcommittees on which most members had prominent roles. That, in turn, created a fragmented policymaking process—less susceptible to coercion by presidents and party leaders but more susceptible to interest group politics.<sup>164</sup>

Virtually unknown to the country at the outset of the campaign, former Georgia governor Jimmy Carter emerged from a field of candidates to win the Democratic nomination and the presidency. His casual and honest approach appealed to many voters.

The 1976 campaign was the first governed by campaign finance reform legislation enacted in 1971 and 1974. The Federal Election Campaign Act (FECA) of 1971 limited campaign expenditures and required disclosure of campaign receipts and expenditures. The Revenue Act of 1971 created a tax check-off that enabled taxpayers to allocate $1 of their taxes for public financing of elections. The FECA amendments of 1974 limited spending and donations for both primary and general election campaigns, established a system of partial public funding of elections, and created the Federal Election Commission to monitor campaign activities.

The Democrats and their eventual nominee, former Georgia governor Jimmy Carter, continued to exploit the nation's discontent through the 1976 election. Ronald Reagan, a former movie actor and California governor, added to the Republican Party's vulnerability by waging a stubborn primary campaign against President Ford.

The Democrats appeared headed for a long and bitter nomination struggle for the third time in a row. A few candidates—such as senators Henry Jackson of Washington and Birch Bayh of Indiana and Gov. George Wallace of Alabama—had greater stature than others, but their appeal was limited to specific factions of the Democratic coalition. Other candidates included Rep. Morris Udall of Arizona, Sen. Fred Harris of Oklahoma, Sen. Frank Church of Idaho, and Gov. Edmund G. “Jerry” Brown Jr. of California. Church and Brown entered the race late, and Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts awaited a draft in the event of a deadlocked convention.

The moderate Carter, whose name recognition in polls stood in single figures when the campaign began, executed a brilliant campaign strategy to win the nomination on the first ballot. Constructing strong organizations for the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary, Carter won both contests by slim margins. Although liberal candidates Udall and Bayh together polled more votes than Carter, it was Carter who received cover billings on national magazines and live interviews on morning television talk shows.<sup>165</sup> Within a matter of days, Carter went from long shot to front-runner. Carter had strong challenges from others in the remaining primaries but gathered ample delegates and endorsements by the time of the Democratic convention in New York for a first-ballot nomination.

The GOP was divided between Ford and Reagan. Ford won the early contests, but Reagan scored big wins in the North Carolina and Texas primaries. Reagan was put on the defensive with his proposals for transferring welfare obligations to the states, but when he focused on foreign policy he had success. For example, he attacked Ford for his policy of détente with the Soviet Union and his negotiation of a treaty that would forfeit U.S. control of the Panama Canal.

Carter emerged from the Democratic convention with a wide lead over Ford, but the race was too close to call by election day. A number of gaffes—such as an interview Carter gave to Playboy magazine, his ambiguous statements about abortion, and his confused observations on tax reform—hurt the Democratic contender.<sup>166</sup> Ford also gained in the polls when he began to use the patronage powers of the presidency and effectively contrasted his twenty-seven years of Washington experience to Carter's four years as governor of Georgia.

For the first time since 1960, the major candidates took part in televised debates. As the outsider, Carter helped himself by demonstrating a good grasp of national issues and by appealing to Democrats to vote the party line. Ford hurt himself with a claim that eastern European nations did not consider themselves to be under the control of the Soviet Union.<sup>167</sup> The remark was intended to be testimony to the Europeans' sense of national identity, but it was interpreted as evidence of the president's naiveté.

Carter's main advantage was regional pride. The Democrats had long since lost their hold over the South, but Carter gained widespread support as the first candidate nominated from the region on his own in more than a century. The Democratic Party's many factions—including such big city mayors as Richard Daley of Chicago and Abraham Beame of New York, civil rights activists, and organized labor—put on a rare display of unity.

Carter defeated Ford by a slim margin, winning 40.8 million votes (50.1 percent) to Ford's 39.1 million (48.0 percent). In the electoral college, 297 votes went to Carter, 240 to Ford. Carter won by pulling together the frazzled New Deal coalition of industrial and urban voters, African Americans, Jews, and southerners. Ford won the West, and Carter won the South, except Virginia. Ford won all the states from the Mississippi River westward except Texas and Hawaii, plus states in his native Midwest like Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, and Indiana. Ford also won Connecticut and the three northernmost New England states—New Hampshire, Vermont, and Maine.

Carter's Uncertain Leadership: 1980

After his election, President Carter's ability to hold the coalition together was limited. The growing influence of the mass media, the fragmenting effects of interest groups, poor relations with Congress, and difficult issues that cut across many different sectors—inflation and unemployment, long gasoline lines from restricted oil imports, and the more general energy crisis, the Iran crisis in which revolutionary militants seized the U.S. embassy and held Americans hostage for the remainder of Carter's term, relations with the Soviet Union, and budget austerity moves such as proposed cutbacks in water projects and social welfare—all damaged Carter's governing ability.

As the 1980 election approached, voters were poised to reject a president for the fourth time in a row including Ford's 1976 loss, Nixon's resignation, and Johnson withdrawal. Carter appeared to have lost all but his institutional strength: he controlled party processes, such as the primary schedule; he had access to key financial support and skilled political operatives; and he shaped much of the political agenda. But opponents were attacking from both wings: Massachusetts senator Kennedy on the left, and Ronald Reagan and others from the right. As a result, Carter was unable to forge a lasting consensus on important issues. Kennedy, however, was unable to develop campaign themes or to adequately answer questions about his personal conduct in the 1969 Chappaquiddick incident in which a woman died after a car he was driving went off a bridge.

Carter won the nomination on the first ballot despite a variety of stop-Carter efforts. But his campaign entered the fall contest as a wounded army unable to generate much enthusiasm from the troops.

The Republicans united early behind Reagan. By April 22, 1980, less than two months after the New Hampshire primary, six candidates had dropped out of the race, and George H. W. Bush, Reagan's only surviving competitor, was significantly behind in the delegate count. Reagan's campaign experienced an early scare when Bush beat Reagan in the Iowa caucuses, but Reagan rebounded, changed campaign managers and tactics, and won a string of primaries and caucuses. By the time of the convention, Reagan was the consensus candidate, and he improved party unity by adding Bush to the fall ticket.

Reagan called on the electorate to replace politics that he said was marked by "pastels," or compromising and uncertain policies, with "bold colors." Reagan's proposed bold strokes included a 30 percent reduction in marginal income tax rates based on a "supply-side" economic theory—which even Bush had said was a dangerous kind of "voodoo economics"—and massive increases in military expenditures. At the same time Reagan criticized Carter's alleged vacillation and his commitment to liberal policies.

President Carter, who was vulnerable as the hostage crisis neared its first anniversary (on November 4, election day) and high inflation and unemployment rates persisted, attempted to portray Reagan as a dangerous, heartless, and inexperienced amateur.

Carter strategists also were concerned about the independent candidacy of Rep. John B. Anderson of Illinois, a moderate who dropped out of the Republican race when it became clear that conservatives would dominate that party. After some stronger support in the polls, Anderson stood at about 10 percent for the final two months of the campaign. Carter was concerned that Anderson would take more votes from him than from Reagan, even though analysis of Anderson support suggested otherwise.<sup>168</sup> Polls before election day predicted a close race. Reagan, however, won all but six states and took the White House in an electoral landslide, 489 electoral votes to 49. Reagan won 51 percent of the vote, while Carter managed 41 percent and Anderson 7 percent. Even more surprising than Reagan's electoral landslide was the Republican takeover of the Senate. Newly formed conservative groups targeted several Senate liberals, creating the biggest Senate turnover since 1958. The Republicans now held the Senate by a 53–46 margin.

President Reagan was able to parlay his claims of an electoral mandate into wide-ranging changes in tax, budget, and military policies. Among other things, he won passage of a three-year, 25 percent cut in tax rates that would reduce federal revenues by $196 billion annually by the time the three-stage program was in place. He also secured omnibus legislation that cut the domestic budget by $140 billion over four years and increased defense spending by $181 billion over the same period. The media hailed Reagan as the most successful handler of Congress since Lyndon B. Johnson.

NEW CONSERVATIVE DISCOURSE

Ronald Reagan's rise ushered in a new period of conservatism in the American political discourse. The vigorous conservative campaigns for the presidency and Congress were accompanied by a host of new "think tanks" and publications with a restyled set of philosophical and policy pronouncements.

A celebrated event of the conservative revival was the publication in 1980 of George Gilder's Wealth and Poverty, a far-reaching attack on welfare state policies that rested on supply-side economic theory. Gilder argued that free markets and low taxes promoted not only economic efficiency and growth but also other benefits such as family strength and artistic creativity. Gilder's book was a central element of Reagan's campaign for major tax cuts.<sup>169</sup> But the supply-side arguments of Gilder and others were only the most visible signs of the conservative movement. Reagan's criticism of the Supreme Court decisions on abortion and school prayer helped to bring evangelical Christians into the political process. Businesses and conservative philanthropists, meanwhile, sponsored an unprecedented level of public policy research that shaped the debate of elections and government policy.<sup>170</sup>

Reagan's political appeal, according to scholar Garry Wills, turned on his ability to blend contradictory elements of American culture such as capitalism, conservatism, and individualism. While Reagan decried the decline of "traditional American values," for example, he extolled the dynamic economic system that demanded constant change. Wills wrote: "There are so many contradictions in this larger construct that one cannot risk entertaining serious challenge to any of its details. In Reagan, luckily, all these clashes are resolved. He is the ideal past, the successful present, the hopeful future all in one."<sup>171</sup>

Using the "bully pulpit" of the presidency, Reagan was able to overwhelm his opponents with his vision. When Democrats criticized specific Reagan policies, Reagan deflated them with expressions of disdain for "little men with loud voices [that] cry doom."<sup>172</sup> Jeane Kirkpatrick's depiction of Democrats as the "blame America first crowd" neatly expressed the way the Reagan rhetoric foreclosed debate on major policy issues such as the budget and trade deficits, military spending, the U.S. role in the third world, and U.S.-Soviet relations.

By the time the 1984 campaign took place, much of the nation had adopted Reagan's terms of debate. The Democratic candidate that year, Walter F. Mondale, in the first debate congratulated Reagan for restoring national pride and suggested not that Reagan should be ousted but rather that he be given a graceful retirement. Mondale's campaign was basically conservative: he did not propose a single new social program and called the federal budget deficit the nation's top problem.

Reagan's Landslide: 1984

Reagan's popularity dipped to 44 percent in 1983—about the average for modern presidents—but it rebounded when the economy later picked up.<sup>173</sup> As the 1984 election approached, Reagan faced no opposition from Republicans, but a large field of Democrats sought the right to oppose him in the fall.

The Democrats' early front-runner was former vice president Walter Mondale, who had accumulated a wide range of endorsements (AFL-CIO, National Education Association, United Mine Workers, and the National Organization for Women) and an impressive campaign treasury. The more conservative senator John Glenn of Ohio, the first American to orbit the earth, was considered a strong challenger. Other candidates included senators Gary Hart of Colorado, Alan Cranston of California, and Ernest Hollings of South Carolina, civil rights leader Jesse Jackson, former presidential candidate George McGovern, and former Florida governor Reubin Askew.

The early results eliminated all but Mondale, Hart, and Jackson just sixteen days after the New Hampshire primary. Hart became the serious challenger to Mondale when he finished second in Iowa and first in New Hampshire, creating substantial media coverage. After Mondale recovered, the two fought head-to-head until the convention. Jackson, the second African American to run for the presidency, stayed in the race to promote his liberal party agenda.<sup>174</sup>

After interviewing a wide range of candidates, Mondale selected Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro of New York as his running mate—the first woman ever to receive a major party nomination for national office. Ferraro's vice-presidential candidacy was plagued by controversy over her husband's questionable real estate, trusteeship, and tax practices and her stand on abortion. The controversies hindered the Democratic campaign's effort to articulate its vision for the nation.<sup>175</sup>

Mondale ran a generally conservative campaign, concentrating on a proposed tax increase to address the unprecedented budget deficit of more than $200 billion and proposing no new social programs. Mondale criticized Reagan's record on the arms race, but he did not outline basic disagreements on other foreign affairs issues. He charged that Reagan, the oldest president in history, was lazy and out of touch. Only late in the campaign, when his speeches became unabashedly liberal and combative, did Mondale create any excitement. He never was within ten percentage points of Reagan in the polls. Reagan's campaign was a series of rallies with masses of colorful balloons and confident talk about the United States "standing tall" in domestic and world affairs. Reagan was so sure of victory that he made a last-minute trip to Mondale's home state of Minnesota with the hope of completing a fifty-state sweep of the nation.

As it was, Reagan won forty-nine states, with two-to-one margins in eight states. Mondale won only the District of Columbia and his home state of Minnesota, where he beat Reagan by only two-tenths of a percentage point. In the popular vote, Reagan won 54.5 million votes (58.8 percent) to Mondale's 37.6 million (40.6 percent). In the electoral college, he received 525 votes to Mondale's 13 votes.

Reagan's two landslides and the conservative discourse of his administration led many experts to wonder if they were witnessing a "realignment"—a major shift in political alliances among a variety of social, economic, and ethnic groups.<sup>176</sup> The trend during the 1970s and 1980s appeared to be one of a Democratic hold on congressional and state elections and Republican dominance of presidential elections. Some experts pointed to the electorate's ticket-splitting tendencies as evidence of "dealignment"—a breakdown of the old system without development of an entirely new system.<sup>177</sup>

Bush's Ascendancy: 1988

The election of 1988 was the first after 1968 in which an incumbent president did not run. With no major figure and no major issues, the campaign was an usual affair. Fourteen candidates struggled to develop an identity with the voters, and the campaign lurched from one symbolic issue to the next, never developing the overarching themes of previous campaigns.

In the absence of any major new issues, and in a time of general peace and prosperity, Republican vice president George H.W. Bush won the presidency. Bush defeated Democratic Massachusetts governor Michael S. Dukakis by a margin of 54 percent to 46 percent—48.9 million votes to 41.8 million votes. Bush's electoral vote margin was more impressive, 426–111. A negative campaign and limited voter registration efforts resulted in the lowest voter turnout rate since the 1920 and 1924 race percentages of 49 percent of voting age citizens. Just a little more than 50 percent of those voters cast ballots for president in 1988.

Bush, benefiting from the Nixon-Reagan presidential coalition, won all the states of the old Confederacy, the entire West except Oregon and Washington, and several northern industrial states. Dukakis originally had hoped to crack the South by selecting a favorite son, Sen. Lloyd M. Bentsen Jr. of Texas, as his running mate, but that tactic failed. Dukakis lost crucial states that he had fought for to the end, such as California, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, and Missouri. He won New York, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Oregon, Washington, West Virginia, Iowa, Rhode Island, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia.

President Ronald Reagan's retirement after two full terms created a political void. Perhaps the most popular president since Dwight D. Eisenhower in the 1950s, Reagan's dominance of national politics left little room for other figures to establish presidential stature.

Reagan's fiscal and social policies reduced the possibility for candidates to offer ambitious new programs. The national government's huge budget deficits—which exceeded $200 billion, compared with about $73 billion in the last year of the Carter administration—checked any grandiose new spending plans. The Reagan debt had exceeded the debt of the previous thirty-eight presidents.

Reagan also had reshaped the dialogue on foreign affairs. He maintained strong opposition to the Soviet Union and other “Marxist” nations with his policies in Nicaragua, Afghanistan, and Angola. He also had projected an image of strength with military action in Libya and Grenada. At the same time, however, he had co-opted his critics by meeting with Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev several times and signing a nuclear arms control agreement. Reagan even asserted that the Gorbachev regime was fundamentally different from previous Soviet regimes, which he had called the “evil empire.”

The one issue that threatened Bush throughout 1988 was the Iran-contra scandal. Revelations that the Reagan administration had traded arms to Iran in exchange for the release of hostages held in Lebanon, then used the proceeds illegally to fund the war in Nicaragua, raised questions about Bush's role in the matter. Administration officials admitted lying to Congress, destroying evidence, and operating outside normal government channels; one top official even attempted suicide. The question of Bush's involvement in the affair, however, fizzled after months of inconclusive questioning.

Dukakis selected conservative senator Lloyd Bentsen of Texas as his running mate before the Atlanta Democratic convention. No Democrat had won the presidency without winning Texas since the state became part of the nation in 1845, a tradition that continued in 1988.

The July convention was a success for the Democrats. After a week of Bush-bashing and Democratic conciliation, Dukakis gave an effective acceptance speech peppered with statements in Spanish and Greek. Dukakis left the convention with a double-digit lead over Bush in the polls.

The Republican convention in August did not start out as well. Bush announced his vice-presidential selection, Sen. James Danforth “Dan” Quayle of Indiana, when he arrived in New Orleans. After revelations that Quayle had avoided military service in the Vietnam War by enlisting in the Indiana National Guard, many Republicans criticized Bush's choice. Some even said that Quayle might have to be dropped from the ticket.<sup>178</sup> By the end of the convention, however, the Republicans had weathered the storm. Bush delivered a crisp address, which provided the appealing self-portrait the vice president needed, and moved into the fall campaign for a close battle with Dukakis.

Bush took the offensive immediately after the August GOP convention and hit Dukakis as a “liberal” out of touch with American “values.” The Bush campaign's “Willie Horton” commercial—which told of a black prisoner raping a woman while out on a weekend release program—was particularly controversial. As Bush pounded away at these symbolic issues (effectively drowning out other major issues such as the national debt, trade deficit, housing, education, U.S.-Soviet relations, the environment, and ethics in government), Dukakis's “negative” ratings with voters soared. Roger Ailes, Bush's media adviser, admitted that the Bush camp knew it would have to define Dukakis. The Bush thus campaign spent its time “avoiding mistakes, staying on the attack, and giving them [media] pictures,” Ailes said.<sup>179</sup>

Not believing the attacks would affect his standing with undecided voters—and believing they might even hurt Bush—Dukakis did not respond forcefully to the frontal assault until October. By then, however, Bush had effectively defined Dukakis as a newcomer to national politics. Dukakis's counteroffensive in the last two weeks of the campaign came too late. As Dukakis fell behind Bush, his campaign pinned its hopes on two nationally televised debates. Dukakis performed well in the first debate, but Bush appeared to “win” the second debate. Dukakis failed to gain on Bush.

After months of inconsistent and confusing strategy, Dukakis finally developed a strong appeal in the last two weeks of the campaign. He told voters he was on their side and portrayed Bush as a toady to the wealthy. Dukakis said the middle class had been “squeezed” by the policies of the Reagan administration and that the Democrats would provide good jobs, affordable housing and health care, and tough enforcement of environmental protection laws.

But it was not enough. Bush, who had made a fortune in the oil business before entering politics and was the son of a former U.S. senator, persuaded more voters that his experience and values were what they wanted in the very personal choice of a president.

CLINTON ERA

In March 1991, in the aftermath of the U.S.-led victory over Iraq in the Persian Gulf War, President George H.W. Bush received the highest approval ratings since opinion polling began: around 90 percent of respondents said they approved of his performance as president. But just a year later, Bush was struggling to keep his job—and he failed.

Bill Clinton's victory over Bush in 1992 could have been viewed, on the one hand, as a dramatic shift in American politics. Touting his campaign slogan of "change," the forty-six-year-old Arkansas governor repeatedly blasted the Republican White House for its inattention to domestic problems such as the budget deficit, health care, welfare, civil rights, crime, trade, and economic investment. President Bush, Clinton said, was too obsessed with foreign policy and unconcerned with domestic affairs.

On the other hand, Clinton's election could have been viewed as an aberration. Only the second Democrat elected president since 1968, Clinton got only 43 percent of the vote in a three-candidate race. Voters said they voted against Bush, not for Clinton. The independent candidacy of Texas billionaire H. Ross Perot may have cost Bush the election, as much by tarnishing his reputation as by taking away the votes of the angry middle class. Even people who supported Clinton expressed reservations about his character. Voters reacted warily to reports of Clinton's avoidance of military service in Vietnam, marital infidelity, and conflicts of interest while governor, and to his evasiveness about smoking marijuana as a student. On policy questions, Clinton was well informed, but sometimes he appeared insincere. A label pinned on Clinton in Arkansas—"Slick Willie"—stuck.

President Bush began the election cycle looking unbeatable. Coasting on the apparent success of his leadership during the Gulf War, Bush appeared to have the strength to lead the United States into what he called the "new world order." In 1989 the countries of the so-called Soviet bloc—East Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Romania, Hungary—had broken from communist rule in a series of nonviolent revolutions. In August 1991 an attempted coup against Mikhail Gorbachev's "perestroika" government in the Soviet Union had failed. Afterward, the Soviet regime—Communist Party and all—had collapsed. The Bush presidency had overseen the most remarkable realignment of world politics since World War II.

Indeed, Bush took credit for presiding over the dramatic changes, but those American "victories" also undermined his position. The Republican Party had dominated recent presidential politics at least partly because of its hawkish policies during the cold war. With the end of the Soviet threat, the GOP no longer had a "gut" issue to use against the Democrats. Bush had a hard time adjusting.

Despite high polling numbers, President Bush faced serious challenges from the start. Despite three decades in public life, Bush had never conveyed a coherent identity or campaign theme. His advisers planned to "narrowcast" messages to selected groups until the summer, when Bush would deliver his big "what-I-stand-for" speech. But by that time, Bush's opponent had defined him as weak and unprincipled. His attempt to divert attention to Clinton's foibles only intensified Bush's image as uncertain of his own values and goals.<sup>180</sup>

By spring 1992 Bush's base had crumbled. The president had decided to "sit" on his high popularity ratings and win reelection by avoiding mistakes. Bush's chief of staff, John Sununu, summed up the strategy: "There's not another single piece of legislation that needs to be passed in the next two years for this president. In fact, if Congress wants to come together, adjourn, and leave, it's all right with us."<sup>181</sup> The results of this strategy were devastating. In May 1992 a poll found that 76 percent of the public disapproved of the way Bush was handling the economy.<sup>182</sup> His overall approval rating dropped an unprecedented 57 percentage points from the end of the Gulf War to the beginning of the 1992 GOP convention.

A bitter anti-incumbent mood dominated the new campaign year. Nationwide, reformers promoted the idea of term limits for elected officials as a way to sweep out career politicians.<sup>183</sup> Perot, who had parlayed his wealth into a number of headline-grabbing exploits over the years, became a viable independent candidate.<sup>184</sup> His pithy statements about how to “fix” government captured the imagination of the public.

Pennsylvania voters sent a warning shot to the White House when they rejected the 1991 Senate candidacy of Bush's friend and first attorney general, Richard Thornburgh. Democrat Harris Wofford, appointed to the seat that had opened with the death of Sen. John Heinz in April 1991, won on a platform of national health care and a return to domestic priorities—themes that Clinton reprised in 1992.

Bush's major domestic initiative—the budget law passed in October 1990—angered the Republican Party's right wing. Conservatives had long distrusted Bush because of his past moderate positions on taxes, abortion, civil rights, and social programs. The budget act, which increased taxes by $150 billion, broke the pledge of “no new taxes” that Bush had taken in the 1988 presidential campaign.

As the recession and other domestic crises deepened, the president seemed increasingly out of touch. Bush's reported confusion over the use of bar codes at a grocery store symbolized his elite background and isolation. After race riots in Los Angeles drew the nation's attention to the severity of poverty, Bush was photographed teaching baffled-looking urban youths how to use a fishing pole. In a political environment couched in symbolism, these images did not help the candidate.

Bush had begun his term with less party support than any president in history—the Democrats controlled the Senate by ten seats and the House by eighty-five seats. As a result, Bush's legislative initiatives were routinely labeled “dead on arrival.” In 1989, for the first time, the Senate rejected an incoming president's cabinet nominee when it voted down former senator John G. Tower's bid to be secretary of defense. In his dealings with Capitol Hill, Bush had vacillated between confrontation and compromise. In fact, Bush regularly tussled with Congress, vetoing forty-four bills between 1989 and 1992.

Three-Way Race: 1992

The Democratic field grew slowly. Besides Clinton, the field included former Massachusetts senator Paul E. Tsongas,

Independent H. Ross Perot mounted his 1992 campaign for presidency by relying on his own money and appearing on television talk shows, such as here with Larry King.

former governor Edmund G. “Jerry” Brown Jr. of California, senators Thomas Harkin of Iowa and Robert Kerrey of Nebraska, and Gov. L. Douglas Wilder of Virginia. Wilder dropped out, however, before the first contest and others faded in the March primaries. Clinton won the “invisible primaries” before the formal balloting began; he attracted $3.3 million in contributions by the end of 1991.<sup>185</sup>

By calling himself a “new Democrat,” Clinton hoped to separate himself from some of the rejected Democratic candidates of the past: Jimmy Carter, Walter Mondale, and Michael Dukakis. In keeping with this strategy, Clinton promised to move beyond liberal orthodoxy and “reinvent government.”<sup>186</sup> His record in Arkansas suggested a willingness to oppose liberal nostrums on issues such as the death penalty, economic growth, and public education.

The centerpiece of Clinton's strategy was to appeal to the “forgotten middle class.” Suburbanites, the working class, and southerners and westerners had abandoned the Democratic Party since the late 1960s. Unfortunately for the Democrats, these groups composed a growing part of the electorate. In fact, many pundits argued that these groups gave the Republicans a “lock” on the presidency.<sup>187</sup> Clinton's goal, then, was to forge a new ideological center and “pick” the lock.

Clinton led the polling before the New Hampshire primary until he ran into trouble when the media questioned his character. A woman claimed that she and Clinton had had an affair, and Clinton was reported to have misled an Army Reserves recruiter as part of a scheme to avoid service in Vietnam. But Clinton hit back. Appearing on the television news magazine 60 Minutes after the January 1992 Super Bowl game, Clinton admitted he had “caused pain” in his marriage but said he and his wife had solved their problems. Hillary Clinton’s appearance with her husband seemed to close the matter.

Tsongas and Brown won the occasional contest after New Hampshire, but Clinton rolled to the nomination starting with his March 3 victory in the Georgia primary. Clinton’s sweep of southern states on “Super Tuesday,” March 10, and his decisive wins in Michigan and Illinois on March 17 practically clinched the nomination.

Clinton won thirty-one state primaries with 51.8 percent of the vote; Tsongas, four states with 18.1 percent; and Brown, two states with 20.1 percent.<sup>188</sup> Democratic leaders nevertheless searched for an alternative, worried about Clinton’s ability to confront the character issue. In March almost half the Democratic voters in Connecticut’s primary said Clinton lacked the “honesty or integrity” to be president.<sup>189</sup> Party professionals, however, became resigned to Clinton’s nomination.

President Bush faced an unusually pointed challenge from conservative columnist and former White House aide Patrick J. Buchanan, who charged that Bush had betrayed the conservative faith. His main point of attack was the 1990 tax increase. Although in the end Bush won New Hampshire, the media focused on the 37 percent of the vote that the underdog Buchanan received. But Buchanan thereafter never matched his New Hampshire numbers.

The campaign of the Texas billionaire, H. Ross Perot, unsettled Republicans’ plans to build on their base in the South and West. Perot’s folksy antigovernment rhetoric appealed to voters in the suburbs and high-growth areas of the 1980s—the heart of the GOP base since Richard Nixon’s 1968 campaign. Perot waged an aggressive campaign on the television talk show circuit and said he would spend up to $100 million of his own money. But as his unofficial campaign progressed, the media raised doubts about his background and grasp of government. By summer more people viewed Perot unfavorably than favorably.

Perot dropped out of the campaign before he had a chance to announce his entry formally. He pointed out that Clinton’s selection of well-respected Gore as his running mate indicated that the Democrats were “getting their act together.” He also recognized that his campaign might split the vote badly and send the election into the House of Representatives.

Perot resumed his campaign in the fall, blaming his temporary exit on a Republican “dirty tricks” effort to smear his family. By then the critical reporting had faded. But it was too late for Perot because his erratic behavior had driven away supporters and curious voters alike.

Even though Perot had no real chance to win, his campaign was significant. He spent $60 million of his money, mostly to purchase half-hour television advertisements. Some of the ads, dubbed “infomercials,” won critical acclaim for their plain talk about the dangers of the federal budget deficit. Perot’s bluntness lent credibility to his relentless attacks on Bush.

The communications revolution changed the way the candidates reached voters as candidates appeared in settings once considered undignified for potential presidents. Television talk shows provided a way for candidates to bypass the establishment media. The blurred lines between news and entertainment were perhaps most evident on cable television in the rock music MTV channel’s ongoing coverage of the presidential campaign. New outlets were especially important for candidates facing credibility problems in mainstream media (Clinton) and for the insurgents (Perot and Brown).

Clinton parroted Perot’s rhetoric about the evils of special-interest influence in Washington and promised reforms of the campaign finance system. Clinton, however, also raised money aggressively. The Democrats raised $71 million in 1992, $9 million more than the Republicans.<sup>190</sup> Clinton’s selection of moderate senator Gore of Tennessee as a running mate was central to his fall strategy. Gore’s service in Vietnam and military expertise countered Clinton’s suspect status in foreign policy. Moreover, Gore’s Washington experience going back to 1976 helped Clinton to compensate for his lack of federal government experience. Finally, Gore’s reputation as an intellectual—he wrote an acclaimed book about the environment in 1992<sup>191</sup>—contrasted with Vice President Dan Quayle’s lightweight reputation.

The Republican convention in Houston was a turning point in the campaign. Strategists decided to shore up Bush’s right-wing support and raise doubts about Clinton’s character. The party’s platform committee was dominated by the right-wing Christian Coalition. Speeches by Patrick Buchanan, Pat Robertson, and Marilyn Quayle, questioning the Democrats’ patriotism and arguing for a rollback of civil liberties, played badly. Bush’s lost convention opportunity was apparent in the meager 3 percentage point “bounce” in poll support, compared with Clinton’s 17 to 20 percent increase after the Democratic convention.<sup>192</sup>

Clinton ran a sophisticated general election campaign, coordinated from the “war room” in Little Rock by strategists, led by James Carville, who choreographed every aspect of the campaign, from television commercials to talk show appearances to speechwriting to the bus tours of small towns. The campaign professionals were especially adept at answering charges from the opposition. When Bush attacked, Clintonites issued instant, detailed responses. The quick response prevented Bush’s charges from dominating the news cycle.

The Bush-Quayle fall campaign was erratic. Early on, it focused on “family values,” critiquing the Democrats as elitists out of touch with ordinary people. Then Bush used the powers of incumbency by announcing billions of dollars in grants to different states. All along, Bush criticized Clinton's character and experience. But the personal attacks often appeared shrill; at one point, he called Clinton and Gore "bozos" and said "my dog Millie" would be better at foreign policy than they. Bush criticized Clinton's visit to the Soviet Union as a student and suggested that he wanted to import British-style socialism to the United States.

Bush's credibility came under fire in the campaign's final days when a special prosecutor indicted former defense secretary Caspar Weinberger and released a memorandum that indicated Bush had participated in the arms for hostages scandal—the Iran-contra affair—much more actively than he had acknowledged.

The Clinton-Gore ticket gave the Democrats a solid base in the border states on which to build. With Arkansas and Tennessee in the Democratic camp, the Democrats built outward into the old Confederacy (Georgia, Louisiana, Kentucky), north into the industrial states (Illinois, Michigan, Ohio), and west and north into the farm states (Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin). The Democrats had consistently lost those states in presidential elections in the past generation, despite strong support in congressional and statewide races. The Democrats also built on their core of support in the Northeast (winning all the states from Maine to West Virginia) and capitalized on disgruntlement with Bush in the West (California, Colorado, Hawaii, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, and Washington went for Clinton). That was enough to "pick" the Republican "lock" on the electoral college.

Clinton took only 43 percent of the popular vote but garnered 370 electoral votes. This compared with Bush's 38 percent of the popular vote and 168 electoral votes. Perot's 19 percent share of the vote was the largest percentage a third party had won since 1912, but he did not win any electoral votes. The hard anti-incumbent mood of the electorate, stoked by Perot, helped to produce the highest voter turnout rate since 1960. Some 55 percent of voting-age citizens participated in the election.

Clinton's Reelection: 1996

In 1994 many voters sent a strong message of disapproval with President Clinton's record by electing a Republican Congress. That dramatic event led many political analysts to conclude that Clinton would be a one-term president but they did not anticipate that the new GOP Congress, led prominently by controversial House Speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia, would incorrectly interpret the 1994 election results as a mandate for their conservative ideological agenda and then push for substantial—and unpopular—policy reform. This miscalculation provided President Clinton with a new opportunity to redefine himself and to rehabilitate his political future.

President Bill Clinton and Vice President Al Gore accept their renomination at the Democratic National Convention in August 1996. In the general election Clinton became the first Democratic president reelected to a second term since Franklin Roosevelt in 1936.

While the Republicans strove aggressively for conservative policy change, Clinton adopted more moderate positions and portrayed himself as a check against the "extremism" of the GOP agenda. That tack proved successful by the end of 1995. With the president and Republican legislators feuding over spending priorities, Congress failed to pass a budget in time to avoid two temporary government shutdowns. As the impasse persisted, the Republican Congress began to get the blame from voters, and the president benefited from the comparison. This budgetary standoff against Congress was perhaps the single most important event to Clinton's political rehabilitation.

The president entered the 1996 election season with renewed political strength and high approval ratings. In addition to the political miscalculations of the majority in Congress, Clinton benefited from a strengthening economy. In addition, he did not face a challenge for renomination, while the GOP nomination contest was an expensive, highly negative, and divisive process.

From the beginning Senate Majority Leader Robert J. "Bob" Dole of Kansas was the clear front-runner for the Republican Party's nomination. He had the broadest party support of any announced candidate, the most prominent endorsements, and the best grassroots campaign organization. Although there never was any serious doubt that he would be the Republican nominee, for several months Dole had to fight off a large group of presidential contenders.

Dole's eventual nomination—even after losing the traditionally crucial battleground primary in New Hampshire to television commentator Pat Buchanan—did not ensure a united Republican Party to challenge the president. Although Dole had long supported the antiabortion stance of many in his party, social conservatives who made up a crucial bloc of the Republican vote were not convinced of his commitment to their cause while party moderates worried that Dole would allow the Christian right to force his campaign to adopt positions enabling Democrats to once again capitalize on the “extremism” charge.<sup>193</sup>

Even after his nomination was ensured, Dole’s campaign failed for weeks to capture the public’s attention. In part he appeared too much a part of the GOP agenda in Congress that Democrats had successfully defined as harshly conservative. Dole in June resigned from the Senate to campaign full time for the presidency.

At his nominating convention in San Diego, Dole performed a tough balancing act in keeping warring moderates and social conservatives from dividing the party. Dole especially sought to avoid the kind of negative publicity that had surrounded “family values night” at the 1992 GOP convention in Houston.<sup>194</sup> The Republicans struck an awkward compromise: although the party platform was conservative and kept the antiabortion plank, the convention that the country saw on television was moderate in tone and did not feature prime-time addresses by controversial figures such as Buchanan and television evangelist Pat Robertson.

Throughout the campaign season, Clinton often seemed to be running against the unpopular Gingrich and the Republican Congress more than he was taking on Dole. What made Clinton’s campaign so strong, in part, was his governing strategy of what one key aide called “triangulation”: that is, separating himself from the unpopular elements of both political parties and establishing a less partisan identity at the center of the political spectrum. To achieve that end, Clinton adopted a number of policy initiatives that were conservative, but also largely popular. He signed a welfare reform bill that liberals in his party opposed, pushed for imposition of a V-chip in televisions to allow parents to screen program content for children and for a television program rating system, proposed a balanced budget by the year 2002, and extolled his record in reducing the federal budget deficit. Clinton also stayed true to his Democratic roots by opposing congressional efforts to reduce Medicare spending and weaken environmental regulation and by proposing new government programs to make college education more affordable.

Clinton’s strategy was effective. He took away from Dole’s campaign a number of issues that usually help Republican presidential candidates, such as welfare reform, deficit reduction, and family values. He kept his Democratic base by positioning himself as the only viable check against the “extremism” of the Republican Congress.

Billionaire Perot, who ran again under the Reform Party banner, also benefited somewhat from the negative

Clinton press. Although he had never been a serious factor in 1996 as he had been as an independent candidate in 1992—and as a result was excluded from the presidential debates—Perot’s support increased by several percentage points in the late polls. But in the end, Perot had little impact on the elections. Because of a perceived strong economy and a substantial reduction in the federal debt, the public frustration with the two major parties that had given growth to Perot’s candidacy in 1992 simply did not exist in 1996.

Clinton easily won reelection with 49.2 percent of the popular vote and 379 electoral votes to Dole’s 40.7 percent and 159 electoral votes. Reform Party candidate Perot polled 8.4 percent of the vote, less than half of his 1992 total, and once again received no electoral votes.<sup>195</sup> Clinton’s victory made him the first Democrat to win reelection since Franklin D. Roosevelt won his second term in 1936. He became the first Democrat to be elected to the presidency along with a Republican-controlled Congress. Clinton won every state he had captured in 1992, except for Georgia, Montana, and Colorado. However, he picked up Florida and Arizona—becoming the first Democratic presidential candidate to win Florida since 1976 and first to win Arizona since 1948. The so-called gender gap was key to Clinton’s victory: while the male vote was evenly split between the two candidates, Clinton won the female vote by 16 percent, the largest margin ever. Clinton also beat Dole among every age group and was the clear choice of minorities: he received 80 percent of the black vote and 70 percent of the Hispanic vote.<sup>196</sup>

Yet three facts remained discouraging for Clinton. First, for the second straight election he had failed to win a majority of the popular vote. Second, voter turnout was less than 50 percent, the lowest since 1924. Third, Democrats failed to regain control of Congress, despite the unpopularity of Gingrich and many of his Republican colleagues. Given this scenario, it was difficult for the president to credibly claim that he had achieved any kind of mandate from the American people.

Perhaps most remarkable in 1996 was how little had changed despite expenditures of about $500 million by the two major parties. Political analysts referred to the 1996 elections as reaffirming the status quo, an important difference from both the 1992 and 1994 elections in which voters expressed frustration with the existing political arrangement and sought substantial changes in their government.

NEW CENTURY, OLD PARTISANSHIP

The last presidential election of the twentieth century, the closest in forty years, brought the nation to the brink of a constitutional crisis that was narrowly averted only after an unprecedented thirty-six days of rancorous arguing and litigation over who won, Democrat Al Gore or Republican

George W. Bush. The eventual outcome, with Texas governor Bush the official winner, did little to unite the electorate, which had split a hundred million votes almost evenly between the two major party candidates.

Although Gore, the departing vice president, clearly won the national popular vote in the 2000 race by more than a half-million votes, Bush claimed the 25 electoral votes of Florida, where the election had been extremely close. Ultimately the state certified Bush as the popular vote winner in Florida, raising the GOP candidate's nationwide electoral vote total to 271, one more than he needed to win. Gore unsuccessfully contested the election on grounds that the state had stopped the recounts prematurely, leaving thousands of machine-processed ballots not subjected to the scrutiny of human eyes in a hand recount.

In the end, a sharply divided U.S. Supreme Court halted the Florida count, effectively deciding the election in Bush's favor. It was the first time the Court had taken up a disputed presidential election. In a historic election studded with anomalies, "firsts," and ironies, the Court for the first time immediately released audio tapes of its hearings on the suit.

The tumult focused new attention on proposals to abolish or reform the electoral college system. It brought to light the need to modernize the problem-prone voting systems still in use in many states besides Florida. It also exposed serious flaws in the technology that broadcast media rely on to project election results minutes after the polls have closed. Repercussions of the event would be felt for many years to come.

Bush's victory marked the fourth time in U.S. history that the popular vote loser gained the presidency. The first such election, in 1824, was won by John Quincy Adams, who, like Bush (son of former president George H. W. Bush), was the son of a president, John Adams. Although Andrew Jackson won the 1824 popular vote, none of the four candidates received the required electoral vote majority and the House of Representatives decided the election in Adams's favor. All four candidates represented factions of the Democratic-Republican Party. In an 1828 rematch with Adams, Jackson won the presidency under the banner that became the modern day Democratic Party. (See "Last of the Old Order: 1824," p. 279.)

The second contested presidential election, in 1876, was more analogous to the Bush-Gore dispute in that it too involved charges of irregularities in the election process. New York Democrat Samuel J. Tilden won the national vote against Ohio Republican Rutherford B. Hayes, but controversies over the popular votes in three southern states, including Florida, led to rival sets of electoral vote results being sent to Congress from the three states. Lacking a procedure for resolving the dispute, Congress formed a bipartisan special commission, including Supreme Court justices, that gave the votes to Hayes in return for concessions to the South. Hayes thereby won the presidency by a single electoral vote, a margin only one vote lower than Bush's. (See "Compromise: 1876," p. 296.)

In 1887 Congress enacted the Electoral Vote Count Act, specifying procedures for settling electoral vote disputes. One year later Republican Benjamin Harrison won the 1888 presidential election even though Democrat Grover Cleveland received more popular votes. The 1887 act did not come into play, however, because Harrison decisively won the electoral college vote, 233 to 168. (See "The Republican Recovery: 1888," p. 301; and Chapter 17, The Electoral College.)

Had the Supreme Court not intervened in 2000, it was conceivable that Florida might have sent competing sets of electors' votes to Congress. Although that did not happen, the rules of the 1887 act thwarted efforts by some House members to challenge Florida's electoral votes. In one of the ironies of the election, it fell to Gore as Senate president to reject his supporters' objections.

Favorites Win Nomination

From the outset, the election was Gore's to lose. It is almost axiomatic that the party in power retains the White House in times of peace and prosperity. Gore stood to inherit the advantage of running on Clinton's successes, especially an economy that had gone from record federal deficits to record surpluses, which opened the prospect of retiring the $3.7 trillion national debt while safeguarding popular but expensive social programs. Clinton could also claim legislative successes in welfare reform and the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) as well as foreign policy efforts in Bosnia, Kosovo, Northern Ireland, and the Middle East.

Despite his high job approval ratings, Clinton himself was a handicap for Gore. Republicans tried to tie Gore closely to the GOP's view of Clinton administration shortcomings, particularly Clinton's December 1998 impeachment for lying under oath about his affair with White House intern Monica Lewinsky. The Republicans' strategy was to run against "Clinton-Gore" rather than against Gore alone.

The 2000 primary season was lackluster, dominated by Gore for the Democrats and Bush for the Republicans. Both locked up their nominations early. Gore had to face a strong nomination challenge from former New Jersey senator Bill Bradley. Bradley, failing to win a single primary in the opening round, dropped out of the race in early March.

Gore's need to distance himself from Clinton's indiscretions was implicit in his choice of Joseph I. Lieberman as his running mate. An Orthodox Jew, the first of his faith to run on a major party ticket, Lieberman was known for speaking out on moral issues and family values. Although he voted in the Senate to acquit Clinton, Lieberman had publicly taken the president to task for his dalliance with Lewinsky.

Bush entered the race in early 1999 and quickly established himself as the favorite of the Republican establishment and its campaign donors. Without a sitting Democratic president to compete against, the contest attracted a dozen hopefuls for the GOP nomination, but even before the kickoff Iowa caucuses in January 2000 half of the field dropped out.

By early February, Bush, publisher Malcolm S. “Steve” Forbes Jr., and Sen. John McCain of Arizona remained the only serious contenders. Forbes, who finished third in New Hampshire, ended his campaign after a less impressive showing in Delaware. McCain was perceived as a moderate despite a solid conservative voting record in the Senate. This, and his penchant for bluntness, appealed to many non-Republicans, who could vote in the growing number of open or semi-open GOP primaries. McCain upset Bush in the New Hampshire and Michigan primaries, but Bush went on to win a cluster of March 7 primaries. In all, McCain defeated Bush in seven of the eighteen primaries he entered, but Bush won enough convention delegates to clinch the nomination in March. Bush chose Richard B. Cheney, the former representative from Wyoming and defense secretary under Bush’s father, for his running mate.

The Green Party candidate, consumer advocate Ralph Nader, threatened to take votes from Democrats. He received almost 1 percent of the presidential vote in 1996 and was aiming for 5 percent in 2000.

With polls continuing to show the electorate almost evenly divided, the major party race settled down to basically a personality contest between two Ivy Leaguers—Gore (Harvard) and Bush (Yale). The public perceived Bush as personable but perhaps not so intelligent as Gore, despite Bush’s master’s degree from Harvard’s business school.

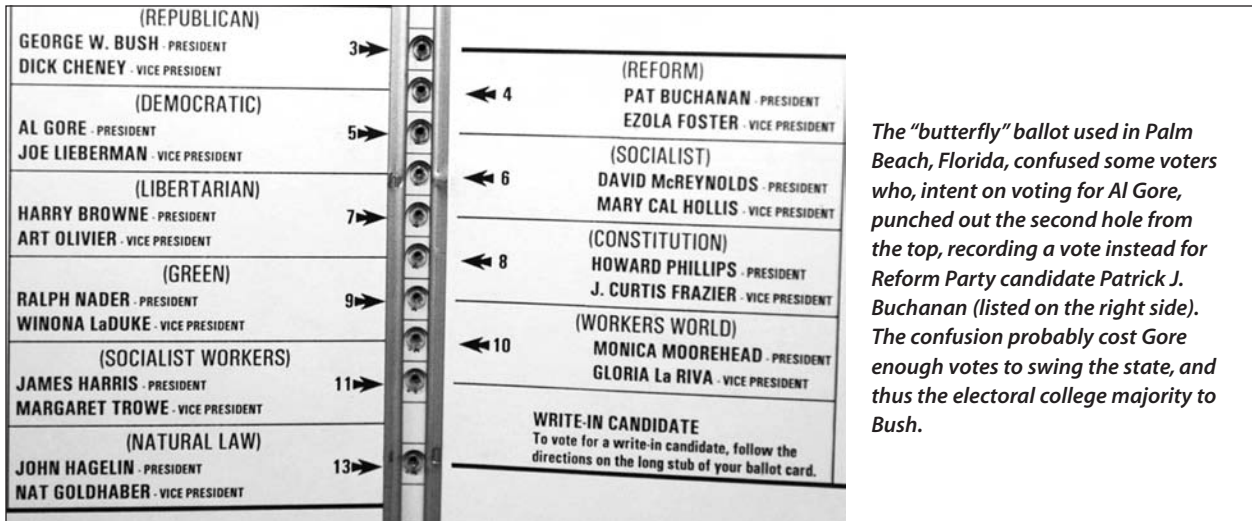

Gore’s primary asset was his experience, sixteen years in Congress and eight years in the vice presidency, against Bush’s six years as Texas governor. But being vice president was no guarantee of success. Only four sitting vice presidents, including Bush’s father in 1988, had been elected president.

With the cold war over and much of the electorate economically better off than they were eight years earlier, traditionally Democratic pocketbook and social issues dominated the campaign—Social Security, education, health care, abortion rights, and gun control. The huge federal surpluses fueled the money issues, with Bush pushing for tax cuts and heavier outlays for antimissile research and development.

Some Gore supporters thought the vice president distanced himself too much from Clinton, thereby sacrificing the opportunity to share credit for the booming economy and other positive aspects of the Clinton legacy. Clinton himself was said to feel “underused” by the Gore campaign. By the final weeks of the campaign Gore became less reluctant to run on Clinton’s record, but it was too late to make much of an impression on undecided voters.

Cliff-Hanger Election: 2000

The election had been expected to be close. Bush and Gore ran neck-and-neck in public opinion polls, right up to election day. Problems with the crucial Florida vote erupted almost immediately on election day November 7, 2000. Voters in Palm Beach County reported difficulties with an unusual “butterfly” punch-card ballot. Some Democratic voters there thought that they had inadvertently voted for Reform Party nominee Pat Buchanan instead of for Gore. In some of the other twenty-four counties using outmoded punch-card systems, but with regular ballot forms, voters said they were unable to punch out the hole for the candidate of their choice.

Within hours, as news of the problems spread, people around the world became familiar with the obscure noun chad, singular or plural, meaning the tiny piece of paper that is pushed out in a punch-card system. If the chad is only dented (dimpled) or partially dislodged, the voting machine may not register the punch as a vote. Therein lay the basis for much of the contention in the days and weeks that were to follow.

Besides leading nationwide in the popular vote, Gore outside of Florida led in the electoral college vote, 267 to 246 (after the counting of the absentee vote in Oregon and New Mexico concluded several days later). The entire 2000 presidential election therefore hung on the final results of the popular vote in Florida, which would determine the winner of the state's twenty-five electoral votes.

The close election triggered an automatic machine recount, showing Bush ahead by about 300 votes in Florida. But the Gore camp focused on the thousands of votes that the machines rejected as under-voted, showing no vote for president, or over-voted, showing more than one vote for presidential candidates. Only a manual count of those ballots could discern votes that the machines could not detect, Gore lawyers argued."

In what may have been a tactical mistake, Gore did not request an immediate statewide revote or recount. Instead his lawyers fought to keep hand counts going where Gore was picking up votes, in mostly Democratic counties such as Broward, Miami-Dade, and Volusia, and in Palm Beach County where the butterfly-ballot had recorded an unlikely 3,407 votes for Pat Buchanan, three times more than he received elsewhere in the state. Buchanan himself said it appeared he received votes meant for Gore. Just as fiercely, the Bush forces fought to stop the hand counts. They argued that the votes had been legally counted and recounted, including military and other absentee ballots that favored Bush, and that the canvassers had no uniform standards for gauging the difference between a vote and a nonvote on a punch-card ballot. Allowing more time for recounts, they said, would be changing the rules after the game started.

During the weeks of contentious legal maneuvering over the Florida vote, partisan tempers flared throughout the United States. Large groups of demonstrators in Florida and Washington, D.C., shouted at the television cameras and waved signs supporting Bush and his vice-presidential choice, Cheney, or Gore and his running mate, Lieberman.

But it was a race against the calendar, and Katherine Harris was the timekeeper. Harris, Florida's secretary of state and former cochair of Bush's campaign in the state, announced November 13 that counties had until the following day, the date set in state law, to submit their returns, without any manual recount figures. Lawsuits stayed Harris's hand, however, and the manual counts proceeded by fits and starts until Sunday, November 26, under an extension granted by the seven-member Florida supreme court, made up mostly of Democratic appointees. That evening Harris ceremoniously "certified" Bush as the Florida winner by 537 votes out of six million cast.

The battle was by no means over, however. Gore formally contested the election and Bush meanwhile protested the deadline extension to the U.S. Supreme Court, which heard the arguments December 1. In Tallahassee, after hearing two days of televised testimony, Leon County Circuit Judge N. Sanders Sauls ruled that Gore failed to prove the need for manual recounts. Gore's witnesses had testified that "chad buildup" and poorly maintained equipment could prevent voters from cleanly punching out a machine-read ballot. Gore received another setback the same day, December 4, when the U.S. Supreme Court returned the deadline-extension case to the Florida high court for clarification.

COUNTDOWN IN FLORIDA

The following is a day-by-day chronology of the events surrounding the disputed presidential election results from Florida in the 2000 race between Republican George W. Bush and Democrat Al Gore.

November 7, 2000. Election in Florida too close to call, with Bush holding narrow lead. TV networks retract premature reports declaring Gore winner of state's twenty-five electoral votes.

November 8–10. Gore calls Bush to concede early November 8 then calls back to withdraw concession. Gore seeks hand recounts in four largely Democratic counties. Bush has unofficial 1,784-vote lead November 9. After all but one of Florida's sixty-seven counties complete machine recount required by state law, Bush lead falls to 327 votes.

November 11–14. Broward, Miami-Dade, Palm Beach, and Volusia counties undertake manual recounts requested by Gore; federal court on November 13 rejects Bush bid to block hand counts; Volusia finishes recount November 14.

November 13. Florida secretary of state Katherine Harris says she will enforce state law deadline of November 14 for counties to submit returns and will not include manual recounts; election boards in Volusia and Palm Beach counties ask state court judge to overturn deadline.

November 14–16. Leon County Circuit Judge Terry P. Lewis says Harris must justify her position on deadline; Harris reaffirms decision November 15; Lewis hears new round of arguments November 16.

November 17. Lewis upholds Harris's decision to disregard manual recounts, but Florida supreme court bars certification of state results pending oral arguments on November 20; federal appeals court rejects Bush suit over manual recounts.

November 18. Bush lead grows to 930 votes with absentee ballots; Bush campaign criticizes Democrats for challenging absentee votes from military.

November 21. Florida supreme court rules manual recounts must be included in presidential race if submitted to Harris by 5:00 p.m., Sunday, November 26.

November 22–24. Bush running mate Richard B. Cheney has heart attack, leaves Washington hospital two days later after surgery to insert stent in artery. Shouting, fist-waving crowd, including Republican congressional aides, tries to enter private room where recounts resume in Miami-Dade. County stops recount, pleading too little time and denying intimidation by the demonstrators. State supreme court on November 23 rejects Gore suit to force Miami-Dade to resume counting. U.S. Supreme Court agrees to hear Bush appeal of Florida supreme court action allowing extended deadline for certifying presidential race.

November 25–26. Manual recounts: Broward finishes November 25; Palm Beach falls just short of completion November 26. Harris announces November 26 that state elections canvassing board certifies Bush as winner by 537-vote margin; Bush claims victory, says he and Cheney are "honored and humbled" to have won Florida's electoral votes.

November 27–29. Gore formally contests the Florida election on November 27. He sues in Leon County Circuit Court, in Tallahassee, claiming the number of legal votes "improperly rejected" and illegal votes counted in Nassau, Palm Beach, and Miami-Dade counties is enough to change outcome. Judge N. Sanders Sauls orders ballots brought to Tallahassee for possible counting. More than one million ballots are trucked with police escort to the state capital.

December 1. U.S. Supreme Court hears Bush appeal of deadline extension. Florida justices refuse to order revote requested in Palm Beach County because of controversial "butterfly ballot" used there.

December 2–3. Judge Sauls hears testimony on whether 13,000 ballots from Miami-Dade and Palm Beach counties should be manually counted. Both sides call witnesses on reliability of punch-card voting systems.

December 4. Sauls rejects Gore's request for manual recount and refuses to decertify Bush as winner. U.S. Supreme Court asks state high court to explain its November 21 action allowing manual recounting and extending deadlines.

December 8–9. Florida justices order hand count of ballots on which machines found no vote for president. U.S. Supreme Court unexpectedly halts the hand counts the next day.

December 10–11. U.S. Supreme Court receives briefs and hears arguments in Bush v. Gore.

December 12. U.S. Supreme Court splits 5–4 in ruling for Bush against further hand counts. Florida legislature convenes special session to meet the federal deadline for designating presidential electors. Twenty states miss the deadline by a few days.

December 13. Gore concedes election, congratulates Bush and jokingly adds "and I promised him that this time I wouldn't call him back."

December 18. Presidential electors meet in state capitals to cast votes.

January 6, 2001. Congress meets in joint session to count electoral votes. As Senate president, Vice President Gore presides over his own defeat. Twenty Gore supporters, mostly Congressional Black Caucus members, try to block Florida's votes but Gore rejects each representative's objection because none has also been signed by a senator as the 1887 Electoral Vote Count Act requires. One District of Columbia elector, Barbara Lett-Simmons, withholds her vote from Gore in protest of the District's lack of representation in Congress. Final electoral vote tally is 271 for Bush, 266 for Gore with one abstention.

January 20. Inauguration of Bush as president and Cheney as vice president. Largely nonviolent protests mar—but do not disrupt—the inaugural parade.

Gore scored a short-lived victory December 8 when the Florida court by a 4–3 vote ordered a resumption of the hand counts, only to have the U.S. Supreme Court quickly halt them the following day, pending its decision in Bush v. Gore. In its 5–4 decision, handed down December 12, the Court majority ruled for Bush that the lack of uniform standards for manual recounts denied “equal protection of the laws” to Florida voters. The Court split along ideological lines in the unsigned decision. In the majority were conservatives William Rehnquist, Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas, Anthony Kennedy, and Sandra Day O’Connor. Dissenting were liberals or moderates Stephen Breyer, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, David Souter, and John Paul Stevens.

The Court action left 42,000 Florida under-votes unexamined, including 35,000 from the punch-card counties, but it effectively resolved the 2000 presidential race and possibly averted a constitutional crisis that might have arisen had the dispute resulted in Florida’s sending two sets of electoral votes to Congress. The state legislature had already designated a slate of electors committed to Bush. Faced with a hopeless situation, Gore folded his campaign and conceded December 13.

When the presidential electors met in their states December 18 to cast their ballots, one District of Columbia elector, Barbara Lett-Simmons, withheld her vote from Gore in protest of the District’s lack of representation in Congress. This reduced Gore’s electoral vote total to 266 against 271 for Bush. Gore received 51.0 million votes (48.4 percent) to 50.5 million (47.9 percent) for Bush. Gore’s lead in the popular vote was 539,947. Nader’s 2.8 million votes amounted to 2.7 percent of the total. Buchanan received less than 1 percent with 447,798 votes.

An embarrassing loss to Gore was his home state of Tennessee and its eleven electoral votes. Had he won there he would have had an electoral vote majority and the Florida vote would have been irrelevant. Likewise, had Gore received a fraction of the Nader vote in several close states, including Florida, he would have been over the top in electoral votes. Political analyst Rhodes Cook, however, pointed out while Nader may have siphoned off Gore voters in Florida and elsewhere, Reform Party candidate Pat Buchanan, whose supporters traditionally lean Republican, may have prevented Bush from winning a few states that went closely for Gore. “[T]here were 30 additional electoral votes that Bush may have won if Buchanan had not been in the race, compared to 29 more electoral votes that may have gone to Gore if Nader had not run. In short, the effect of the two third-party candidates on the electoral vote was essentially a wash.”<sup>197</sup>

Nationwide, African Americans voted nine to one for Gore. On January 6, 2001, twenty House members, mostly members of the Congressional Black Caucus, tried to disqualify Florida’s electoral votes as Congress met in joint session to count the electoral votes. As Senate president by virtue of his being U.S. vice president, Gore one by one ruled the objections out of order because they had not been signed by a senator as required by law. None of the 100 members of the new Senate, evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, including presidential spouse Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, had signed a challenge to the Florida votes. Gore in his concession had asked his supporters to accept the Court verdict and the “finality of the outcome.”

The lingering bitterness put a damper on the inauguration of Bush as the forty-third U.S. president on January 20, 2001. On the cold, rainy Saturday, thousands of protesters, under tight security, lined the Pennsylvania Avenue parade route to the White House. They were noisy and visible, but there were relatively few arrests and clashes with the police. Long and bitter as it was, the thirty-six-day 2000 election “night” was shorter and perhaps less vitriolic than its 1876 counterpart, which extended from November 7 to two days before inauguration, then in March. Because March 4, 1877, fell on a Sunday, President Hayes was sworn in privately at the White House and the public ceremonies took place quietly on Monday.

Similarly, the nation witnessed another peaceful transfer of power with the Bush-Cheney inauguration. As historian David McCullough phrased it, the peacefulness was typical of past inaugurations but perhaps for a different reason. “As close as it was, this election was not about visceral issues like slavery or war—things people are really passionate about,” McCullough said. “The nation is closely divided, certainly, but we seem to be divided over which party controls the middle of the political spectrum. I’m not sure it’s happened quite like that before.”<sup>198</sup>

Effect of 2001 Terrorist Attacks

Entering the White House in January 2001, Bush moved rapidly on his priorities and managed to push through a $1.35 billion tax cut—a key campaign pledge; additional tax cuts followed in subsequent years. Despite his pledge to be “a uniter, not a divider,” education reform was the only major bipartisan legislation the president passed in 2001. The new administration faced a sharply divided Congress. Although Democrats had made some gains, Republicans retained a narrow majority in the House. The 2000 elections had caused a 50–50 split in the Senate as the Democrats had picked up five seats. Because Cheney, as vice president, could cast tie-breaking votes, the chamber was still under effective Republican control. But in May, after Republican James Jeffords of Vermont opted to leave his party and become an Independent who caucused with the Democrats, the Democrats took control of the Senate.

Vice President Cheney played a key role in the Bush White House. Cheney added gravitas and a seasoned foreign policy background to the inner circle of a president regarded by many as lacking in international experience. Cheney had a history of heart trouble, and in June 2001, after tests that showed occasional irregular heartbeats, he had a pacemaker implanted.

The events of September 11, 2001, altered the course of Bush's first term in office. A presidency that had seemed more focused on domestic issues suddenly was faced with the worst terrorist attack on U.S. soil in the country's history. That morning, terrorists hijacked four U.S. planes, crashing two of them into the Twin Towers of the World Trade Center, a Manhattan landmark, and one of them into the Pentagon, just outside Washington, D.C., in Virginia. The fourth plane crashed in a Pennsylvania field. Everyone aboard the planes was killed; several thousand more died on the ground; the towers collapsed.

The unprecedented, massive attacks on U.S. soil shifted the Bush administration's focus to a "war on terrorism." The president, whose popularity ratings had been dropping before the attacks, saw it rocket upward to a historic 90 percent as the country rallied behind him. His visit to Ground Zero in New York several days after the attacks, where he spoke with rescue workers, was seen as a high point of his first year in office.

One impact of September 11 was a heightened sense of security affecting the entire country and the way the government functioned. For example, although Cheney remained an important part of the president's circle of advisers, for security reasons, he often traveled to what was called an "undisclosed location." Public tours of the White House were suspended temporarily and a part of E Street, close to the building, was shut down.

Another change involved the shape of the federal government bureaucracy. Bush called for a White House Office of Homeland Security, to be headed by former Pennsylvania governor Thomas Ridge. While Bush originally opposed the idea of a new federal Department of Homeland Security, he changed his mind and joined Democratic-led calls for its creation. Bush signed a bill in late 2002 creating the department, which officially came into existence on March 1, 2003. The reorganization was the largest in the federal government since the late 1940s and involved the merging of a variety of agencies, including the Secret Service, the Coast Guard, and the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

A third outgrowth of the terrorist attacks was the actual "war on terror" itself. The United States that had basked in a post-cold war hiatus in which international concerns took a back seat found itself in the midst of a full-fledged war. A strongly supportive Congress approved a $40 billion emergency appropriation, as well as a resolution that authorized using force against terrorist groups and countries that backed them. U.S. forces attacked Afghanistan, toppling the Taliban government that had supported September 11 mastermind Osama bin Laden and his al Qaeda terrorist network, and began to prepare for a possible invasion of Iraq.

In 2002 and into 2003, the Bush administration pushed for military action against the Iraqi regime of Saddam Hussein. Bush's father had fought a war against Iraq more than a decade earlier, but Saddam remained in power. The George W. Bush administration sought to link Saddam to Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda. In addition, the White House focused on what it called Saddam's "weapons of mass destruction." In fall 2002 Congress approved military action against Iraq. The U.N. Security Council unanimously backed a resolution seeking stringent weapons inspections in Iraq by the international body and granting Saddam a final chance to disarm. In February 2003 Secretary of State Colin Powell delivered a forceful slide presentation to the United Nations, laying out the administration's case for war.

The war began on March 19, 2003, with a "coalition of the willing," in Bush's words, with the most prominent member—Britain—joining the United States in its attack on Iraq. However, many other countries that had joined Bush's father in the first Gulf War, including France, opted out of this one. Saddam's regime fell within several weeks, and on May 1 Bush triumphantly spoke on the U.S.S. Abraham Lincoln, in front of a banner reading "Mission Accomplished," to declare the end of large-scale combat operations in Iraq.

The terrorist attacks also affected the U.S. economy, which already had been faltering. The budget surplus in effect when Bush came into office, $86 billion in fiscal year 2000, turned into a deficit. By fiscal year 2004, the deficit had reached $412 billion.<sup>199</sup>

In addition to his foreign policy concerns, the president devoted much of 2002 to campaigning for Republican candidates around the country. Generally, midterm elections had resulted in losses for the president's party, the only twentieth-century exceptions being in 1934 and 1998. Also incumbent presidents usually do not throw themselves into off-year elections. But Bush's hard work paid off, and the Republicans picked up seats in both the House and Senate, maintaining control of the House and—even more important—winning back control of the Senate. Still, the Republican margin in both chambers was narrow, and Congress continued to be bitterly divided during the next two years.

No sooner were the 2002 midterm elections over than attention shifted to the 2004 presidential contest, in which Bush was seeking election to a second term. Unlike his father, who in his 1992 reelection bid had seen a tough primary challenge from conservative challengers, Bush faced no primary opposition. During Bush's 2004 reelection campaign, issues of terrorism and the new term "homeland security" were at the forefront. Bush successfully used his incumbency to portray an image of strength in the face of the terrorist enemy, despite a lackluster economy and the growing unpopularity of his venture into Iraq.

Bush's Reelection: 2004

For much of 2001 and 2002, many political observers had assumed that Gore would run for president again in 2004 in a rematch with Bush. But in December 2002, Gore declared that he would not run for president, leaving the Democratic without a leading candidate.

A large groups of contenders immediately jumped in, including Sen. Lieberman of Connecticut, Gore's vice-presidential running mate in 2000; John F. Kerry, a long-serving senator from Massachusetts who had made his name in the early 1970s as a decorated Vietnam veteran who turned against the war; and Sen. John Edwards, the charismatic first-term senator from North Carolina who had been a successful trial lawyer. A number of others joined also including former Vermont governor Howard Dean.

The sputtering economy at home and, in particular, the war in Iraq became the major issues in the primary campaign. Lieberman was a hawk on Iraq. Kerry had voted for the congressional authorization for the use of force against Iraq, but he later voted against an $87 billion supplemental authorization, which laid the foundation for Bush's later criticism of the senator as a "flip-flopper." Although Bush had declared an end to major combat activities in Iraq, violence continued there, and U.S. military forces were to extend their tours amid increasing casualties. Dean and others forged strong antiwar positions, and as 2003 wound on, Dean's antiwar stance—in addition to his innovative use of the Internet to raise money—propelled him to the front of the pack. The 2004 election marked the first time the Internet became a primary source of fund-raising for political campaigns.

Dean had been the front-runner at the end of 2003, but the momentum shifted as the 2004 caucuses and primaries began. Kerry and Edward gained strength while the others faded and one by one dropped out. With more primary wins, Kerry locked up the nomination and selected Edwards, who had performed well in the primaries and attracted a popular following, as his running mate.

The Kerry campaign, as did the Bush campaign, decided against taking federal matching funds during the primaries. Kerry raised $234.6 million during that period. After their conventions, each candidate was given $74.6 million in public financing for the general election.

The Democrats held their convention in late July, in Kerry's home town of Boston—the first time the city had hosted a convention. Kerry focused on his Vietnam-era service, rather than his Senate record. The convention was later remembered for another event: the keynote address delivered by future president Barack Obama of Illinois, who was running at that time for the U.S. Senate. His speech was a spectacular success, overshadowing even the primary figures present. Obama went on to win his Senate race that year to become the third African American senator since Reconstruction.

Kerry emerged from his convention without much of a "bounce," or rise in the polls; the race was still close. In August, a group called Swift Boat Veterans for Truth began airing anti-Kerry ads attacking the candidate's service in Vietnam. Kerry was slow to respond to the ads; the Bush campaign, meanwhile, while saying it had nothing to do with the ads, was equally slow to condemn them. In addition, the Bush campaign was having success with its portrayal of Kerry as a "flip-flopper" who switched positions at will on the Iraq war and would not provide a steady hand in the White House at a time of national crisis.

Bush kept Cheney on the ticket for the 2004 campaign, although some observers speculated the president might select a more popular figure. Cheney had been out of the public eye for much of the time since the September 11 attacks. In addition, his former company, Halliburton, was involved in controversy, including an investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC). Halliburton eventually agreed to pay a penalty of $7.5 million in a settlement with the SEC. Cheney's history of heart trouble also was a factor. But Bush relied on Cheney, and the vice president was an enthusiastic campaigner on the trail, focusing much of his attention on what he described as Kerry's weakness regarding the terrorist threat.

The president opted to forego federal matching funds during the primary phase of the campaign, which allowed him to raise as much money as he could. In total, he raised $269.6 million during the primaries. The Republicans held their convention from August 30 to September 2, later than usual, in New York City, the site of the September 11, 2001, attack. At the convention, the focus was on the president's success in fighting global terrorism. Bush emerged from the convention with an average bounce of six percentage points.

The three major networks chose not to broadcast much of either convention in 2004, accelerating a decline in network coverage of conventions. But various cable-news outlets, such as CNN, C-SPAN, MSNBC, and Fox News Channel, covered the events, as did public broadcasting.

Kerry's service in Vietnam continued to be an issue, as press reports focused on additional Swift Boat ads. But Bush's Vietnam era career also was examined as news organizations looked into his National Guard service and tried to pin down whether the future president had performed his duty adequately or had received preferential treatment. No definitive report ever emerged.

In the wake of the Republican convention, Bush held his lead in many polls, leading analysts to predict an easier-than-expected win for the president. The Democratic challenger seemed unable to capitalize on either the worsening situation in Iraq or the less-than-robust economy. In Iraq, insurgents continued to mount a terror campaign, and the weapons of mass destruction—a key rationale for the Bush administration's invasion of Iraq—had not been found. In addition, the U.S. military was suffering the fallout from a scandal uncovered that spring involving U.S. soldiers abusing Iraqi prisoners at Iraq's Abu Ghraib prison.

In the first of three presidential debates, Kerry came through as poised and intelligent, improving his image. Bush, meanwhile, seemed to grimace and scowl as his opponent spoke, and the president often appeared less focused in his answers than did the Democrat. Kerry received a postdebate "bounce" that turned the contest back into a horse race. The other debates were more even.

In the days leading up to November 2, 2004, polls showed a tight race between Bush and Kerry with the election probably dependent on a handful of competitive states including New Hampshire, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, New Mexico, Nevada, and Florida. When voters went to the polls in November, the tally was close, as most of the states lined up as they had in 2000. Bush carried Florida, the state that had proved so troublesome four years earlier. Ohio—a Bush state in 2000—was harder to predict, although Bush appeared to be holding a narrow lead, and most of the networks declined to call a winner overnight. The next day, November 3, Kerry, convinced that Bush's margin of more than 100,000 votes in Ohio could not be overcome, conceded the election to Bush. Republicans also welcomed the news that they had, for the second election in a row, picked up seats in the House and Senate, solidifying their control on Washington.

Bush won 51 percent of the vote to Kerry's 48 percent and an electoral college majority of 286–252. (One elector from Minnesota ended up voting for Edwards, so the final total was 286–251.) The election of 2004 involved more fund-raising and spending than any other presidential contest in U.S. history. According to the Federal Election Commission, private and public spending during 2004 on presidential candidates and national conventions totaled a little more than $1 billion, "56 percent more than comparable activity during the 2000 campaign."<sup>200</sup>

Bush was sworn in for his second term on January 20, 2005, by Supreme Court Chief Justice William Rehnquist, then ill with cancer. Because it was the first presidential inauguration since September 11, 2001, the central area of Washington, D.C., was locked down under unprecedented security. Access to the parade route along Pennsylvania Avenue was limited; the blocks close to the route were cordoned off with high metal barriers. Two thousand out-of-town police officers united with about 4,000 local officers in the effort.<sup>201</sup> In his inaugural address, Bush called for an expansion of freedom across the world. As befitted a president known for his early-to-bed routines, Bush attended the inaugural balls that night but still managed to get home to the White House by 10:00 p.m., an hour and 22 minutes ahead of schedule.<sup>202</sup>

Democrats Take Back Congress: 2006

Although President Bush won a close but clear reelection victory and was still working with a Republican-controlled Congress, his second term would prove difficult. In the first year of that term, Bush faced problems on the domestic as well as the international front, causing his popularity to slide.

One defining moment for the Bush administration in 2005 was its response to Hurricane Katrina, a monster storm that hit the U.S. Gulf Coast in late August, causing major damage along the seaboard and devastating the low-lying city of New Orleans. The flooding caused more than a thousand deaths and led to thousands of displaced residents leaving the city. The administration, particularly the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), was widely criticized for responding too slowly and too clumsily to the disaster.

Bush also had little success with a top domestic priority that year: changes to the Social Security system to encourage investment in private accounts. Democrats were successful in labeling the plan risky, and Bush never gained momentum with the public or even the GOP Congress. Another event that backfired on Republicans was the case of Terri Schiavo, a Florida woman who had been in a coma for many years. Her husband sought to remove the feeding tube that was keeping her alive, while her parents wanted her to remain on it. Top Republican officials backed keeping Schiavo alive, pushing through legislation that Bush signed, but eventually court decisions led to the tube's being removed, and Schiavo died on March 31, 2005.

Meanwhile, Bush's top political advisor, Karl Rove, and Vice President Cheney's top aide, Lewis "Scooter" Libby, were implicated in an ongoing investigation relating to the leaking of the identity of CIA agent Valerie Plame to the media during Bush's first term, causing more political headaches for the White House. Libby was later convicted in 2007 for his role in the matter.

In addition, the Iraq war was going poorly. The country was increasingly unsafe, with roadside bombs targeting U.S. troops and American casualties rising. Although Iraq had held elections in January, by the end of 2005 the situation had deteriorated, with violence on the upswing; growing numbers of Americans thought the invasion of Iraq had been a mistake. The fallout from the Abu Ghraib torture scandal continued.

Bush was successful, however, in putting a more rightward-leaning stamp on the Supreme Court, by appointing two relatively young conservative justices. John G. Roberts Jr. was fifty when he took his seat as chief justice in September 2005, and Samuel Alito was fifty-five when he became an associate justice in January 2006. While Roberts replaced a conservative chief justice, William Rehnquist, Alito replaced a moderate, Sandra Day O'Connor, who had been a swing vote in many key decisions.

Overall Bush was not the positive factor for Republicans in Congress that he had been four years earlier when he helped his party win additional seats in a midterm election. In addition Republicans in Congress had to deal with numerous unfolding ethical scandals. In the largest congressional bribery scheme to date, Rep. Randy “Duke” Cunningham of California in November 2005 resigned after pleading guilty to taking more than $2.4 million in bribes from defense contractors. A bigger scandal had erupted a few months earlier in August 2005 when Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who had ties to many GOP politicians, was indicted for wire fraud. In 2006 House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas and Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio, who were connected to Abramoff, were among those who had resigned their seats under ethical clouds. Ney eventually was sentenced to prison. Finally, two months before the election, Republican Mark Foley of Florida resigned his House seat after it became known that he sent inappropriate e-mails to congressional pages.

As the election neared, political observers expected gains for Democrats, but few predicted the Democratic sweep that gave the party control of both the House and Senate. The Democrats emerged with a substantial margin in the House, 233–202, but with just a one vote majority in the Senate. The 51–49 majority included two independents. In the House, Nancy Pelosi of California was elected Speaker, the first woman to hold that office.

With Democrats controlling the committee chairmanships, Bush faced a tough final two years in office, with little chance that his priorities would get much attention. Indeed, as the 110th Congress began that January, attention already had shifted to the 2008 presidential race and the battle to succeed the increasingly unpopular president.

Obama Leads Democrats: 2008

Both the Republican and Democratic parties, leading up to the 2008 presidential race with no incumbent, featured large candidate fields, with a range of personalities and political backgrounds. On the GOP side, there was no obvious front-runner, in contrast to Bush’s dominance of the field in 2000. The candidates included longtime Arizona senator John McCain, a Vietnam War veteran and former prisoner of war who had mounted a spirited, independent-minded effort in 2000; former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, a wealthy entrepreneur and businessman who headed the 2002 Olympic Games in Salt Lake City; former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, who also was a Baptist minister; and former New York mayor Rudolph “Rudy” Giuliani, who had become a household name in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, attacks on his city.

Huckabee unexpectedly won the Iowa caucuses, the nation’s first. The important New Hampshire primary followed with McCain winning, beating Romney who had been governor of neighboring Massachusetts. Romney won Michigan, his boyhood state where his father was once governor, and the Nevada primary. But McCain gained strength thereafter, essentially locking up the nomination with big wins in the major wave of primaries in February and March.

The Democratic side was large also, but with a single front-runner: Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. Clinton already had made history by becoming the first first lady to win a Senate seat, in 2000, as her husband's second term as president was ending. She won reelection in 2006. Many women were thrilled at the prospect of a female candidate leading the Democratic pack for the White House.

But despite Clinton's prominence, a host of other candidates jumped into the race, including Sen. Obama of Illinois. A young African American first-term senator, Obama also had been spoken of as a possible presence on a national ticket since his leap to prominence at the 2004 Democratic National Convention, where he gave a dramatic and widely praised keynote address. Obama won his Illinois Senate seat that year, and in January 2007 announced that he was forming a presidential exploratory committee. Like Clinton, Obama generated much excitement. His youth—he was born in 1961—and his unusual family background—his mother a white Kansan, his father a black Kenyan, and Obama's childhood in Hawaii and Indonesia—made for a captivating campaign story. Obama initially did not have widespread backing in the African American community because many black Americans had been fond of President Clinton and had transferred that favorable opinion to his wife. But Obama, whose campaign skillfully employed the Internet to win support, quickly gained traction among young people.

Former North Carolina senator John Edwards, John Kerry's running mate in 2004, was an early favorite. Other candidates included New Mexico governor Bill Richardson, Delaware senator Joseph R. Biden, Connecticut senator Chris Dodd, Ohio representative Dennis Kucinich, and former Alaska senator Mike Gravel. Most competed aggressively in the early period but quickly faded as the campaign became a race between Clinton and Obama.

The Obama campaign worked hard on grassroots efforts, and the underdog candidate's team continued to be known for its technological savvy and its appeal to youthful voters. A well-organized group, the Obama campaign made a strong pitch in Iowa, a predominately white state with a tiny black population. On January 3, Obama won the Iowa caucuses, with Edwards just edging Clinton for second place; the Illinois senator demonstrated that a black candidate could triumph in an overwhelmingly white area.

In New Hampshire Clinton won a narrow victory with Obama second. The battle between the two was fully joined. Clinton was running as the candidate of experience, while Obama focused on a theme of change. A crucial issue was the Iraq war. Clinton voted for it in 2003 while Obama had opposed it from its earliest days when he was still a state senator, giving him additional credibility among the party's antiwar activists. Clinton contrasted her years of experience with Obama's relative lack of time on the national and world political stage. Clinton, who still retained the backing of many female supporters, sought to win working-class voters and those with fewer years of formal education. She racked up solid victories in states such as Pennsylvania and Ohio, with large white working-class populations. Although large numbers of African Americans initially backed Clinton, many gradually shifted to Obama's camp.

Obama, unlike Clinton, waged a national campaign, focusing on smaller caucus and primary contests as well as the large battleground states. With this strategy he continued to pile up delegates throughout February and March, essentially collecting so many that Clinton had an almost impossible task of overtaking him. Nevertheless, the remarkable contest continued until the last primaries in June before being conclusively settled in Obama's favor.

The Democrats held their convention from August 25–28 in Denver, the second time that city had hosted a Democratic convention. Both former President Clinton and his wife gave Obama strong endorsements. Hillary Clinton even made the magnanimous gesture of halting the roll call of states in the middle to call for Obama's nomination by acclamation, which the delegates did. Most of the proceedings took place at an indoor convention hall, but Obama delivered his acceptance speech on the last night at Denver's football stadium, to accommodate a larger crowd of approximately 80,000.

Obama's moment was quickly eclipsed when, the day after his speech, McCain announced his choice of running mate: Alaska governor Sarah Palin. Reporters scrambled to learn more about the little-known Palin, who had served as governor for less than two years and previously was mayor of the small town of Wasilla, Alaska. Palin, a conservative, quickly became a controversial figure. A charismatic politician who referred to herself as a "hockey mom" and used folksy expressions such as "you betcha," Palin drew strong support from the GOP's conservative base, one of McCain's objectives in picking her over more conventional choices. Her selection marked another historic first in an election season filled with them: she was the first woman on a national Republican ticket. Democrats in 1984 had nominated Geraldine Ferraro as their vice-presidential candidate.

The four-day Republican convention opened the following Monday, August 31, in St. Paul, Minnesota. But the first day's events were curtailed as a major hurricane headed toward the U.S. Gulf Coast. Republicans did not want to remind voters about the controversial government response to Katrina in 2005. The convention resumed full-scale activities on Tuesday. The most-awaited event was Palin's

Wednesday night speech, viewed as a success for the Alaska governor and the McCain ticket overall. McCain's speech on the convention's closing day, Thursday, came as something of an anticlimax.

Palin's selection gave a lift to the GOP ticket in national polls. The McCain campaign also saw an upsurge in contributions, many apparently from members of the conservative Republican base. However, the presence of a woman on the GOP ticket did not seem to shift many disappointed Clinton supporters to the GOP ticket. Additionally, while Palin energized members of the Republican Party, her missteps and panned media interviews seemed to have a negative effect on the rest of the populace.

In mid-September, the country's economy, which had been sputtering, began a major meltdown, turning into the most serious financial crisis since the Great Depression of the 1930s. The stock market plummeted, and a series of major financial institutions either went bankrupt or were bailed out by the federal government. The economy soon replaced the Iraq war as the leading issue in the campaign. Against that backdrop, Obama began to make gains in the polls, as dispirited voters sought a change from the Republican-controlled White House.

The presidential and vice-presidential candidates participated in a series of widely anticipated televised debates, as had become the custom. While the debates rarely present an opportunity for a knockout blow, Obama had the most to lose if he came off looking unpresidential alongside the older, more experienced McCain. Obama, with his calm demeanor, confidence, and grasp of the facts, proved up to the task and a majority of viewers felt he won the debates, if only slightly. The vice-presidential debate also garnered a lot of attention, but in that meeting observers gave the more experienced Biden the nod over the well-rehearsed, folksy Palin. Yet no debate moved either campaign significantly forward or backward.

As the fall campaign season progressed, the economy deteriorated still further. The Bush administration and Congress put together a $700 billion rescue package designed to help financial institutions considered "too big to fail." The declining economic situation continued to benefit the Obama campaign, which maintained slight leads in national polls as well as in many of the battleground states. McCain's postconvention, post-Palin-selection bounce had dissipated, and the Republican campaign turned more negative as the weeks went on.

The McCain campaign's frustration also stemmed from its relative lack of campaign funds. McCain had opted to take federal campaign matching funds for the general election, meaning that he received $84.1 million for the general election phase of the campaign, but he could not raise additional funds. Obama, meanwhile, opted out of the federal matching system—the first major party candidate to do so during the general election phase since the system had been set up—allowing him to build up a huge sum of money from which to draw when he needed to boost campaign advertising in one key state or another, which McCain's people could not match. Obama's campaign raised approximately $742 million in total and spent approximately $712 million, compared to McCain's total figures of approximately $367 raised and $326 spent, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Obama's use of the Internet to accomplish this was foreshadowed by Howard Dean in his unsuccessful campaign four years earlier.

In 2004 Bush had won a narrow victory by capturing a few crucial swing states, such as Ohio and Florida. This time, as the election grew closer, Obama was slightly ahead in many competitive states, including some that Bush had won in 2004. For example, Virginia and North Carolina, which had not gone Democratic in decades, were polling slightly for Obama. To counteract the Democratic inroads into Republican states, the McCain forces made a big push in Pennsylvania, which Kerry had won in 2004, a state that Clinton had won in the primaries.

November 4 saw substantial voter turnouts—the highest since the 1960s—as Americans sought to participate in what was shaping up to be a milestone for the country. Obama not only won all the traditional Democratic-leaning states the Kerry won, such as Pennsylvania, but was also able to pull out victories in states that Kerry had been unable to win. Among the "Bush states" that Obama won were Florida, Virginia, North Carolina, Ohio, Indiana, and Colorado. Obama won 69.5 million votes (53 percent) to McCain's 59.9 million votes (46 percent) and his electoral college victory was 365 to McCain's 173. That night, Obama appeared with his family to deliver a speech at an emotional mass rally in Chicago's Grant Park.

In addition to Obama's historic victory, Democrats picked up additional seats in Congress, getting them close to sixty Senate seats, the number needed to halt a filibuster, while padding their House majority. Against the backdrop of Bush's unpopularity, the economic collapse, and the ongoing wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, Republicans had had their worst showing in many years.

The country woke up the next morning to the once-unbelievable reality that an African American had won the country's highest office and with his family would take up residence in the White House. The international reaction was positive, a contrast to the negative image the United States and President Bush had in the wake of the Iraq War.

Throughout the two-and-a-half month transition period, the Bush administration and the Obama team worked together with Congress to come up with potential solutions for the economic situation. Obama was more reticent when it came to international issues, opting for the most part to remain silent until he was in the White House.

During the transition Obama surprised many by selecting his primary rival Clinton to be secretary of state. Other cabinet appointments included former Justice Department official Eric Holder as attorney general and, in a bipartisan nod, Republican holdover Robert Gates as defense secretary. But not all nominations went smoothly. Treasury secretary nominee Timothy Geithner was confirmed by the Senate 64–30 only after acknowledging his failure to pay payroll taxes in previous years. The same embarrassing issue of failing to pay federal income taxes sunk the nomination of former Senate majority leader Tom Daschle to be secretary of health and human services. The position was seen as key for Obama, who made health care reform a major campaign theme. Obama would eventually nominate Kansas governor Kathleen Sebelius for the cabinet post.

Washington prepared for a record-breaking turnout, and unprecedented security measures for Obama's inauguration on January 20, 2009. The entire National Mall was filled, with huge television screens placed along its length, as approximately 1.8 million people gathered to see the inauguration, which occurred without incident under clear and sunny skies but in exceptionally cold temperatures. In anxious economic times, the new president strove to reassure the American people: "Today I say to you that the challenges we face are real, they are serious and they are many. They will not be met easily or in a short span of time. But know this America: They will be met."<sup>203</sup>

"Not much later," Remini writes, "they started calling him 'Hickory' as a sign of their respect and regard; then the affectionate 'Old' was added to give Jackson a nickname ... that admirably served him thereafter throughout his military and political wars." 90. Schattschneider argues in The Semisovereign People that the key element of any conflict is the extent to which the protagonists are able to control how many people get involved. Every “scope of conflict” has a bias. The size of the group involved in the conflict is almost always open to change. Schattschneider writes: “A look at political literature shows that there has indeed been a long-standing struggle between the conflicting tendencies toward the privatization and socialization of conflict” (p. 7). The New Deal was a stage of socialization of conflict.

140. The Kennedy assassination fomented passage of the Twenty-fifth Amendment, which provides for a more orderly system of replacement. Previously, when a vice president ascended to the White House after the death or removal of a president, the vice presidency was left vacant. The amendment provides for presidential appointment of a vice president to fill the vacant spot. It also provides for at least temporary replacement of the president in the case of disability. The latter provision developed out of a concern that the country could have become leaderless had Kennedy been physically or mentally impaired but not killed.

The administration plank supported a bombing halt only when it "would not endanger the lives of our troops in the field," did not call for a reduction in search-and-destroy missions or a withdrawal of troops until the end of the war, and advocated a new government in Saigon only after the war had ended. The minority plank, drafted by McCarthy and McGovern, called for an immediate halt to the bombing, reduction of offensive operations in the South Vietnamese countryside, a negotiated troop withdrawal, and encouragement of the South Vietnamese government to negotiate with communist insurgents. After nearly three hours of debate, the minority plank was defeated, 1,567 and 3/4 to 1,041 and 1/4.

Presidential Primaries

THE QUADRENNIAL PROCESS of electing a president has two distinct parts—the nominating process and the general election. In contrast to the stable character of the general election—a one-day nationwide vote on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November—the nominating process has changed many times in the nation’s history.

Modifications in the nominating process have been dramatic—beginning with congressional caucuses in the early nineteenth century, through the heyday of the national conventions over the next century and a half, to the present nominating system, where conventions merely ratify the choices made months earlier by Democratic and Republican primary and caucus voters.

While originating in the Progressive Era in the early twentieth century, primaries were few and far between until after the 1968 election. The Democrats’ tumultuous convention in Chicago that year encouraged both parties, but the Democrats in particular, to look for ways to open the nominating process to broader participation. Primaries quickly mushroomed—from fifteen in 1968, to thirty-six in 1980, to forty-four (including those in the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico) in 2000, declining slightly to thirty-nine for both parties in 2008, including a primary and caucus in Puerto Rico.

Their significance increased as well. Gone were the days when candidates could win their party’s nomination without entering the primaries. No nominee of either major party has done so since Democrat Hubert H. Humphrey in 1968. Gone too were the days when candidates could win their party’s nomination without first proving broad-based popularity among millions of voters. Beginning with Democrat George McGovern in 1972 through 2004, every major party nominee has first been his party’s highest vote-getter in the primaries. In 2008 Hillary Clinton actually won slightly more votes in the primaries than her fellow Democrat Barack Obama but fewer votes once caucus states were included. In the process, the once climactic conventions have become little more than giant pep rallies, ratifying the choices of Democratic and Republican primary and caucus voters and providing the staging ground for the parties’ general election campaigns.

The larger role of primary voters has also meant that the ability to mobilize voters has become more important than the bargaining skills of professional politicians. As a result, nominating campaigns now emphasize the skills of political consultants, the ability to use the Internet and influence the mass media, candidate-specific get-out-the vote and mobilization efforts, and the organizational clout of interest groups such as evangelical ministries and labor unions.

FRONT-LOADED PROCESS

As the number of primaries has grown, more and more states have moved their primaries forward to dates near the beginning of the election year in a bid to heighten their influence (a process that has become known as front-loading). As a result, with the notable exception of the Democrats in 2008, nominations have been settled earlier and earlier. In 1968 only New Hampshire’s primary was held before the end of March. In 1980 ten states held primaries before the end of that month. By 1988 the number surpassed twenty. In 2008 the pace accelerated: exactly half the country (twenty-five) states held primaries by the end of February. These states included Florida and Michigan, which flouted Democratic Party rules by moving their contests to January to have a larger impact on the candidate selection. Only three states, under the party rule—New Hampshire and South Carolina—were allowed to hold primaries before February. Indeed, including states choosing delegates by party caucuses, about two-thirds of the nation completed its actions by that early date.

The result has generally been an increasingly truncated nominating process that has followed a clear pattern. Early votes—caucuses in Iowa and a primary in New Hampshire—have winnowed the field to a handful of candidates. Then, after a short period of unpredictability, one candidate has scored a knockout in the glut of March primaries—a

TYPES OF PRIMARIES AND PROCEDURES

In many respects, the presidential nominating process is similar to a modern-day Alice in Wonderland. Its basic dynamics do not always appear logical. Primaries and caucuses are strewn across the calendar from January to June, culminating with party conventions in the summer. A nomination is won by a candidate attaining a majority of delegates, an honor that is formally bestowed at the conventions but for decades has been informally achieved much earlier during the primary season.

Size is less important in determining a state's importance in the nominating process than its tradition and place on the calendar (early is best). Hence the quadrennial starring role for Iowa and New Hampshire, and the bit parts frequently assigned to larger states, such as California or Texas.

States have different ground rules in the nominating process. Some have caucuses, many more have primaries. Almost all primaries currently allocate a state's delegates in line with the voters' presidential preference, but a few are nonbinding "beauty contests," with the delegates elected independently of the preference vote.

Rules on voter participation vary from state to state. Some states hold "closed" contests, which are open only to a party's registered voters. Some hold "semi-open" events, which allow independent voters to participate along with registered members of the party. About half the states have "open" primaries or caucuses, in which any registered voter can participate.

The parties themselves also have different playing fields. From 1980 to 2000, Democrats did not allow any states except Iowa, New Hampshire, and sometimes Maine to hold a primary or caucus before early March, but the party loosened these rules in 2004. They were loosened further for the 2008 campaign in an effort to strike regional, economic, and racial balance. After twelve states applied to hold early primaries and caucuses, the Democratic National Committee permitted Nevada to conduct a caucus between Iowa and New Hampshire and South Carolina to conduct a primary in late January, one week after New Hampshire. All other states were permitted to conduct primaries and caucuses beginning February 5. The rules stated that any states or candidates that violated these guidelines would face sanctions—the loss of all or at least half of their delegates votes.

That threat that took on new importance in the tight 2008 race after Florida and Michigan held primaries in January. While all the candidates adhered to their pledges not to campaign in these two states, Hillary Clinton bent the rules. She was the only candidate entered on the Michigan ballot, which she won, not surprisingly. In Florida, other candidates were listed on the ballot, but there was some unofficial campaigning for Clinton, unlike the other candidates, leading her to a popular majority. As the contest between Clinton and Barack Obama remained tight through the spring, the inclusion and counting of delegates from these states became an increasingly important issue. Republicans in 2008 took a less contentious position, in keeping with past practice. States that held Republican primaries outside the established window lost half their delegates.

Since 1984, Democrats have reserved between 10 and 20 percent of their delegate seats for high-level party and elected officials (such as Democratic governors, members of Congress, and members of the party's national committee). Often called "superdelegates," these automatic delegates do not have to declare a presidential preference, although they usually follow their state's primary vote. Given the close race between Obama and Clinton the battle for these superdelegates became heated. Although Clinton originally led among these members of the party "establishment," Obama's ability to eventually win them over (463–257) proved a crucial part of his victory. (Republicans did not have "superdelegates" until their 2004 convention, when they gave automatic representation to members of the Republican National Committee, a small group.)

victory ratified by a string of essentially meaningless primary votes over the spring months.

The Republican Party stuck to this script in 2008. Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, a favorite of evangelicals, scored a surprise victory in the Iowa caucuses, a contest in which former governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts finished second, and in which the eventual Republican nominee, Arizona Sen. John McCain, finished third even without active campaigning. McCain won in New Hampshire, consolidated his advantage over Huckabee with a victory in South Carolina the next day, and led Romney in a series of primaries in late January and early February. The race effectively ended after McCain emerged as the clear winner of the Super Tuesday primaries on February 5. Romney conceded February 7 and Huckabee retired from the field in early March.

The Democratic Party contest also quickly focused on two senators, Clinton of New York and Obama of Illinois. Obama won a surprising victory in the Iowa caucuses, a state with few minority voters. Clinton won her own surprising victory in the New Hampshire primary and the race became a tug of war for four more months.

Clinton began as the clear front-runner with the personal prestige she gained as first lady when her husband was president from 1993 to 2001, the support of the party establishment, her large financial resources, and her appeal as the first female candidate for the White House with a reasonable chance of winning. She expected to win a significant set of states on "Super Tuesday" February 5 that would all but prevent Obama from overtaking her. Clinton did score primary victories in such large states as California, New York, Massachusetts, and New Jersey that day, but Obama won his Illinois and Missouri, and he used his appeal to African Americans to help win Georgia and Alabama in the South. As he would throughout the nominating contest, Obama took advantage of an impressive ground organization to win nearly all of the caucuses, some by lopsided margins, thus netting substantially more delegates. Moreover, in those

Since they began party reform in the 1970s, Democrats have required states to distribute delegates among their candidates in proportion to their vote, statewide and in congressional districts. Since the 1992 conventions, the Democrats have set a 15 percent floor for candidates to share in the proportionate distribution at each level. This system proved helpful to Obama in 2008. Having organized early in most states, he was able to win delegates throughout the nation, and could reap a proportion of delegates even where he trailed in the statewide vote. An analysis indicates that if Democrats had employed a statewide winner-take-all system (in which the candidate winning the most votes statewide wins all the delegates), Obama probably would have lost the nomination to Clinton, largely because of her victories in larger states such as New York and California. In reality, although Obama trailed by eighty-four delegates in these two states, he neutralized his losses there by winning bigger margins in Illinois and Georgia, a net of eighty-six delegates. Overall, Clinton won twenty-one of the forty primaries, a net gain of forty-six delegates. Obama's victories in all but one of the seventeen smaller caucus constituencies netted him more, 141 delegates.

Republicans, in contrast, allow a variety of delegate allocation methods, including proportional representation, statewide winner-take-all congressional district and statewide winner-take-all (in which the high vote-getter in a district wins that district's delegates and the high vote-getter statewide wins all the at-large delegates), or some combination of the three. Still another method used by Republicans is the selection of individual delegates, often unpledged to any candidate, in a "loophole," or direct election, primary.

How delegates are actually elected can vary from state to state. Most primary states hold presidential preference votes, in which voters choose among the candidates who have qualified for the ballot in their states. Although preference votes may be binding or nonbinding, in most states the vote does commit the delegates. For those primaries in which the preference vote is binding on delegates, state laws vary as to the number of ballots at the convention through which delegates must remain committed. Delegates may be bound for as few as one ballot or as many ballots as a candidate remains in the race. For the first time national Democratic rules in 1980 bound delegates for the first ballot unless released beforehand by the candidate they were elected to support. The rule became a flash point of controversy that year between the front-runner, President Jimmy Carter, and his major challenger, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts. While Kennedy wanted the binding rule dropped, the Carter forces prevailed, keeping the rule in effect and enabling Carter to win the nomination on the first ballot. During the quadrennial review of party rules after the election, the binding rule was dropped, but presidential candidates retained the right to replace disloyal delegates with more faithful ones.

Until 1980 the Republicans had a rule requiring delegates bound to a specific candidate by state law in primary states to vote for that candidate at the convention regardless of their personal presidential preferences. That rule was repealed at the party's 1980 convention.

The final authority on delegate selection is the party itself, at its national convention. Regardless of state law or previous procedures, the convention can decide which delegates to seat to represent a state, and that decision is binding. Disputes on delegate credentials have sometimes been critical in party conventions, for example in the Republican nomination of Dwight Eisenhower in 1952 and the Democratic nomination of George McGovern in 1972. In 2008, despite Clinton's primary leads in Michigan and Florida, the Democratic National Committee first barred all delegates from those states, then softened to admit half. That decision proved to be the final nail in the coffin for Clinton's campaign. At the convention itself, in a gesture toward party unity, all of the delegates were seated for the ritual confirmation of Obama's nomination.

states where he ran behind in the primaries, Obama took advantage of Democratic rules that divided delegates in proportion to the candidates' votes to prevent Clinton from obtaining overwhelming delegate victories.

Obama also built on new forms of Internet fundraising and mobilization that party chairman Howard Dean had pioneered in 2004 to overcome Clinton's initial significant financial advantage. With the contest close, the loyalties of superdelegates—party officials and officeholders who were automatically allotted a slot at the convention—and the fate of contested delegates from Michigan and Florida became far more important. Superdelegates originally backed Clinton, but their allegiance shifted as Obama began winning in their states. Eventually he would lead by 463–257 among these officials. The race was effectively over after Obama won a decisive victory in North Carolina and nearly carried Indiana in May. But the final denouement came in the last weekend of the primary season when the Democratic National Committee decided that it would seat at the convention only half of the delegates chosen in the Michigan and Florida primaries. Clinton emerged with only twenty-four additional delegates, an insignificant consolation prize.

The last time the Democrats had an extended contest for the presidential nomination was 1984, when former vice president Walter F. Mondale and Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado battled into the final week of Democratic primaries before Mondale won enough delegates to secure his nomination. Republicans had not had a competitive nominating contest at the time of its national convention since the 1976 Republican race between President Gerald R. Ford and former governor Ronald Reagan of California.

Front-loading has generally worked to the advantage of the most prominent candidates. In the contemporary system, only aspirants who already have popular recognition and campaign money can realistically compete in what is almost a nationwide primary. In nearly every contest since 1980 (with Obama in 2008 a notable exception), the eventual nominee has either led in opinion polls or raised the most money—and usually both—before, and often many months before, any voters have actually cast their primary ballots.

The need for early public recognition has resulted in the disappearance of the fabled “dark horse,” a candidate of little prominence who develops strength over the course of the primary season. The large cost of widespread campaigning has further limited opportunities for surprises. As a result, candidates are withdrawing earlier in the nominating process, even before the first primary vote, as happened with Sen. Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina in the Republican 2000 race and Sen. Bob Graham of Florida in the Democratic 2004 race. The increasing cost of these campaigns has also undermined the system of public funding for presidential campaigns, with the most prominent candidates relying on private contributions rather than federal funds. These funds were first rejected by George W. Bush in 2000; following his precedent, the most prominent Democrats in 2008—Clinton and Obama—relied only on private contributions for their extensive war chests. McCain, a champion of public financing, proved an exception to this rule, turning to the public funding system for his campaign.

AN EVOLUTIONARY PROCESS

During the early years of the nation, presidential nominations were decided by party caucuses in Congress (derided by their critics as “King Caucus”). At the dawn of the Jacksonian era in the 1830s, though, the nominating role shifted to national conventions, a broader-based venue where party leaders from around the country held sway.

In the early twentieth century, presidential primaries appeared on the scene, adding a new element of grassroots democracy and voter input. But for the next half century, the primaries were relatively few in number and played a limited advisory role. Nominations continued to be settled in the party conventions.

After World War II, American society became more mobile and media-oriented, and once-powerful party organizations began to lose their clout. An increasing number of presidential aspirants saw the primaries as a way to generate popular support that might overcome the resistance of party leaders. Both Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1952 and Democrat John F. Kennedy in 1960 won a string of primary victories that demonstrated their voter appeal and made their nominations possible. Yet conventions continued to be the most important part of the nominating process until 1968.

Legacy of the Progressive Era

Primaries may seem entrenched in the electoral process, but they are relatively recent replacements for the old smoke-filled rooms where party bosses once dictated the choice of presidential nominees. Presidential primaries originated as an outgrowth of the Progressive movement in the early twentieth century. Progressives, fighting state and municipal corruption, objected to the links between political bosses and big business and advocated returning the government to the people.

Part of this “return to the people” was a turn away from what were looked on as boss-dominated conventions. The primary idea in time spread from state and local elections to presidential contests. Because there was no provision for a nationwide primary, state primaries were initiated to choose delegates to the national party conventions (delegate-selection primaries) and to register voters’ preferences on their parties’ eventual presidential nominees (preference primaries).

Florida enacted the first presidential primary law in 1901. The law gave party officials an option of holding a party primary to choose any party candidate for public office, as well as delegates to the national conventions. However, there was no provision for placing names of presidential candidates on the ballot—either in the form of a preference vote or with information indicating the preference of the candidates for convention delegates.

Wisconsin’s progressive Republican governor, Robert M. La Follette, gave a major boost to the presidential primary following the 1904 Republican National Convention. At that convention, the credentials of La Follette’s progressive delegation were rejected and a regular Republican delegation from Wisconsin was seated instead. Angered by what he considered unfair treatment, La Follette returned to his home state and began pushing for a presidential primary law. The result was a 1905 Wisconsin law mandating the direct election of national convention delegates. The law, however, did not include a provision for indicating the delegates’ presidential preference.

La Follette’s sponsorship of the delegate-selection primary helped make the concept a part of the progressive political program. The growth of the progressive movement rapidly resulted in the enactment of presidential primary laws in other states.

The next step in presidential primaries—the preferential vote for president—took place in Oregon. There, in 1910, Sen. Jonathan Bourne, a progressive Republican colleague of La Follette (by then a senator), sponsored a referendum to establish a presidential preference primary, with delegates legally bound to support the primary winner. By 1912, with Oregon in the lead, a dozen states had enacted presidential primary laws that provided for either direct election of delegates, a preferential vote, or both. By 1916 the number had expanded to twenty-six states.

The first major test of the impact of presidential primary laws—in 1912—demonstrated that victories in the primaries did not ensure a candidate’s nomination. Former president Theodore Roosevelt, campaigning in twelve Republican primaries, won nine of them, including Ohio, the home state of incumbent Republican president William Howard Taft. Roosevelt lost to Taft by a narrow margin in Massachusetts and to La Follette in North Dakota and Wisconsin.

Despite this impressive string of primary victories, the convention rejected Roosevelt in favor of Taft. With primaries confined to a quarter of the states, Taft supporters kept control through the Republican National Committee (RNC), which ran the convention, and the convention's credentials committee, which ruled on contested delegates. Moreover, Taft was backed by many state organizations, especially in the South, where most delegates were chosen by caucuses or conventions dominated by party leaders.

On the Democratic side, the 1912 convention more closely reflected the primary results. Gov. Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey and Speaker of the House Champ Clark of Missouri were closely matched in total primary votes, with Wilson only 29,632 votes ahead of Clark. Wilson emerged with the nomination after a long convention struggle with Clark.

Decline and Revival of the Primaries

After the first wave of enthusiasm for presidential primaries, interest waned. By 1935, eight states had repealed their presidential primary laws. The diminution of reform zeal during the 1920s, the preoccupation of the country with the Great Depression in the 1930s, and war in the 1940s appeared to have been leading factors in this decline. Also, party leaders were not enthusiastic about primaries; the cost of conducting them was relatively high, both for the candidates and the states. Many presidential candidates ignored the primaries, and voter participation often was low.

But after World War II, interest picked up again. Some politicians with presidential ambitions, knowing the party leadership was not enthusiastic about their candidacies, entered the primaries to try to generate political momentum. In 1948 Harold Stassen, Republican governor of Minnesota from 1939 to 1943, entered presidential primaries in opposition to the Republican organization and made some headway before losing in Oregon to Gov. Thomas E. Dewey of New York. In 1952 Sen.

Democrat Hubert H. Humphrey in 1968 was the last candidate to win a major party's presidential nomination without entering the primaries.

Estes Kefauver, D-Tenn., riding a wave of public recognition as head of the Senate Organized Crime Investigating Committee, challenged Democratic Party leaders by winning several primaries, including a New Hampshire upset of President Harry S. Truman, who announced three weeks later that he would not run for reelection. The struggle between Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower and Sen. Robert A. Taft for the Republican Party nomination that year also stimulated interest in the primaries.

In 1960 Sen. John F. Kennedy of Massachusetts challenged Sen. Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota in two primaries: Wisconsin, which bordered on Humphrey's home state, and West Virginia, a labor state with few Catholic voters. (Kennedy was Roman Catholic, and some questioned whether voters would elect a Catholic president.) After Kennedy won both primaries, Humphrey withdrew from the race. The efforts of party leaders to draft an alternative to Kennedy came to be viewed as undemocratic by rank-and-file voters. Primaries now significantly challenged approval by party leaders as the preferred route to the nomination. Sen. Barry M. Goldwater, R-Ariz., in 1964 and former vice president Richard Nixon in 1968 also were able to use the primaries to show their vote-getting and organizational abilities on the way to becoming their party's presidential nominees.

Party domination of presidential nominations ended in 1968, amid the turmoil of the Vietnam War. Although the Republicans calmly chose Nixon, the nominating process tore the Democrats apart. Sens. Eugene McCarthy of Minnesota and Robert F. Kennedy of New York used the handful of Democratic primaries that spring to protest the war in Vietnam, together taking more than two-thirds of the party's primary vote and driving President Lyndon B. Johnson from the race.

History might have been different if Kennedy had not been assassinated after his victory in the California primary that June. But without Kennedy on the scene, the party's embattled leadership was able to maintain a tenuous control of the convention that August in Chicago, nominating Vice President Humphrey.

But Humphrey's nomination came at a price. Extensive street demonstrations in opposition to Humphrey and the war were met by brutal police force. On the floor of the convention, insurgent delegations were rebuffed, amid televised curses and fist fights. For the first time in several generations, the legitimacy of the convention itself was thrown into question. As an outgrowth, a series of Democratic rules review commissions began to overhaul the presidential nominating process to encourage much greater grassroots participation.

NOMINATIONS REFORM: REVERSAL OF FORTUNE

Democrats and Republicans have considered and enacted reforms of the nominating process frequently since the 1960s. Typically, the party that has lost the presidential election is more active, hoping to improve its chances in the next election, while the winners bask in complacency.

The initial thrust toward reform came from the Democrats, after their narrow defeat in the 1968 election. A commission originally headed by Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota established standards for broader and timely participation in the nominating process, which resulted in widespread adoption of primaries in place of party caucuses. Republicans followed suit, although more cautiously and more slowly.

Democrats Experiment with New Rules

Despite the growing importance of primaries, party leaders until 1968 maintained some control of the nominating process. With only a handful of the fifteen to twenty primaries regularly contested, candidates could count on a short primary season. The primaries began in New Hampshire in March, then candidates tested their appeal during the spring in Wisconsin, Nebraska, Oregon, and California before resuming their courtship of party leaders. In 1968—admittedly an unusual year, with incumbent Democratic president Lyndon B. Johnson suddenly withdrawing from his race for reelection, and the leading Democratic candidate (Sen. Robert F. Kennedy of New York) assassinated a few weeks before the convention—Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey was able to gain the party's nomination without entering a single primary.

But after 1968, the Democrats began altering their nominating rules, in an effort to reduce the alienation of liberals and minorities from the political system and to allow voters to choose their leaders. Republicans, who won in 1968 and four of the five presidential elections that followed, were slow to make any changes to their rules. (See boxes, Changes in Democrats' Nominating Rules, p. 495; GOP Primary Rules, p. 497.) The immediate result was a dramatic increase in presidential primaries that enhanced the chances of outsiders and produced Democratic presidential candidates such as McGovern, a liberal who lost in a landslide to Nixon in 1972, and Jimmy Carter, a former governor of Georgia who beat incumbent President Ford in 1976 but lost to Reagan in 1980.

In 1980 a then-record thirty-seven primaries (including those in the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico) provided more opportunity for mass participation in the nominating process than ever before. President Carter and Republican nominee Reagan were the clear winners of the long primary season. Although Carter received a bare majority of the cumulative Democratic primary vote, he was still more than 2.5 million votes ahead of his major rival, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts. With no opposition in the late primary contests, Reagan emerged as a more one-sided choice of GOP primary voters. He finished nearly 4.8 million votes ahead of his closest competitor, George H.W. Bush.

Disheartened by Carter's massive defeat in 1980, the Democrats revised their nominating rules for the 1984 election. The party created a new bloc of so-called superdelegates—party leaders who were not formally committed to any presidential candidate. This reform had two main goals. First, Democratic leaders wanted to ensure that the party's elected officials would participate in the nomination decision at the convention. Second, they wanted to ensure that these uncommitted party leaders could play a major role in selecting the presidential nominee if no candidate was a clear front-runner.

While the reforms of the 1970s were designed to give more influence to grassroots activists and less to party regulars, this revision was intended to bring about a deliberative process in which experienced party leaders could help select a consensus Democratic nominee with a strong chance to win the presidency.

The Democrats' new rules had some expected, as well as unexpected, results. For the first time since 1968, the number of primaries declined and the number of caucuses increased. The Democrats held only thirty primaries in 1984

(including the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico). Yet, as did McGovern in 1972 and Carter in 1976, Colorado Sen. Gary Hart used the primaries to pull ahead (temporarily) of former vice president Walter F. Mondale, an early front-runner whose strongest ties were to the party leadership and its traditional core elements. (Still, Mondale wound up with more primary votes than Hart.) In 1984 the presence of superdelegates was important because about four out of five backed Mondale.

A few critics regarded the seating of superdelegates as undemocratic, and there were calls for reducing their numbers. Yet to those of most influence within the party, the superdelegates had served their purpose. In the following years, the Democratic National Committee (DNC) set aside additional seats for party leaders, increasing the number of superdelegates from 14 percent of the delegates in 1984 to 18 percent in 1996, edging close to 20 percent by 2008. All members of the DNC were guaranteed convention seats, as were all Democratic governors and members of Congress.

Moving the Windows

In the 1970s the primary calendar started slowly, giving little-known candidates the time to raise money and momentum after doing well in the early rounds. Most of the primaries then were held in May and June. But the schedule of the nominating process has been less favorable to dark horses since then. States began to move forward on the calendar in a bid to increase their influence, heightening the need for candidates to be well-organized and well-funded at the beginning of the primary season.

Democrats sought to put a brake on the calendar sprawl toward the beginning of the election year by instituting a "window," structuring the calendar to prohibit party primaries or caucuses before early March, with the exception of Iowa, New Hampshire, and, for a while, Maine.

Many states crept right up to this early March firewall, scheduling their primary in March—gradually at first, but then in tidal wave proportions in 1988, with the creation of a full-scale primary vote across the South on the second Tuesday in March that came to be known as "Super Tuesday." By doing so they hoped to steer the nomination toward a centrist son of the South, such as Sen. Albert "Al" Gore Jr. of Tennessee.

The Democratic "window" proved to be a confining brick wall for the Democrats in 2000. With no primaries scheduled for five weeks after New Hampshire, the party and its likely nominee, Gore—now vice president—disappeared from the news, while Republican George W. Bush continued to gain media attention. Attempting to recoup in 2004, Democrats allowed states to select delegates as early as a week after New Hampshire, and eighteen states—mostly small in population—took advantage of the opportunity to hold nine primaries and nine caucuses.

SELECTION BY CAUCUS

In the current primary-dominated era of presidential politics, which began three decades ago, caucuses have survived in the quiet backwater of the nominating process. The impact of caucuses decreased in the 1970s as the number of primaries grew dramatically. Previously, a candidate sought to run well in primary states mainly to have a bargaining chip with which to deal with powerful leaders in the caucus states. Republicans Barry Goldwater in 1964 and Richard Nixon in 1968 and Democrat Hubert H. Humphrey in 1968 all built up solid majorities among caucus state delegates that carried them to their parties' nominations. Humphrey did not compete in a single primary state in 1968.

After 1968, candidates placed their principal emphasis on primaries. First George McGovern in 1972—and then incumbent Republican president Gerald R. Ford and Democratic challenger Jimmy Carter in 1976—won nomination by securing large majorities of the primary state delegates. Neither McGovern nor Ford won a majority of the caucus state delegates. Carter was able to win a majority only after his opponents' campaigns collapsed.

More recently, there has been an increase in the number of states employing caucuses to choose convention delegates, mostly in smaller states. The increase was slight among Democrats, but more extensive among Republicans in 2004, when the party saw little reason to spend money or time in an uncontested renomination of President George W. Bush. The primaries continue to be the major prizes and to receive the most attention from the media and the candidates.

In 2008, however, the caucuses again became important, because they were critical in the nominating campaign of Democrat Barack Obama. The Illinois senator owed the margin of his victory over fellow senator Hillary Clinton to the delegates he accumulated in his well-designed efforts in the seventeen states and territories choosing delegates at caucuses.

COMPLEX METHOD

Compared with a primary, the caucus system is complicated. Instead of focusing on a single primary election ballot, the caucus presents a multitiered system that involves meetings scheduled over several weeks, sometimes even months. There is mass participation at the first level only, with meetings often lasting several hours and attracting only the most enthusiastic voters or dedicated party members.

Despite the diffusion of primaries over more weeks, Democrats remained dissatisfied with the concentration of selection at the beginning of the election year. There was too little time, critics said, for voters to consider alternatives and to test the campaign mettle of the declared candidates. After their defeat in the 2004 election, Democrats established a new reform group, the Commission on Presidential Nomination Timing and Scheduling.

The commission attempted to strike regional, economic, and racial balances, while allowing only one or two

Obama supporters cheer during January 2008 caucuses in Le Mars, Iowa.

The operation of the caucus varies from state to state, and each party has its own set of rules. Most begin with precinct caucuses or some other type of local mass meeting open to all who identify with the party, and even sometimes to all voters. In most states, there is at least one more step, sometimes two or three. Delegates in Iowa, for example, are elected at the precinct caucuses to county conventions, which are followed by congressional district conventions and the state convention, the two levels where the national convention delegates are chosen.

Participation, even at the first level of the caucus process, typically consists of local party activists. Many rank-and-file voters find a caucus complex, confusing, or intimidating. When a candidate arouses great popular enthusiasm, however, as Obama did in 2008, large numbers may come to the caucuses. In Washington State in 2008, more people—almost a quarter of a million—attended the caucuses than voted in the later (and less significant) primary.

In light of these characteristics, caucuses offer a opportunity particularly for candidates who arouse passionately dedicated supporters. That was evident as long ago as 1972, when a surprisingly strong showing in the Iowa precinct

“first-tier” caucuses and one or two “first-tier” primaries before February 5. After twelve states applied to hold early primaries and caucuses, the Democratic National Committee permitted Nevada to conduct a caucus between Iowa and New Hampshire and South Carolina to conduct a primary in late January, one week after New Hampshire. All other states were permitted to conduct primaries and caucuses beginning February 5. The rules stated that any states or candidates that violated these guidelines would face sanctions, including the loss of all or at least half of their delegates caucuses helped to propel Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota, an ardent foe of the Vietnam War, toward the Democratic nomination. In the same state in 2008, Democrats came out in record numbers for Obama and Mike Huckabee, Governor of Arkansas and an ordained minister, won the Republican caucuses due to the fervor of evangelical Christians.

Iowa has become the kick-off point for the quadrennial nominating process. It is not unusual for a politician, mulling a presidential run, to give a speech in Iowa as long as three or four years before an election. The state has become increasingly important and increasingly expensive for ambitious presidential candidates, as they must shell out money for everything from straw votes to radio and TV advertising. Sometimes, grassroots organization can overcome this need. Huckabee won the state in the face of large expenditures by Governor Mitt Romney. Obama did spend large sums in Iowa, but won many other caucus states with small spending.

Although the basic steps in the caucus process are the same for both parties, the rules that govern them are vastly different. Democratic rules have been revamped substantially since 1968, establishing national standards for grassroots participation. Democrats provide for proportional representation, dividing delegates to the next level of selection among candidates who receive support by at least 15 percent of caucus participants. Republican rules have remained largely unchanged, with the states given wide latitude in drawing up their delegate-selection plans.

CAUCUSES

For both the Republican and Democratic parties, the percentage of delegates elected from caucus states began a sharp decline throughout the 1970s, a trend that has continued. In 2008 primaries were held in thirty-six states, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and among Democrats living abroad. Washington State held both a primary and caucuses, with Republican delegates chosen in the primary and Democratic delegates through caucuses. In Texas, Republicans chose candidates through the primary, while Democrats used both methods, two-thirds of the delegates chosen in the primary, one-third through separate caucuses held the same day. The Democrats elected 85.4 percent of their pledged national convention delegates in primaries, against only 14.6 percent in caucuses. (However, 19.3 percent of the total convention consisted of “superdelegates,” unpledged party and elected officials.) The Republicans in 2008 chose 84.5 percent of their pledged delegates in primaries and the rest by caucus or state committee; the convention also included 129 unpledged members of the Republican National Committee.

The caucus system is often criticized. Some have complained that they are easily dominated by party officials or organized interest groups such as church members, labor union members, and teachers, or open to capture by ideological extremists. The prominence of the Iowa caucus is sometimes seen as unrepresentative, especially among Democrats, because of the small proportion of minority group members in the state.

Yet in the elections of the twenty-first century, Iowa has again enjoyed center stage. In 2000, the campaigns of the eventual nominees—Gov. George W. Bush of Texas and Vice President Al Gore—were successfully launched in Iowa. In 2004 Iowa became an important turning point in the party’s contest, when Sen. John Kerry overcame the initial enthusiasm for Gov. Howard Dean of Vermont. In 2008 Obama’s surprise victory in Iowa became the foundation of his defeat of the Democratic front-runner, Senator Clinton. On the Republican side, Huckabee’s win lifted him from obscurity to prominence and gave strong impetus to his campaign, which would eventually last longer than all the other major challenges to front-runner John McCain.

The major complaint about the caucus process is that it does not involve enough voters, and that the low turnouts are not as representative of voter sentiment as a higher-turnout primary. The combined turnout for both parties for the Iowa caucuses in 2000, for example, was roughly 150,000, less than half the number that turned out for the New Hampshire primary a week later. But this criticism is not always appropriate. In 2008 more than twice as many Democrats participated in the Iowa caucus than in the New Hampshire primary, and more Republicans attended the Iowa meetings than later voted in New Hampshire.

Staunch defenders believe a caucus has party-building attributes a primary cannot match. They note that several hours at a caucus can involve voters in a way that quickly casting a primary ballot does not. Following caucus meetings, the state party comes away with lists of thousands of voters who can be tapped to volunteer time or money, or even to run for local office. While the multitiered caucus process is often a chore for the state party to organize, a primary is substantially more expensive.

votes. The potential sanctions became an issue in 2008 when Florida and Michigan violated the rules by scheduling primaries in January. The rules also did little to discourage front-loading: sixteen primaries were held on “Super Tuesday,” February 5. Nonetheless, the Democratic Party got its wish for a drawn-out contest that tested the mettle of its candidates and boosted party registration efforts. In primary voting in the states, including Michigan and Florida, just under 37 million votes were cast. When Puerto Rico’s primary is added, the total was more than 37 million.

Republican Efforts

The Republican Party was slower to change its nominating procedures: it did not guarantee delegate seats to its leaders until the 2000 convention voted to make members of the RNC automatic superdelegates at the party’s convention in 2004. Republicans had not acted before that in part because their rules permit less rigid pledging of delegates, which generally has led to substantial participation by Republican leaders, despite the absence of guarantees.

CHOOSING A RUNNING MATE: THE BALANCING ACT

In modern times, with presidential candidates wrapping up their party's nominations early in the primary season, the greatest suspense before a national convention had centered on the selection of a running mate. But this closely watched selection process is a recent development and it, too, has been passing out of the hands of the convention delegates.

During the country's first years, the runner-up for the presidency automatically took the second slot, although that system did not last long. In 1800 Thomas Jefferson and Aaron Burr found themselves in a tie for electoral votes, even though Jefferson was the Democratic-Republicans' clear choice to be the top of the ticket. Burr's supporters, however, were unwilling to settle for the lesser office. The deadlock went to the House of Representatives, where Jefferson needed thirty-six ballots to clinch the presidency. It also led to the Twelfth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, ratified in 1804, providing for separate electoral college balloting for president and vice president.

With the emergence of political parties after 1800, candidates ran as teams. Once party conventions began in 1831, delegates, with the guidance of party bosses, began to do the choosing. Sometimes the vice presidency was used as a bargaining chip, as when Franklin D. Roosevelt won the critical support of Texas by endorsing Rep. John Nance Garner for the second slot.

Only in 1940 did presidential nominees begin regularly hand-picking their running mates. That year, after failing to persuade Secretary of State Cordell Hull to accept the vice presidency, Franklin D. Roosevelt forced Henry A. Wallace on a reluctant Democratic convention by threatening to not run a third time if Wallace was rejected. Four years later, Roosevelt turned to Sen. Harry S. Truman to replace Wallace. The only exception to the practice that Roosevelt established came in 1956, when Democrat Adlai E. Stevenson left the choice up to the convention.

If the selection of a running mate often resembled an afterthought, it could be because the position itself was not especially coveted. John Adams, the first to hold the job, once complained, "My country has in its wisdom contrived for me the most insignificant office that ever the intention of man contrived or his imagination conceived."

The vice presidency has become a significant office in more recent times, both within government and politically. There is now a reasonable chance that whoever fills the position will get a chance to move up, either by succession or election. Almost every vice president elected since 1952 has later been nominated for president. In 1988 George H.W. Bush became the first vice president to be elected directly to the White House since Martin Van Buren in 1836. As of 2008, fourteen presidents had held the second-ranking post, seven in the twentieth century.

Also, since the mid-1970s the vice presidency has evolved from the somnolent office it once was; during this period five vice presidents enjoyed responsibility their predecessors did not. Nelson A. Rockefeller, who served under Gerald R. Ford, was given considerable authority in domestic policy coordination. Walter F. Mondale and George H.W. Bush helped to set policy for their respective presidents. Bill Clinton placed Albert "Al" Gore Jr. in charge of a "reinventing government" task force as well as environmental and high-tech initiatives. George W. Bush gave Richard B. Cheney wide influence throughout the government, particularly in foreign and defense policy. Many aspiring politicians now see the office as the premier base from which to campaign for the presidency.

Yet whoever is selected is often scrutinized for how well the choice balances (or unbalances) the ticket. One important factor is geography, which Clinton of Arkansas used unconventionally in choosing Sen. Gore of Tennessee to form the first successful all-southern ticket in 164 years. Forty-six-year-old Clinton also chose someone in his own age group (Gore, forty-four) in another unbalancing act. Because George W. Bush and his vice-presidential choice, Cheney, both lived in Texas before their nominations, Cheney had to return to Wyoming to fulfill the constitutional requirement that the two executive officials come from different states. Other traditional factors weighed by nominees are religion and ethnicity. In modern national politics, however, those considerations seemed to be losing their place to race, gender, and age. In 1984 the Democrats chose Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro of New York to be their vice-presidential candidate, the first woman to receive a major party nomination; Republicans followed up in 2008 with the nomination of Gov. Sarah Palin of Alaska.

Until Barack Obama's election in 2008, no African American had been selected by either party to fill any part of the ticket. In 1988 many Democrats thought that Jesse Jackson deserved second place on the ticket. Jackson had received 29 percent of the primary vote to 43 percent for Michael Dukakis. Instead, the fifty-four-year-old Dukakis chose Sen. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas, then sixty-seven, balancing the Democratic ticket by age as well as geographically and philosophically.

Age has become an important criterion with the rise of the "baby-boomer" generation. In 1988 George H.W. Bush surprised many by selecting Sen. James Danforth "Dan" Quayle of Indiana. Quayle was forty-one years old and had a relatively brief career in politics—two terms in the House of Representatives before his election to the Senate in 1980. Because of Quayle's youth and good looks, it was even suggested by some critics that Bush had selected him to appeal to young voters and women. Similar criticism was lobbed at McCain in the 2008 campaign, who at seventy-two was nearly three decades older than the forty-four-year-old Palin.

In 2000 Texas governor George W. Bush also took age into consideration, but in the opposite direction from his father, in choosing a running mate. The younger Bush chose Cheney, an experienced Washington hand, who was a former Wyoming representative and defense secretary in the elder Bush's administration. Obama in 2008 adopted a similar tack in 2008, picking the more senior Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., a six-term senator, as his running mate.

When it was his turn atop the ticket in 2000, Gore too broke new ground. Rather than pick a southern baby-boomer as Clinton had, Gore chose Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, the fifty-eight-year-old chair of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council and the first member of the Jewish faith to win a place on the national ticket of either major party. The Democrats' attention to age, as well as region, became evident again in 2004, when presidential candidate John F. Kerry chose a young southerner, Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

Recent presidential candidates, such as Gore and Kerry, and both Obama and McCain in 2008, have also developed a new practice, when they announced their choice of a vice-presidential candidate, after extensive investigations, even before the convention convened. In so doing, they demonstrated the final loss of independent power by the national convention. Delegates now had no function other than to be cheerleaders at the campaign launch of leaders who had been chosen without any deliberation by the party delegates.

When they were regularly winning the White House in the 1970s and 1980s, Republicans showed little interest in tinkering with the nominating process; they were happy to leave that as a concern of the Democrats. But once the GOP lost two presidential elections in the 1990s, many Republicans began to decry the front-loaded primary calendar that produced nominees within a few weeks of voting.

At their convention in San Diego in 1996, Republicans approved a rules change designed to help spread out the calendar. States were offered bonus delegates if they held their primary or caucus later, but the offer received few takers in 2000. Yet in the wake of that year's Bush-McCain contest, a party commission headed by former Tennessee senator and national GOP chairman Bill Brock recommended that the presidential primary calendar be dramatically overhauled, so that small states would vote first in 2004 and large states would vote last. That plan, called the "Delaware Plan," because of its state of origin, was shot down at the 2004 Republican national convention. The Republicans, like the Democrats, however chose to punish some states that held primaries before February 5. Under 2004 Republican National Committee (RNC) rules, no state was permitted to hold its primary before that date. In 2008 five states—Wyoming, New Hampshire, Michigan, South Carolina, and Florida—moved their primaries ahead and the RNC subsequently stripped them of one-half of their apportioned delegates. At their 2008 national convention, Republicans ensured that South Carolina and New Hampshire would not suffer a similar fate in the 2012 campaign, permitting them to hold primaries in January of that year.

Regional Primaries and Super Tuesdays

In addition to internal party concerns with the nominating process, other critics often found other problems of presidential primaries, including the length of the primary season (nearly twice as long as the general election campaign), the expense, the physical strain on the candidates, and the variations and complexities of state laws.

To deal with these problems, several states in 1974 and 1975 discussed the feasibility of creating regional primaries, in which individual states within a geographical region would hold their primaries on the same day. Supporters of the concept believed it would reduce candidate expenses and strain and would permit concentration on regional issues. The push toward regional primaries has generally been undermined by the more prominent development of front-loading.

The regional primary idea achieved some limited success in 1976 when three western states (Idaho, Nevada, and Oregon) and three southern states (Arkansas, Kentucky, and Tennessee) decided to organize regional primaries in each of their areas. Attempts also were made in New England to construct a regional primary. But New Hampshire would not participate because its law required the state to hold its primary at least one week before any other state. Only Vermont joined Massachusetts in holding a simultaneous presidential primary, on March 2.

In 1980 and 1984, limited regional primaries were held again in several areas of the country. Probably the most noteworthy was the trio of southern states (Alabama, Florida, and Georgia) that voted on the second Tuesday in March in both years. It became the basis for "Super Tuesday," which became a full-blown southern-oriented regional primary in 1988.

Sixteen states—a dozen from the South—held primaries on Super Tuesday, March 8, 1988. The long-held goal of many southern political leaders to hold an early regional primary was finally realized. Most of the GOP primaries were winner-take-all, and when Vice President George H. W. Bush swept every Republican primary on Super Tuesday, he effectively locked up the GOP nomination. For the Democrats, Gov. Michael S. Dukakis of Massachusetts also fared well on Super Tuesday. But despite Dukakis's victories, the Rev. Jesse Jackson—the first significant African American candidate for a major party presidential nomination—kept the contest going into June.

"March Madness"

By 1992 Super Tuesday had become part of a general rush among states to hold their primaries as early as possible. Dubbed "March Madness," after the college basketball tournament excitement at that time each year, the early clustering of primaries—seventeen states held primaries in February or March—was viewed with dismay by some political analysts. They said it could lead to nominees being locked in before most voters knew what was happening, resulting in less informed and deliberative voting in the general election.

In 1996 the process was even more heavily weighted in favor of early primaries, as more than two-thirds of them were held before the end of March. The idea of regional primaries also came the closest to fruition in 1996. "Junior Tuesday Week" (March 2–7) featured primary voting in ten states (five of which were in New England); Super Tuesday (March 12) had seven primaries (six of which were in the South); and "Big Ten" Tuesday (March 19) had four primaries in the industrial Midwest—Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, and Wisconsin. By the time California (which had moved its primary forward in the hope of increasing its sway on the nominating process) held its primary on March 26 (along with two other western states—Nevada and Washington), Sen. Robert J. "Bob" Dole of Kansas had all but clinched the Republican nomination.

In 2000 there were not only a glut of early primaries, but a large concentration on a single day—March 7. The clustering on this date—the first Tuesday of the month—was not

PRESIDENTS' REELECTION CHANCES

The record of U.S. presidential elections in the twentieth century and at the start of the twenty-first indicates that a smooth path to renomination is essential for incumbents seeking reelection. Every president who actively sought renomination during this period was successful. Those who were virtually unopposed within their party won another term. But all the presidents who faced significant opposition for renomination ended up losing in the general election.

The following chart shows the presidents who sought reelection to a second term since 1900, whether they had “clear sailing” or “tough sledding” for renomination and their fate in the general election.

Theodore Roosevelt did not seek renomination in 1908, after the completion of almost two full terms, even though he was eligible to run. However, four years later, he did seek another Republican nomination. Although he won most primaries, he was defeated at the Republican convention and then ran, unsuccessfully, as the Progressive Party candidate. Tellingly, President William H. Taft, who won the bitter fight against Roosevelt for the Republican nomination, lost in the general election to Democrat Woodrow Wilson.

Another two presidents—Harry S. Truman in 1952 and Lyndon B. Johnson in 1968—faced significant opposition at the end of their tenure and declined to run for another term. Truman was eligible for a third term because he was exempted from the Twentieth Amendment to the Constitution, which established the two-term limit. Johnson came to the presidency in 1963, completing John F. Kennedy’s term, and was eligible for another four years.

A president with an asterisk (*) next to his name, such as George W. Bush in 2004, was completing his first full four-year term when he sought reelection. A dash (—) indicates there were no presidential preference primaries. The primary vote for President Johnson in 1964 included the vote cast for favorite sons and uncommitted delegate slates; Johnson was subsequently nominated by acclamation at the Democratic convention. George H.W. Bush in 1992 had to fight off a significant challenge by Patrick J. Buchanan in the Republican primaries before he went on to win 95 percent of the convention delegates.

coincidental. It was the earliest date allowed by Democratic rules for states other than Iowa and New Hampshire to hold their primary or caucus. Eleven states scheduled primaries on March 7, 2000, creating a de facto national primary that became variously known as “Titanic Tuesday” or the new “Super Tuesday,” although the large southern-oriented vote of the same name remained on the second Tuesday in March.

Political analysts predicted the huge volume of early primaries would result in both parties’ nominations being decided by the ides of March, which is what occurred. George W. Bush and John McCain battled almost evenly through the seven states that held Republican primaries in February—Bush winning four, McCain, three. In March, Bush’s well-financed campaign machine proved decisive as he dominated the vote March 7, and McCain withdrew soon afterwards. The result was the same on the Democratic side as it was on the Republican: an early knockout by the front-runner, Vice President Gore.

The regional primary effort then declined. In 2004, while the bulk of the New England states continued to vote on the first Tuesday in March, only a four-state remnant of the South remained grouped together on the second Tuesday, and there was no cohesion among either states in the Midwest or West.

The most notable change was the dramatic movement toward a broad-based, coast-to-coast vote on the first Tuesday in March. The day’s primaries and caucuses involved states with a third of the nation’s population, including three of the seven most populous states—California, New York, and Ohio. When Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts won all but Vermont that day (and the Minnesota caucuses), his nomination was assured.

In 2008 this broad, virtually national primary took place a month earlier, on February 5, essentially ensuring both McCain’s nomination and a drawn-out contest for the Democratic Party.

NOMINATIONS TODAY

During the past decades, the country has established a distinct process for presidential nominations. Many issues remain under debate, about that process itself and about its effects on the general election.

Current Process

Even though much of the primary calendar has changed dramatically since the 1960s, the accepted starting points have remained Iowa and New Hampshire. The two states illustrate the two different types of delegate-selection processes available to the states. Iowa is a caucus; New Hampshire is a primary. Primaries require voters only to cast a ballot, an exercise that usually takes just a few minutes. The deliberative nature of a neighborhood caucus, though, often requires the commitment of an afternoon or evening.

Both states have made their early events into cottage industries with the help of candidates and the media. More than ever, Iowa and New Hampshire are about the only states left where candidates have some personal role. They can woo voters one-on-one, whether in bowling alleys, coffee shops, or the frequent gatherings in neighborhood living rooms. Yet, as the importance of these contests has increased, they have also turned to extensive television advertisements to deliver their message more broadly. For if there is one thing that has become certain in recent years, once the New Hampshire primary is over and candidates must compete in several states simultaneously, there is a frenetic burst of

Presidential candidate Howard Dean's primal scream after losing the 2004 Iowa Caucuses—seen on television and in newspapers across the country—may have contributed to his demise as front-runner and John Kerry's rise to take the Democratic nomination.

VICE PRESIDENTS WHO HAVE BECOME PRESIDENT

Fourteen vice presidents have gone on to become president: John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Martin Van Buren, John Tyler, Millard Fillmore, Andrew Johnson, Chester A. Arthur, Theodore Roosevelt, Calvin Coolidge, Harry S. Truman, Richard Nixon, Lyndon B. Johnson, Gerald R. Ford, and George H. W. Bush.

Of those, all but Adams, Jefferson, Van Buren, Nixon, and Bush first became president on the death or resignation of their predecessor. Only two—Van Buren in 1836 and Bush in 1988—have been elected president at a time of widespread suffrage while they held the office of vice-president.

Nine vice presidents since 1900 have run unsuccessfully for president:

- Thomas R. Marshall, Democratic vice president under Woodrow Wilson from 1913 to 1921, failed to win the nomination in 1920.
- Charles G. Dawes, Republican vice president under Coolidge from 1925 to 1929, unsuccessfully sought the nomination in 1928 and 1932.
- John Nance Garner, Democratic vice president under Franklin D. Roosevelt from 1933 to 1941, ran unsuccessfully (against Roosevelt) for the nomination in 1940.
- Henry A. Wallace, Democratic vice president under Roosevelt from 1941 to 1945, was Progressive Party nominee in 1948.
- Alben W. Barkley, Democratic vice president under Truman from 1949 to 1953, failed to win the 1952 nomination.
- Richard Nixon, Republican vice president under Dwight D. Eisenhower from 1953 to 1961, was the GOP nominee in 1960. (He won the nomination in 1968 and 1972.)
- Hubert H. Humphrey, Democratic vice president under Lyndon Johnson from 1965 to 1969, was the Democratic nominee in 1968.
- Walter F. Mondale, Democratic vice president under Jimmy Carter from 1977 to 1981, was the Democratic nominee in 1984.
- Al Gore, Democratic vice president under Bill Clinton from 1993 to 2001, was the Democratic nominee in 2000.

GROWTH OF PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARIES: MORE AND MORE, EARLIER AND EARLIER

The number of primaries has grown in recent decades along with states holding those primaries earlier in the presidential election year. The result is that a nominating system that once featured primaries sprinkled across the spring is now front-loaded with the bulk of the primaries held during the winter months of February and March. In 2004 for the first time New Hampshire held its first-in-the-nation primary in January.

In 2008 South Carolina also held party-sanctioned primaries in January. In addition, two states—Michigan and Florida—moved their primaries into January, in violation of party rules prohibiting any state other than New Hampshire and South Carolina from voting before February 1. Both states faced party sanctions that threatened to eliminate or reduce their delegate representations at the national conventions, although the controversy was resolved before the parties met.

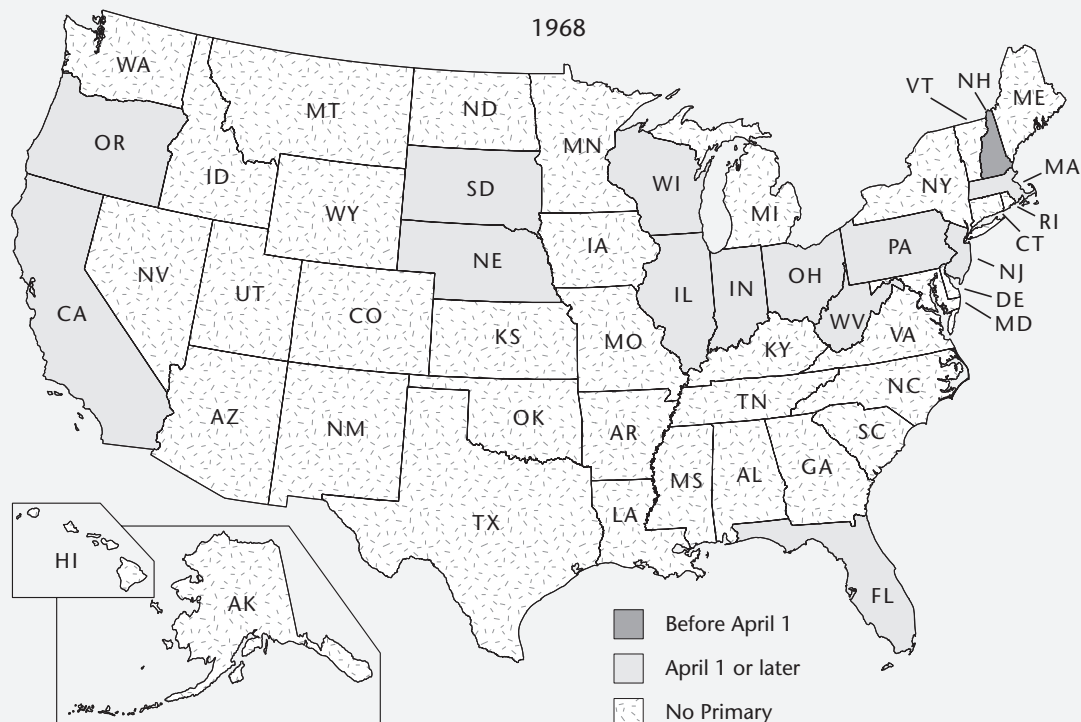

One state, New Mexico, split its primary activity. Democrats held an event in February technically called a caucus but with characteristic that resembled a regular primary; it is included in the February total. New Mexico Republicans held a regular primary in June, which is included in the total for that month. However, the total, 41, counts the two New Mexico votes as a single vote.

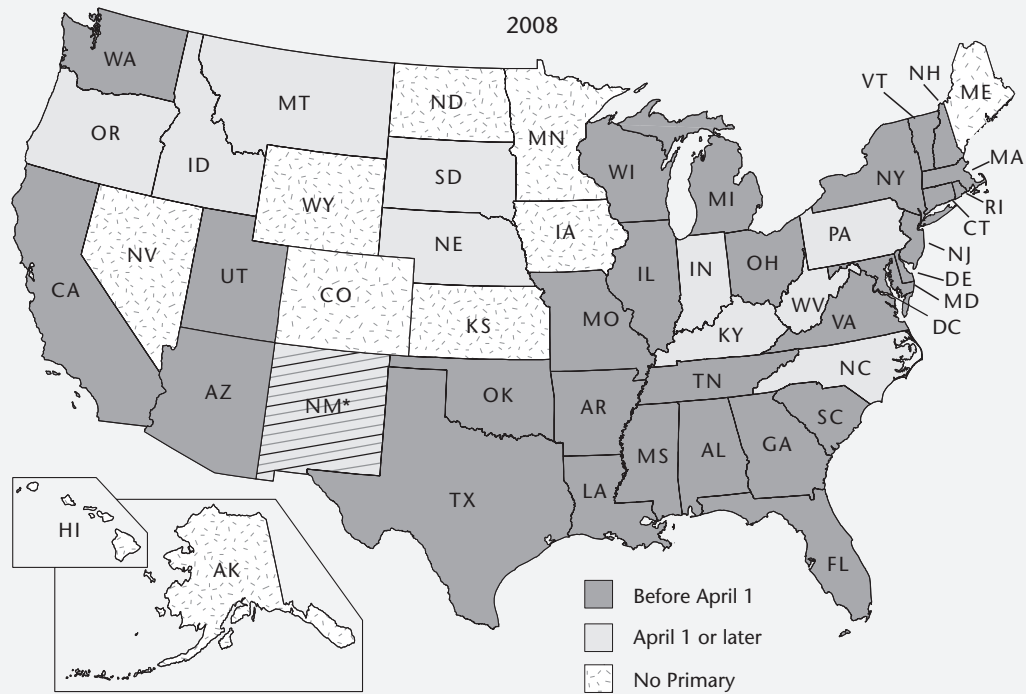

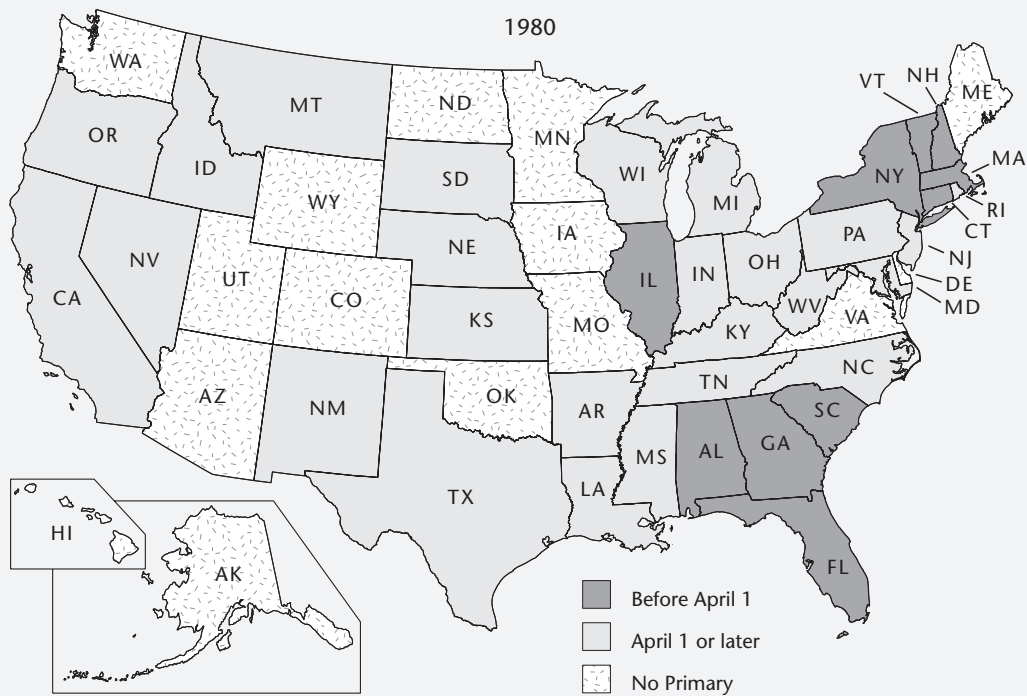

Following is a list of primaries held in each month of every nominating season from 1968 through 2008. Primaries included are those in the fifty states and the District of Columbia in which at least one of the parties permitted a direct vote for presidential candidates, or there was an aggregated statewide vote for delegates. Primaries in the U.S. territories, such as Puerto Rico, are not included.

1. Total includes a New Mexico Democratic presidential primary on February 5. This event was officially a caucus but had attributes of a regular primary. It was run by the Democratic Party in the state and was open exclusively to registered Democrats, who could vote by mail or in person at the more than 150 caucus sites between noon and 7 p.m. The results were used to assign pledged delegates to the candidates.

2. Total includes New Mexico Republicans who held a direct primary on June 3.

tarmac-to-tarmac campaigning heavily dependent on media advertising.

To be taken seriously, candidates are expected to win at least one of these two early states, with New Hampshire usually the more important of the pair. With one exception, every presidential nominee since 1976 has won either Iowa or New Hampshire and finished no lower than third in the other. However, the importance of these states has been questioned. Bill Clinton, in 1992, did not seriously contest Iowa in deference to the home-state appeal of Sen. Tom Harkin and finished second in New Hampshire behind a New Englander, former senator Paul E. Tsongas of Massachusetts. George W. Bush, in 2000, won the Iowa caucuses but lost to Sen. John McCain in New Hampshire. In 2008 the eventual nominees, McCain and Obama, both won only one of the two contests.

Change in the Future

The many innovations in the nominating process over the years continue to stimulate ideas for further change. These include:

- Changes in timing of the state primaries, such as those of the Republican “Delaware Plan.” A major motive behind these suggestions is to reduce the influence of Iowa and New Hampshire, often considered unrepresentative of the national parties’ voters, especially among Democrats. Another purpose is to limit front-loading, so as to provide more opportunities for less prominent candidates to make their case.
- A single national primary to allow all voters to have an equal impact on the presidential nomination. This change would require federal legislation, at least, and perhaps a constitutional amendment.
- A system of regional primaries, whose order would be rotated every four years, recommended by the secretaries of state of all fifty states. This plan would give the first region to vote a considerable advantage, although that power would shift from one region to another in each election.
- Revived power of the national convention to choose, or at least influence, the selection of the presidential and vice-presidential candidates. One suggestion along these lines is that the parties hold their conventions early to reduce the number of candidates to the most serious aspirants, leading to a national party primary among the remaining candidates.

Still, even without the Democrats or Republicans opting for bold changes, the nominating process is by nature evolutionary. Every four years at least a few states move their primary or caucus dates, creating a new calendar; and nearly every four years, at least one of the parties makes a change in its rules that proves significant. That effect will surely be evident for the 2012 elections as well.

Effect on Elections

Voters in presidential primaries are numerous but still represent a portion of the citizenry and may actually be unrepresentative of the national electorate. Voter turnout is usually much higher in a primary than a caucus, but even in primaries the turnout is generally much lower than in a general election. In New Hampshire, for instance, where interest in the presidential primary is probably greater than in any other state, nearly 400,000 voters turned out in February 2000 for the two presidential primaries, but that was still less than the general election turnout of 572,000. In 2004, when only the Democrats had a contest, 220,000 persons voted in the Democratic primary, but the total fall turnout was three times greater. The Iowa caucuses showed even greater differences—a Democratic caucus vote in 2004 of 124,000, compared to the party’s general election vote of 742,000. The 2008 campaign proved an exception to this trend as the 239,000 that turned out for the Democratic caucus that year was nearly double the participation in 2004.

Rules governing voter participation play a role in the comparatively low turnouts for the nominating process. Every primary is not as open as a general election, where any registered voter can participate. A number of states limit participation to registered Democrats and Republicans. Some others allow independents to participate but list them on the voting rolls afterward as members of the party in which they cast their primary ballot.

Still, the vast majority of registered voters across the country can participate in a presidential primary or caucus if they want to do so. The fact that more do not has generated the conventional wisdom that the nominating process is dominated by ideological activists—liberals on the Democratic side, conservatives on the Republican.

That is debatable in the primaries, where the winners in recent years generally have been from the mainstreams of both parties. Candidates perceived as more extreme such as Republican Pat Robertson in 1988 or Democrat Howard Dean in 2004 have had limited primary success. An ideological bent is usually more evident in the low-turnout world of the caucuses, where a small cadre of dedicated voters can significantly affect the outcome.

Evaluation

The political community continues to debate whether the current primary-dominated nominating process is better than the old system in which party leaders controlled the selection process. But it is a fact that the increased number of primaries helps provide valuable clues about the voter appeal of candidates in the general election. Nominees that have exhibited broad-based appeal among the diverse array of primary voters in the winter and spring have gone on to be quite competitive in the fall, while those nominees who have struggled through the primaries showing limited appeal among one or two of their party's major constituency groups have usually been buried under landslides in November.

It is also true that the current system frequently results in quick decisions on the presidential candidates, which may come before their qualities are fully assessed by the voters, and that the process favors candidates who are already well-known and well-financed. The system of front-loading may also create, according to some critics, a "rush to judgment," which excludes a full evaluation of other talented aspirants. The diminished role of party politicians may mean that their expert skills and expert judgments are given too limited a role in choosing the next leaders of the nation. These questions are likely to induce continued changes in the American nominating process.

Presidential Primary Returns, 1912–2008

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARY RETURNS for all elections from 1912 to 2008 are presented in this chapter. The main source for the primary returns from 1912 through 1952 is James W. Davis, Presidential Primaries: Road to the White House (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1980). CQ Press has supplemented Davis's material with the following sources: Louise Overacker, The Presidential Primary (New York: Arno, 1974)—the source used by Davis for the 1912–1924 returns; Walter Kravitz, “Presidential Preference Primaries, 1928–1956,” a 1960 Library of Congress study; Paul Davis, Malcolm Moos, and Ralph Goldman, Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952 (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1954); the offices of the secretaries of state; and state handbooks and newspapers. All statistics and footnotes are from Davis, unless otherwise indicated.

The basic source for the primary returns from 1956 to 2008 is the America Votes series, published biennially by CQ Press in Washington, D.C. Richard M. Scammon and Alice V. McGillivray of the Elections Research Center, Washington, D.C., created the series first published in 1956. Since 1996 the series has been compiled under the direction of Rhodes Cook. All statistics and footnotes are from Scammon, McGillivray, or Cook, unless otherwise indicated.

Figures in the following charts represent one of three types of votes:

- Votes cast directly for a presidential candidate.
- Votes cast for delegates whose candidate preference was indicated on the ballot.

- Votes cast for unpledged delegates. (Included in the “unpledged” category were delegates designated on the ballot as “uninstructed” and “no preference.” In recent years beginning in the 1980s these returns usually were labeled as “Uncommitted.”)

For the delegate-at-large vote in 1912–1924 primaries, Overacker listed the average vote for delegates at large. For the 1928–1952 delegate-at-large vote, Davis listed the highest vote received by any one delegate at large. CQ Press editors followed Davis's style for subsequent years.

Percentages in the following tables have been calculated to two decimal points and then rounded; 0.05 percent appears as 0.1 percent. Therefore, columns of percentages do not always total 100 percent. Major presidential candidates, primary winners, favorite sons, members of Congress, and prominent national and state political figures are included in the state-by-state primary results. Minor candidates, including most write-ins, have been grouped largely in the “Others” category.

The primary tables are intended as a record of the two major American political parties and thus list only Republican and Democratic contests. Where available other candidates receiving votes in third-party presidential primaries are listed in the footnotes.

5. No presidential preference. Three sets of delegates ran: one labelled “Wilson-Bryan,” which came out openly for Wilson; one “Wilson-Clark-Bryan,” which became identified with Clark; one Champ Clark, which was accused by the Clark people of being a scheme to split the Clark vote. The “Wilson-Clark-Bryan” list polled 4,275 and the Champ Clark list 2,722. The delegates were given to Wilson by the convention.

1. Six unpledged and two Dewey delegates won in the Republican primary, and Truman delegates won in the Democratic primary, according to Kravitz, op. cit., p. 14.

2. Write-in.

3. Source: Kravitz, op. cit., p. 14.

4. The Boston Globe of April 28, 1948, reported that the Republican delegation was "generally unpledged" but was expected to support the "favorite son" candidacy of Sen. Leverett Saltonstall (R Mass.) on the first convention ballot. The Globe reported that Democratic delegates were presumed to favor Truman's nomination.

5. No primary.

6. Unpledged, anti-Truman slate, according to Kravitz, op. cit., p. 15.

7. Unpledged slate, according to Kravitz, ibid.

8. Taft won 44 delegates and Stassen nine in the Republican primary, and W.A. Julian won 55 delegates and Bixler one in the Democratic primary, according to Kravitz, ibid.

9. Republican delegates were unpledged, according to Kravitz, op. cit., p. 15. In the Democratic primary, according to Davis, p. 297, the slate led by South Dakota Democratic Party Chairman Lynn Fellows endorsed Truman and the slate headed by former Rep. Fred Hildebrandt (D S.D.) ran uninstructed.

10. In addition to scattered votes, "others" includes Byer who received 15,675 votes and Vander Pyl who received 6,735 votes in the West Virginia primary.

* Delegate selection primaries were held in Alabama and New York. In America Votes, Scammon did not record vote totals if the primary was strictly for delegate selection and there was no presidential preference voting.

1. Write-in.

2. Prior to the primary, the District Republican organization agreed to divide the nine delegate votes, with six going to Nixon and three going to Rockefeller, according to the 1968 Congressional Quarterly Almanac, Vol. XXIV. Figures obtained from Scammon's office.

3. Figures obtained from Scammon's office. Two slates favored Humphrey; a member of an "independent" Humphrey slate received 2,250 votes.

4. Figures obtained from Scammon's office. In America Votes, Scammon did not record vote totals if a candidate was unopposed or if the primary was strictly for delegate selection.

5. In the American Party presidential primary, Wallace received 493 of the 504 votes cast, or 97.8% of the vote, according to the office of the Nebraska secretary of state.
